WHEN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH MADE THE LAWS.

Notes and Clippings.

THE smuggling of liquor across the Maine border from Canada is being carried on more extensivly this season than ever before.

THE duke of Torlonia, syndic of Rome, has been dismissed from his post by royal decree for having presented to the pope the congratulations of the Roman municipality.

THE earthquake of last year left deep pits in the land between Charleston and Summerville, and on the margins of these was white sand, such as is seldom found except near the seashore. On this sand has sprung up a dense growth of seaweeds, and it is conjectured that the seeds whence sprung this growth had been buried at a great depth for many centuries.

IT appears that special attention is being paid in France and England to a more general substitution of iron and steel for wood, whereever practicable, in manufactured articles, such for instance as building materials, boxes and packing cases, barrels or casks, carriages, carts and other vehicles, furniture, fencing, railway work, sheds, signal boxes, telegraph poles, etc. In France there hav recently come into use hollow iron window-frames and doors, which are said to be light and strong, and of far greater durability than could ever be assumed of wood. There is no reason, too, it is thought, why corrugated barrels of iron or steel should not be used for liquors, since milk and preserved fruits and other articles are kept in cans. Steel is finding much favor among carriage-builders, but there is still much prejudice against the metal being used in the manufacture of furniture. The general adoption of steel sleepers is warmly advocated by some, as is also the employment of iron and steel in the construction of railway cars, and the erection of wooden sheds, signal boxes, etc., by railway companies, as at present, might, it is urged, be profitably and economically substituted with steel.

GEO. C. SEIBS, of Brisbane, Australia, writes to the Melbourne Liberator: "Freethinkers in this city hav for the last week or two been rather put upon their mettle, the authorities having refused a license to the lessees of the Gaity Theater unless the Sunday lectures were stopped. This action necessitated their finding some other place of meeting, which fortunately they did. It is believed to be but the forerunner of a series of prosecutions on the part of the Christians which hav been brewing for some time. One thing is certain, let come what may, Freethinkers of Brisbane hav determined to fight it out to the bitter end. The outcome, it is hoped, will tend to the adoption of urgent measures with regard to the early erection of a suitable hall."

THE Rev. E. Walpole Warren, says Life, should take Anthony Comstock and go to some oasis in the Desert of Sahara, as he sees the same objections to dancing that Anthony sees in works of art. Go home, Rev. E. Walpole Warren, commands Life. You hav no business here anyhow; you were an assisted emigrant, reverend and suggestiv sir, and in coming here you made a lawbreaker of your whole congregation. Go home and make room for some poor devil of an Italian who, while he may be more or less of a bandit, and fitted for nothing but work on the subway, is, nevertheless, nothing of a hypocrit, and has a mind which never reverts to unholy thoughts when he sees a young man and young woman tripping the light fantastic toe.

FRANCIS MURPHY, the temperance evangelist, is meeting with considerable opposition from the ministers of Pittsburgh, Pa. Since he began his meetings there two weeks ago, not one minister has rendered him any assistance or even given him the moral influence of his presence. An effort was made to secure one of the churches for the meetings, but this was also opposed, and he is holding forth at the old city hall.

THE European Correspondence Company, Paris, issues a sheet of "views of prominent Englishmen concerning the proposed treaty of arbitration between England and America." Charles Bradlaugh is quoted as saying: "I hav always been strongly in favor of the decision of international differences by international arbitration, and of making preparation for this by formal treaty before any difference arises. I think this would especially apply to two great peoples speaking the same language and sharing the same conditions. If the governments of the United States and Great Britain could be induced to set to the world the example of pledging themselvs to the peaceful solution of all disputes arising between them, it would be at least an encouragement to those who, despite the disheartening growth of military expenditure, are protesting in Europe against the fearful waste of men and money, which, besides the crime and demoralization of its wars during the last twenty-five years, has converted Europe even in its peace periods into almost an armed camp. The shocking condition of things in Europe, with so many hundreds of thousands of men always under arms, non-producers to be supported by the overburdened wage-earners, must—unless it can be alleviated by disarmament—culminate on the continent either in a very terrible war or equally terrible revolution."

THE Secular Thought, of Toronto, says: "The time appears to be in sight in this country when we shall be naming our children Praise-God-Barebones and Devil-overcomer David, and be imposing stringent penalties for non-attendance at God's meeting-house, for laughing, for walking out on the Lord's day, or for kissing one's wife, and such like unbecoming conduct. Seriously, the climax of religious or rather superstitious absurdity has almost been reached among a certain class here, and unfortunately the reins of the city government hav been seized by them, and they hav now the power to impress their will to an extent probably not fully realized by the large proportion of our citizens. Fancy the chief officer of a great city in this age of the world's history issuing souvenir cards with scripture verses like the following: 'Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain,' etc. Bagdad a thousand years ago is about the only parallel to Toronto I can recall at present. In the former case, however, the verses were from a different source, just as veracious, the Koran. It is to be hoped that in the interests of decency and good sense the electors of Toronto will soon take action to effectually stamp out all of this tomfoolery, which is fast bringing the Queen City into contempt and causing it to be a laughing-stock to the rest of the world."

The Distribution of Wealth.

Why must some be poor and others rich? Some ignorant and others learned? For ignorance is only mental poverty. Why must some be diseased and others healthy—for what is disease but bodily poverty, or health but bodily wealth? Why does one die in the bud, another in the blossom, and another after the full harvest of all his powers has ripened and been gathered—for what are the children's graves but proofs of poverty in those resources that bring long life? Why are some ugly and others beautiful—for what makes ugliness but poverty in the things that please? And why are some vicious—for what is vice but moral poverty? Why, if—as our Declaration of Independence affirms—all men are created equal, is it impossible to find any two men who are in fact equal in any respect?

First, there is the aristocracy of muscle. Go into a glass-works or an iron foundry. See those twenty glass-blowers at once, wielding singly with herculean arms at the end of rods ten feet in length those great pliant cylinders of molten glass, now so soft, red, and yielding under their weight that they must be kept moving like an orator's thought or prima donna's song, or like the blazing stars that rush through space as if to pause were ruin. All the workmen move in rhythmic harmony, every muscle keeping time, time, time in a sort of runic rhyme, like the arms of violinists in an orchestra, since all are inbent on producing the same result, each movement deftly timed to catch the pliant effect of the escaping heat while yet the red glass bends under the molding power of the stalwart artist's lungs as he literally breathes into the dull sand and clay a form, life, and being not their own. The strength of Richard Cœur de Lion and the grace of Saladin combine to shape the fading cylinder of frozen fire, which other hands will soon lay out in plates of crystal, one of the myriad miracles of toil. Thus the man shapes the work. But meanwhile the work shapes also the man. He might stand as a model to the chief of sculptors for a statue of the king of men. His thews are iron, his knuckles brass. Neither blouse, dust, soot, nor grime conceal his manly beauty from the eye of art. The esthetic Greeks would hav said to him, "We must hav you in marble for our Pantheon. By birth you were a peasant, but toil has made you a god." It is from the blood and lineage of such, when their offspring marry up, as it is called, into families made weak by wealth and puny by successful trade, that the fainting vigor of an emasculated nobility will borrow the privilege of good digestion and red blood. Thus those who through trade and profit mount up with wings as eagles must return to earth again or die, as Hercules could only renew his strength when, thrown upon the ground, he kissed his mother. The highest price the successful pay for their success, and the dearest cost at which civilization emerges from barbarism, is this descent, this fall, which the successful, with few exceptions, make from the aristocracy of muscle—a perfect physical manhood—consenting to become crippled, wheezy, dyspeptic, nervous, sleepless, gouty, puny; to liv between the doctor and the confessor, with absolution on the right and life insurance on the left, and potions in front and plasters behind; starving as A. T. Stewart starved, because nothing he could eat would digest—a debtor daily fleeing from the duns of death. Who will venture to assert that life has any magic in its gift which will lift the wasted merchant into equality with the glass-blower?

Again, there is the kindred but not identical aristocracy of health and good nature—that superabundance of life and soul in one man which by its genial overflow attracts all others and makes us say to them, "Yea, though thou swindle me, yet will I trust in thee." Some of these men hav an actual overflow of brain power, and to know or even to meet them is like stopping twenty minutes to take a university education on the half-shell. Others are dull as a lottery in which you may invest all your life and still draw blanks. Some of them are fat, and some are spare. Some are very orthodox, like Beecher, Blaine, Spurgeon, Bismarck, Gladstone, Moody, and Jo Cook. Others are equally heterodox, like Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, Victor Hugo, Gambetta, Garibaldi, and Bakounine. But both are equally jolly. If they labor, they are strong; if they doubt, they are stronger. If they pray and are patriotic, they grow fat. If they labor to abolish both God and the state, as Bakounine, of Russia, has done, they grow fatter. Wine or abstinence, poverty or wealth, exposure or sedentary habits, alike agree with them.

Compare with these privileged classes the large mass of constitutional invalids to whom achievement is impossible, to whom the gates even of self-support and ordinary utility are closed; whom the least struggle to be self-supporting consigns to an early grave, and the tenure of whose existence depends on the humanity of their friends or of the state. How bitter a sarcasm are such facts upon the text, "All men are created equal!"

Need I speak of the several aristocracies of learning, intellect, or culture; of piety, reverence, and virtue; of philosophy, logic, and reason; of art, invention, and beauty; of morals and ethics, of honesty, of courage, of domestic purity and fidelity? Society is a continual assertion of the vast inequalities among men in all these respects. Newton was born with such an instinctiv knowledge of mathematics that he leaped beyond Euclid without reading it, and when urged by his preceptor to read it, scanned it like a novel, finding nothing in it that required study; while Voltaire confesses that, after devoting years of preparation to the effort to study Newton's "Principia," he could not even study it. Everett read Greek at five, and graduated from Harvard at sixteen. Beaconsfield mastered three worlds—the social, the literary, and the political—all without leaving his father's library. Every church spire in the world is a standing attestation of mankind's belief that men are unequal in goodness, virtue, piety; and every sermon is an effort to build up an aristocracy of right living on a basis of theological belief. Let him who thinks there is no aristocracy of logic, philosophy, or reason dare criticise Plato or Lucretius, Sir William Hamilton, Spencer, Hegel, Schopenhauer, Emerson, or Von Hartmann to a student of either of those teachers. How speedily will he be told that he is a plebeian, and must not upset the vested monopoly of these intellectual aristocrats! So in muscle, in health, in learning, in piety, in philosophy, men recognize, not equality, but quality; not mediocrity, but merit; not widows' mites, but monopolists' hoards; not want, but worth; not veal, but value. None of the great goods of life, least of all the intellectual, distribute equally. And yet each produces what the other needs. The glass-blower's physique would be an impediment to Sir Isaac Newton; for, with so much muscle, he would hav to lead a muscular life, or the great tides of blood would center on his brain and stop his sleep. And Newton's nerve development, his surplus of brain over muscle, gave him a sensitivness and irritability of organization which even in his high position involved him in quarrels with his nearest friends as well as with his rivals, made his social life a torment which not even his acknowledged ascendency could alleviate, caused him to insult his admirers one day and apologize to them the next, subjected him to the charge of insanity—in short, made of him socially a man whom a healthy glass-blower, strong in the love of wife and child, might pity. And yet the glass-blower's art furnished Newton with those lenses which were among the hourly objects of his solicitude and conditions of his fame. Newton was absolutely dependent on the glass-maker for the ability to perform all his labors. And the glass-maker learned from Newton both the nature of light and the laws of attraction. Thus, out of their inequalities grew their reciprocal abilities.

But you will say I am setting up a man of straw. All that is meant by the doctrin of political equality is that all men shall start with equal political rights and opportunities, not that they shall continue through life with equal political powers. If this be all that is meant by it, then the boasted doctrin of political equality conflicts with no doctrin of absolutism, monarchy, aristocracy, or divine right. For even William of Germany would not deny that at birth, or, at least, as a fœtus in the womb, he had no more actual political power than a peasant. The doctrin implies a delusion, viz., that, by the democratic machinery of universal suffrage and making all offices electiv, all men may be made substantially equal in political power. All men may be given a free scramble for political power, just as all men may be given a free scramble for wealth. But the organization of society in republics implies as great an inequality in the possession and exercise of political power as in a monarchy or aristocracy, and the reorganization of a republic from its present form into a Socialistic state would only change the form of the inequality, but would not lessen its amount. What power has the man who merely votes compared with the man who manipulates primaries, stacks and piles up the votes together by means of party conventions, platforms, and campaigns? How much did you do toward making Cleveland president compared with what Daniel Manning did? If the distribution of wealth could be made Socialistic—i.e., dependent on votes—the vote-stacker would still hav the advantage of the mere vote-caster. The man who votes is to the man who stacks votes as the silver dollar on the banker's counter is to the banker who owns it. If you hav merely voted twenty-five years, can you point to any officer you hav ever elected—to any election that would not hav resulted in the same way without your vote as with it? In politics votes are chips. Demagogs are the players. The power is not in the chip, but in the player. The demagog becomes a monopolist of votes as Vanderbilt is of railroads, or the Astors of land. Thus, even the most democratic machinery, invented on purpose to equalize men—the ballot, universal suffrage, popular elections—only givs rise to a new order of noblemen and monopolists, substituting often canal contractors for dukes of Bedford, gamblers for earls of Derby, lottery-dealers for marquises, and saloonists for country squires.

Even in the Nihilist organization, men so sick of government that they seek to abolish the state will bind themselvs by solemn oaths into a new and secret state so much more despotic than that against which they war that if it order them to certain death they put on their new and heavier yoke with joy.

Trades unions, formed expressly to free their members from the domination of capital and the arrogance of employers, forthwith frame limitations on the freedom of their members of a far more minute and exacting character. So, again, in crime those who disobey the laws come into a new bond, by which they obey their own lawless leaders. Thus, in every phase of human thought and effort, out of the very womb of the most radical assertions of democracy an aristocracy evolves; with every effort at mutiny or insubordination against rank the rebels choose a leader, submit to his despotic will, and confess inequality. Privileged classes spring out of the compost heap of universal suffrage, and a democratic republic culminates in an autocratic president who has more real power than a czar.

The inequality in society finds its autotype in nature. The stars, the flowers, the mountains, know no equality. They are so like man that when we look at the Alps we think of the Cæsars and Napoleons. In this spirit Byron says:

> He who ascends the mountain tops shall find
> The loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow;
> He who surpasses or subdues mankind
> Must look down on the hate of those below.
> Though high above the sun of glory glow
> And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
> Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
> Contending tempests on his naked head,
> And thus reward the toils which to those summits led.

The Andes and the Alps, Mount Blanc and Chimborazo, seem to many a child, savage, or peasant to be vast wastes of wealth, a mere accumulation of building-stone in an inaccessible place. So the political concentration of power in Cæsar or Napoleon, and the like concentration of wealth in the Rothschilds, Girard, Astor, or Vanderbilt, seems to many seers, prophets, mystics, and moralists who do not base their ethics on economics, but on emotions merely, to be an unnatural and unrighteous waste.

These religious and moral advocates of equality in the distribution of wealth hav lately been reinforced by a school of revolutionists headed by Karl Marx and Lasalle in Germany and by Hyndman in England and Henry George in America, who make certain alleged doctrins of political economy their basis. Their argument is brief. It is thus:

1. Does not labor create all wealth? Ans. It does.
2. Are we not labor? Ans. We are.
3. Do we not, then, create all wealth? Ans. We do.
4. Do you ever see labor owning wealth? Ans. Never, for whoever owns wealth ceases to labor.
5. Then those who create wealth never own it? Ans. Never.
6. But ought not those who create wealth always to own it? Ans. They ought.
7. Then is not every man who is without wealth robbed? Ans. He is.
8. And is not every man who possesses wealth a robber? Ans. He is.
9. And is any duty plainer than that the robbed ought to kill the robber and enter into possession of his own? Ans. No duty is plainer.
10. Then is it not the duty of every man who has got nothing to dynamite every man who has got something? Ans. Certainly.

Thus a theory of thugism is deduced from an economic mistake. The fallacy lies in the first proposition. The word labor, among wage-workers, has come to be applied exclusivly to themselvs. Hence the phrase, "Does not labor create all wealth?" means for them, "Do not wage-workers create all wealth?" But the first condition to a man being a wage-worker is that he shall be without the means of working, except as some man employs him. For no man will work for others' profit who has all the means of working for his own profit. Now, to say that a man who in himself has no power to work except as another employs him; whose work is, in fact, itself created and caused to exist by his employer; who has to be furnished with subsistence, tools, workshop, and job at another's cost, enterprise, and risk—to say that he is an original creator of the commodity he turns out, is palpably false, because his labor has to be created or caused by his employer. Suppose it to be brick that he is making to-day by hand, and to-morrow a machine is substituted which supersedes his work, can the machine say to the brick, "I made you?" It would hav the same right to say so as the man would hav whose work is produced, caused, and controled by the same enterprise as caused the machine. When the word labor, therefore, has by usage been reduced to designate merely wage-workers, it is no longer true that this labor creates the commodity which the enterprise and capital of an employer causes it to turn out. In such a case, the employer is the sole creator of the commodity, and all that labor creates is the distribution of a certain sum in wages to itself. Defining its creativ power in this manner, it gets exactly all that it creates, and the alleged superstructure of injustice on which it was sought to plant the cannon of mutual assassination and confiscation tumbles into the dead level of stern economic necessity and justice.

Contemporary Religious Opinions of the Abolitionists.

Quoted by Ell Thayer in the Sun.

N. Y. Independent, Jan. 3, 1856.—Of the converts to Spiritualism, almost all of them were Infidels, and some of them, like Garrison, of the most degraded class.

N. Y. Evening Mirror, May, 1855.—At the Free Will Baptist church, Sullivan street, yesterday, most extravagant and fanatical speeches were made by a motley set of speakers—male and female, black and white. Garrison, Abby Kelly Foster, C. C. Burleigh, were the ranters par excellence. Senators Sumner and Wilson, Gerritt Smith, were denounced as half-way antislavery men.

The New York Daily News, May, 1855, calls the disunionists "an Abolition conclave of fiends." "One side of this circle of fiends were, like Moloch, for open war against the Union and the Constitution.

> "Their sentence was for open war:
> Of wiles more unexpert they boast not.

"The Constitution was to be trodden under foot as a polluted thing, and the Union assailed by their Tartarean fire and violence. Garrison was the leader in this savage, violent form of parricide. Garrison, the English emissary, and who came hither with Thompson to play a more mischievous part than Arbuthnot and Ambrister, the English spies that Jackson hung in Florida. . . . We pity and despise them; the fiends that follow Garrison will not destroy the paradise of this Union. They dash themselvs in vain, foaming in their impotent rage, against the breakwater of the Constitution."

New York Observer, May, 1855.—A CLEAN SWEEP.—At a meeting of the American Antislavery Society held last week in this city the following resolution was supported by Mr. Garrison, from the business committtee, and, we presume, was unanimously adopted. If there is anything else in heaven or earth which these fanatics are disposed to denounce, it would be gratifying to know what and where it is:

Resolved, That the following religious organizations, viz., the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the American Home Missionary Society, the American Bible Society, the American Bible Union, the American Tract Society, the American Sunday-school Union, the American and Foreign Christian Union, the American and Foreign Bible Society, the American Baptist Publication Society, the American Baptist Missionary Union, the American Baptist Home Mission Society, the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, the Missionary Societies of the Protestant Methodists, Episcopal Methodists, Protestant Episcopal, and Moravian bodies respectivly, being in league and fellowship with the slaveholders of the South, utterly dumb in regard to the slave system, and inflexibly hostil to the antislavery movement, are not only wholly undeserving of any pecuniary aid or public countenance at the North, but cannot be supported without conniving at all the wrongs and outrages by which chattel slavery is characterized, and therefore ought to be instantly abandoned by everyone claiming to be the friend of liberty and a disciple of Christ the redeemer.

This resolution is submitted and supported by a man publishing a newspaper in which he allows such blasphemy to be published from week to week as makes the blood run cold to read. In a recent number one of his correspondents says: "If God has the power to abolish slavery and does not, he is a very scoundrel." From this we infer readily that there is no God at all.

We suppose that among all the supporters of the resolution we hav copied above there are very few who believe in the existence of the God of the Bible. The society which they represent is now the only American antislavery society having any vitality whatever. In thus planting itself in defiant opposition to the entire body of Christian philanthropists in the United States and boldly proclaiming its hostility to the church and to all the institutions of Christian benevolence, it discloses its true character and reveals the natural result of unregulated and unscriptural measures of reform. . . . Strike out of being the societies enumerated in the damnatory resolution given above, and what would be left in the matter of philanthropy and benevolence? Separate the clergy from the asylums and other charitable houses of relief for the poor and distressed, and how long would they be sustained? Infidelity makes a great outcry about its philanthropy, but religion does the work.

The Whisky Tax.

Mr. Blaine wants to keep up the tax on whisky because it promotes temperance. Colonel Ingersoll, on the contrary, thinks that if the Mississippi river should flow with free whisky there would be no more intemperance than now. The Prohibitionists are inclined to disagree with Mr. Blaine; but if they should find the Mississippi river flowing with whisky they would be sure to dam it.

The Romish Lion's Jubilee.

To-morrow 275,000,000 of people pay homage to the present Roman pontiff, Leo XIII., on the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination. Surpassing in point of magnificence all previous displays of pomp, and wealth, and power are the gorgeous presents to be bestowed, all wrung by the despotic sway of superstition from among the most wretched of earth's toiling creatures. Crowned heads who, in many instances, are merely his marionets, congratulate in person or by special envoy; Protestant queens and princes vie with each other to show their sycophantic fawning, their complete servility. The mass to be performed for the representativ of "him who had not where to lay his head" will cost $200,000, and this follower of the somewhat mythical tramp of Jerusalem will wear a tiara studded with priceless gems. No longer king of Rome, yet his adroit tactics as a predatory politician hav made the pope once more all-powerful in the council of the Eternal City, his recent order to his followers to participate in the elections resulting in a complete victory for the Vatican. O tempora! O mores! The party of liberty and progress was swept away as though with the hot breath of a simoon.

A Chicago morning paper closes a six-column illustrated panegyric on the pope with these words:

> From all parts of the world presents will go to the spiritual ruler of "the only empire upon which the sun not only never sets, but on which the sun will never set until it is turned into darkness."

This shows the papal power is not confined to Rome, but permeates our entire republic. Last Sunday seventy-five hundred devotees paraded the streets of Pittsburgh and passed in review before a bishop, and many more will doubtless follow that example to-morrow in honor of this all-powerful perennial potentate. We are told that Leo loves America and her institutions. Yes, this Romish lion, seeking whom he may devour, in answer to the questions of the American bishops replied as follows:

> The civil laws are binding only when conformable to the superior rights of the church. . . . Atheism of the state consists in the exclusion from the civil government of all religious influences—above all, that of the religion of Jesus Christ. In other words, the separation of church and state.

"Oh, how he loves!" Yet newspapers giv six-column articles in praise, thousands parade our streets in his honor, and, I presume, the president will send his congratulations for all of us to this mitered scoundrel who is scheming to destroy what has been our boast and pride as a republic for a century —the very fundamental principle of American liberty —the absolute separation of church and state.

These indications prove that manhood is oozing out of our national life, when the hydra-headed monster of Romanism meets with no demonstration of disapproval; that we are willing to wallow at the feet of representativs of the papal power; that politicians, lost to all sense of honor or duty, are liable to trade the liberties of the people for a political favor from the pope. When presidential aspirants send daughters to nunneries and hav sons marry into the Romish religion it shows that the man of the Vatican is the greatest "vote-monger" in the world.

Nice business, truly, for loyal American citizens to be engaged in—celebrating the anniversary of the greatest despot on earth, who openly declares hostility to the fundamental American idea, and who is activly engaged in undermining it; who declares that the government founded by a Jefferson, a Franklin, and a Washington must be made to "conform to the superior rights of the church"—a despot who even claims infallibility. Cardinal Gibbons already holds the loaded dice of destiny—a million and a half of Roman Catholic votes, which presages that the day of liberty's doom may not be far distant.

Under the "mad dog" cry of Anarchism, we are assured that Roman Catholics are not Anarchists, but that all Anarchists are Infidels, with a suspicious intimation that all Infidels are Anarchists, and therefore should be exterminated, so for the time being we find a wonderful agreement between Catholic and Protestant clergy that all must stand together to crush out Freethought and heresy. This is just what all leading Freethinkers hav for years prophetically foreseen, but they were not prepared for the Romish cunning which could so readily enrage the entire populace against every Infidel in the land.

How well we should heed the warning words of Lafayette, "If ever the liberty of the American republic is destroyed, it will be the work of the Roman Catholic priests!"

There are said to be over two hundred thousand Freethinkers in the United States—people emancipated from orthodox dogmas. I almost hope this is not so, for as Freethinkers we are the natural defenders and protectors of that priceless boon, religious freedom, and if that strong numerically we stand condemned as being very derelict in our duty. Alas! the little band who annually giv liberally, nobly, generously, toward the only three agencies which can possibly perpetuate and extend that religious freedom are very few in number. Those three agencies, the Freethinkers' trinity, are the Freethought press, the American Secular Union, and the propaganda by our lectures, which every Liberal should feel it his bounden duty to maintain. What are all the rest doing? Some of these pretended Liberals are paying their money to support the church. Intellectually they don't believe in orthodox dogmas, but industrially or commercially they are slaves. Continually concealing their true aspirations makes them apologists for the church, especially if their patrons are largely of that class, and readily join the hue and cry against every brave and honest Infidel who dares to enter the brunt of the battle. The orthodox counterpart of these crawling creatures is those who are coerced through fear of hell. Well, we hav no place of future torment with which to frighten Freethinkers, but they are liable to receive a hell of a reception right here in the near future if they neglect to assist those who are battling on the outposts for universal freedom. Then, to our shame and sorrow, there is another contingent of professed Liberals who act like cowardly, Jesuitical malcontents more determined to destroy our efforts than to sustain them; ever ready to spread slander and suspicion on the acts and character of those prominent in proclaiming universal mental liberty. Then, there is the finical Freethinker who picks every flaw on this pretext or that, or on no pretext at all; who considers the movement too uncultured for his esthetic aspirations. He wants to wait till "sawciety" accepts it. And he waits.

The Liberal who is deterred from doing his duty on account of some personal pique is not so much of a Liberal as he ought to be. The principles at stake are too far beyond and far reaching in their effect to allow of desertion from the ranks in the hour of danger. Just as in a political contest we don't care to inquire into the character or chronology of every person who votes our ticket, but we giv them credit for doing one good deed, now let the spirit of harmony, amity, and action pervade the entire Liberal host during the year 1888, and let us each endeavor to make it a memorable year in the progress of Freethought and Secular principles.

I wish all a glad New Year.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

P.S.—By some fatality, Harry Hoover's name, which I am informed was regularly reported at the recent Congress, as one of its vice-presidents, although it was either illegible or obliterated on the list handed me, has thus far not been properly acknowledged. When I heard of it, I notified a party to see that the correction was made, but so far, I believe, it has been neglected. I hope that my friend Harry will not imagin that there was any intentional slight or neglect. I think he is too old a worker for that.

The Chicago Secular Union.

I am the committee of one who arranges the lectures for the Chicago Secular Union. In the absence of the president, Mr. Stevens, I presided at the meeting referred to in "Liberal's" letter of Dec. 5, 1887. I regret the necessity that compels me to refer to that letter, and to assure the writer and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that his fears are groundless.

We distribute each month several thousand circulars containing program for the month, and also setting forth the manner of conducting our meetings and the objects for which the Union was organized. Let me quote from the circular:

> The lecturer selects his subject, and the society is in no way responsible for his views or his manner of handling it.
> The Chicago Secular Union is subordinate to the American Secular Union, which is organized on the basis of the Nine Demands of Secularism. It is a Free Thought organization, and offers an absolutely free platform. All who can work on the basis of the Nine Demands are invited to coöperate.

On the back of these circulars are printed the Nine Demands and Ingersoll's definition of Secularism.

Since the first lecture of this course (first Sunday in September) some twelve thousand of these circulars hav been distributed. If "Liberal" will call on our secretary, that functionary will supply him with a bundle of those circulars and point out the passages that I hav quoted. "Liberal" will then be expected to place the circulars where they will do most good, and further vindicate his right to the honored name he assumes by making a handsome donation to the Chicago Union's pledge.

So much for the documentary evidence in regard to Anarchism in our local organization, but I am not content to let the case rest there. As a rule, at our meetings, after the lecture of the evening, the presiding officer, in placing the lecture before the house for criticism, speaks (however, in varying formula) something like this: "In order that there may be a full and fair discussion of the lecturer's subject, an especial invitation is extended to those who may desire to traverse the statements or antagonize the arguments of the lecturer. This is the only organization in this city where open adverse criticism is allowed, and the religionist as well as the Freethinker is assured a courteous hearing and respectful consideration."

In response to such an invitation we hav had Catholic apologies and orthodox exhortations. We hav also had lectures defending Spiritualism. Why does not "Liberal" raise a warning voice against our Catholic, Protestant, and Spiritualistic tendencies?

We sometimes hav heated, inconsiderate, silly speeches on all sides of a question, but the Union is in no way responsible for the senseless utterances of debaters, whether the topic be ethics or economics. I wish it understood that I am not apologizing for, or justifying, nor censuring the language quoted by "Liberal." I hav endeavored to establish conclusivly that the Nine Demands constitute the working platform of the Chicago Secular Union—that the Union is not responsible for the opinions of anyone who occupies its free platform, or the vagaries of any critic who accepts our invitation to take part in the exercises, and, finally, that we are conscious of sufficient strength to withstand and even invite hostil criticism. While not questioning "Liberal's" right to speak on this matter to THE TRUTH SEEKER'S large constituency, my ideas of propriety would suggest that the place "to enter a vigorous protest against the teaching and preaching of Anarchism in the rooms of the Chicago Secular Union" is, on the very spot, i.e., in the rooms and at the meetings of the Chicago Secular Union. Accepting "Liberal's" statement as to what Anarchism has already done, and disregarding his prediction as to what it will do in certain contingencies, I make my best bow to Anarchism for its services in puncturing that economic wind-bag, Henry George, and in opening the eyes of Pope Powderly's dupes.

Chicago, Dec. 26th. EDWARD S. MCLEOD.

Address

To the Liberals of the United States by the Board of Directors of the American Secular Union.

We take it for granted that the Secular Union has the sympathies of all the Liberals of the country, that its platform appeals to their reason, and that they would favor more practical means for carrying out its objects. For such work the first essential is an organization; the second, the necessary financial support. We desire that the organization shall be strengthened, and so conducted that all the Liberals of the country shall be sufficiently interested to coöperate in carrying out its purpose. This is a large country, and probably its extent has more to do than many of us imagin with interfering with the success of the Union. The members of our organization cannot afford to meet together in large numbers, if for no other reason than the cost of traveling expenses. There is, however, a small body of speakers moving among the Liberals, promoting Freethought and Secular principles by eloquent lectures, who find their support in the audiences that attend. Our plan is to invite the earnest support of all these lecturers in a way that will bind them and the people in the fraternal bonds of the American Secular Union, giving them whatever prestige may arise from the fact of their being special agents of the American Secular Union. That such special agents shall endeavor to enlist the coöperation, moral and financial support, of the Liberals individually and collectivly wherever they may hav appointments. It is presumed that there are a great many Liberals throughout the land who would gladly make donations annually or oftener to the general fund of the Union, but who might put it off from day to day, and possibly entirely neglect, owing to the trouble of writing and sending a safe remittance by mail. Liberals will thus find a convenient way to do what they would wish for the general fund, while at the same time contributing as much as they otherwise would to the lecturer.

The plan which has received the approval of the board of directors, and which will be communicated to each lecturer in detail by the secretary, has the merit of placing all Liberal lecturers on the same footing in the Union, and affords an arrangement which should be agreeable to all, besides affording a practical plan for insuring a sufficient treasury fund. The funds thus obtained are to be used for the maintenance of an activ secretary and home office, and for the printing and purchasing of such literature, tracts, or pamphlets as are approved by the board of directors for distribution to contributors to the fund, provided the income is sufficient, and for the assistance of the lecturers. The secretary, where possible, will assist the lecturers to procure appointments and render them all the aid in his power. It is fair to presume that those who adopt this arrangement with the Union would not be contributing any portion of their own earnings, but that, being authorized agents, they will receive a much larger subscription than they otherwise would, besides building up a universal interest, and maintaining an activ, vigorous national organization for the furtherance of Freethought and their own protection.

* $1 for annual membership, $1 for C. B. Reynolds, and $1 for Defense Fund.

A letter from Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., casually refers to paying "my annual contribution, $25." You do-nothing-but-talk Liberals, think of that—a life-membership fee every year. A few more Footes and what a grand organization we could hav! The Footes, being engaged in the laudable task of enlightening the race to preserve health of body and strength of mind, might, if so disposed, plead exemption from assisting the American Secular Union, as they are carrying on such needed reforms in their own way, but they remain in the front rank of aggressiv reforms both as thinkers and contributors. As to their professional acumen I can safely testify, for the junior has diagnosed our trouble (financial flatulence) exactly, and furnished the most potent prescription. In agravated instances, such as ours, we are willing to "take" allopathic doses of the same formula. Are there no more physicians here to provide the necessary balm? If so, wake up. We are perfectly impartial as to what school. May the young doctor liv to see bigotry and superstition laid under foot, with a big F.

N. C. Dahl is a member of our Chicago society, who never makes the eagle on a dollar squeal by squeezing it, when contemplating a contribution. Mr. Dahl is a Dane, who traveled through Germany, Saxony, Sweden, and Norway while quite young, and at twenty years was engaged in this city in a scheme to colonize his countrymen in Kansas, which was a good investment for those who went on the land, but its promoter did not get rich out of it. He is a radical Freethinker and Socialist, and his word is worth one hundred cents on the dollar every time, and he is so far removed from the "shiftlessness" of the Socialists, which, we are informed, is their proverbial characteristic, that he has built up a considerable wholesale fish business. But there is nothing "fishy" about his Liberalism. It is of the robust order. He is contemplating another colony scheme, by which he can do something to help those who are willing to help themselvs, and his desire to do good for others wreathes his hearty, generous countenance into a perpetual sunbeam sort of a smile.

In Dahl's market, loaded with years and infirmities, is "old Mr. Johnson," so honest that he is out of fashion—one of the pioneer Freethinkers of England, who loves to tell of Holyoake, Bradlaugh, and of others who antedated them, for Bradlaugh was but a youngster when Johnson knew of him, for he is seventy-three, and rheumatism is getting too tight a hold for his comfort. He mourns that he cannot attend our meetings, but the enjoyment of THE TRUTH SEEKER is still left to him. His family are all married and out West, and hav been brought up by their father to hav faith only in facts. He made the writer promis to see that no canting minister played the repentant-Infidel dodge over his bones, but that such remarks as comport with the life of a consistent Freethinker be made.

Mrs. M. J. Olds, of McMinnville, Or., is one of my activ correspondents, full of enthusiasm for Freethought, every letter containing some good, practical suggestions. Recently she wrote that "if we Liberals cannot succeed in raising money as well as the church, because we hav no hell to scare them with, can't we scare them by showing they will hav a hell here if they do not hold in check the powers that be?" Under date of December 21st she writes:

> I inclose you post-office order for $25 for the purpose of making my husband, A. R. Olds, a life-member of the American Secular Union. This is what old Santa is doing for him; only wish he would do the same for many others.
> Yours for the truth, M. J. OLDS.

Am sorry the certificate of life-membership will not even arrive with the new year, as I hav to get the names inscribed by a pen artist. He does the work in old English text, and they look well.

J. J. McCabe, of Albany, N. Y., is one who believes in freedom—emancipation, mental and physical—and labors zealously and intelligently to accomplish that desideratum. He writes:

> DEAR MR. STEVENS: Please find inclosed $5 to be applied to the Secular Union fund. The work which the Secular Union has undertaken ought to be continued under all circumstances, and I hope that the new administration may be more successful than any of its predecessors. I wish I were in a condition to contribute a larger amount.
> Yours truly, J. J. MCCABE.

Brother McCabe can be assured that we reëcho every desire he has expressed, and shall do what in us lies to realize them.

Notwithstanding recent severe reverses, Mrs. C. Palm, of Lawrence, Kan., incloses $2.50 for the Campaign Fund, with the regret that her residence here has grown "to be such a wicked place" that she never wants to return where they murder innocent men. Mrs. Palm is one of the few brave, intelligent, sympathetic women who comprehend the mission of Freethought.

I. P. Martin, of Princeton, Franklin Co., Kan., takes an annual passage, donates $1 to the Defense Fund, and the same amount to C. B. Reynolds and his tent, with the remark that orthodoxy prevented his being heard from sooner. He says:

> Allow me to congratulate you and all Freethinkers on your being made secretary. Had made great calculations of being with you at the convention, but, as I said before, was cruelly disappointed. Sincerely yours, I. P. MARTIN.

The contributions of Messrs. Geo. N. Hill, O. H. Palmer, Mr. Smith, and Mrs. Kendall, sent by Brother Putnam, are already acknowledged, and certificates sent. May they feel proud in the future of the aid they hav given and the work it has helped accomplish.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

The Freethought University.

The Freethought University at Liberal, Mo., is an established fact. Under the most trying and adverse circumstances Prof. M. D. Leahy has conducted the university, and by his extraordinary tact, energy, and self-sacrifice made it self-sustaining.

With unbounded confidence in the onward march of the great cause of humanity; yet with a realizing sense of the herculean task before him, and warned of the unreliability of many who should be zealous in aiding him, with the glowing enthusiasm of his young manhood he threw himself into the breach—turned his back on the lucrativ positions offered him, and risked his fame and fortune on success in leading what at best was a dismally forlorn hope. And he has triumphed; gained victory, where even many of the best friends of the cause could only prophesy inevitable defeat. Without one dollar of endowment; with wretched, dilapidated, old, barn-like buildings; with the scantiest necessities, and those of the very poorest and meanest description; lacking many essentials, this young hero Leahy gathered around him talented, educated, and trustworthy assistants, to whom he imparted his own indomitable spirit of hope, zeal, and courage, and on September 6, 1886, the Freethought University was inaugurated.

Through dark clouds of discouragement, hissing sneers of distrust, jagged rocks of opposition, sandbanks of poverty, and the dispiriting calms of apathy resolutely has the young hero stood at the helm, steering the frail bark through every peril of its first two years' voyage, and has piloted her to the glad haven of safety.

Prof. M. D. Leahy has done what has never before been accomplished, he has inaugurated and successfully conducted a university for two years, and made it from the start self-sustaining.

The institution began with thirteen students, and during the first year enrolled thirty-six. The second year is still better, and will reach fifty. The orations of the sophomore class at commencement, June 30, 1887, evinced deep study and ability unsurpassed by any commencement exercises of any college in the United States.

Prof. M. D. Leahy and his able assistants not alone win the confidence and respect, but the dear affection of the students. Prof. Leahy possesses the most happy faculty of imparting to each of the students his own spirit of ambition to conquer every difficulty and to excel in whatever they attempt. I was greatly pleased with the classes at my recent visit. The students did not simply recite the words of the lesson-book, nor listen to prosy lectures of old fossil professors. The students each and all discussed the lesson, defended their own opinions, spurred on, excited to redoubled efforts by the occasional suggestions or apt questions of the professor; and when unity was not reached or false ideas gained ascendency, the professor, by a question or a diagram on the blackboard, caused all to at once detect the error or sophism. Thus the facts were indelibly impressed on every mind. Such disciplin is invaluable. The professors act only as guides, directors; the students themselvs dig out the facts, thus giving intense interest to every study, all learning from each other. Glorious, untrammeled exercise of Freethought!

Shall the Freethought University receive such prompt, generous aid and encouragement as will enable it to accomplish its most grand and glorious mission? Shall we hav an Infidel college fully in accord with the spirit of advanced civilization, that shall furnish the students the best possible conditions for development of Freethought, the only true basis of mental development; a university where all systems, creeds, and isms shall be studied from a strictly neutral standpoint, and a spirit of perfect independence encouraged in all lovers of truth? Do we need a university that shall each year giv to our ranks young men and women of cultured intelligence, thoroughly disciplined minds, in strong, healthy bodies, who shall go forth as exponents of the ennobling principles of Liberalism—scholarly, able, efficient lecturers who shall demolish the creeds, expose the sophisms, and defeat the subtle wiles of priestcraft; able lecturers to fill the places and carry on the work of those who, like myself, are in the sere and yellow leaf, and so soon must cease to be? We do not wish to hav the university sustained or run solely by millionaires. Grateful for the help of all, we should all, each and every genuin Liberal of the United States and Canada, hav part in this enterprise. Let each and all do all they can in its behalf. Shares in the Freethought University are only $1 each. Let all contribute as their means will permit. Send by registered letter or post-office order addressed, George Baldwin, Liberal, Barton county, Mo., and shares will be sent by return mail.

The Freethought University owns about seventy acres of land at Liberal, the finest site of southwest Missouri. There is abundance of most desirable, handsome building-stone in the vicinity. The stone will be got out this winter, and the erection of the building (at least of a center, with wings to be added as means are furnished) will be commenced at earliest possible date in the spring. Having become a shareholder, then use every influence to induce parents of children, who hav completed study and evinced ability at public school, to send them to the university to complete their education. Send for catalogs, and keep some on hand for distribution.

Let the ladies of every local Liberal society form a "Woman's Educational Society," solicit contributions, get up festivals, suppers, dances, and excursions, and devote the proceeds to paying the tuition at the Freethought University of able, deserving youths whose parents are unable to bear the expense.

The success of the institution is beyond all peradventure. The question is, Shall all genuin Liberals take activ interest and expedite its reaching that condition of usefulness that shall enable Liberals with commendable pride to call attention to our Freethought University—thorough, practical, progressiv, and liberal—the only institution of learning absolutely free from superstition? C. B. Reynolds.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Verona, Mo., Dec. 14th.—Dr. Z. C. Denney, of Mt. Vernon, is the war-horse of Lawrence county. Generous-hearted, affable, and jolly, a physician of skill and great ability, he has won the kind regard and respect of all sorts of people despite his being a "dreadful Infidel." He arranged for me to lecture at Verona, Mt. Vernon, and Phelps.

Colonel Miller and his stalwart sons comprise about all the enterprise of Verona. A Disciple revival was in full blast, but the popularity of Colonel Miller secured me a hall full of attentiv listeners. I had some conversation with one of the converts of the revival, whom I found in his shop reading the New Testament to his companions. I offered to giv him $25 for his minister to distribute among the poor and destitute of the place if he, or his, or any minister, or other person, could find even a piece of a verse in Old or New Testament that taught or demanded observance of Sunday as the Sabbath. I also offered to giv him $1 if his minister would be present at the lecture that evening and publicly declare, while looking me in the face, that he really believed in a literal, burning hell. How the poor fellow and his brother-converts did enthuse! They were all quite sure of earning that $26. "Why, there were dozens of texts teaching Sunday-keeping! Their minister was an awful smart man—knew the Bible backwards." And away they started in pursuit of their minister, pledging to hav texts and minister at the hall. They felt as sure of success as they did of the existence of their God. But, alas! the parson was obdurate. He could not giv them the desired texts, and would not accompany them to the hall. But he did warn them to keep off the devil's ground, and if they did not want to lose their poor souls not to go near or venture to listen to that "vile, dangerous man." I was sorry his reverence failed to appear at the hall, but I incline to the impression the lecture afforded texts and conundrums enough to check the revival, and keep the poor parson on the ragged edge of despair all winter, vainly striving to reconcile the irreconcilable, and make his doctrin and his Bible harmonize.

Mt. Vernon, Mo., Dec. 15th, 16th.—In the morning I took stage for Mt. Vernon, and found the "sunny South" a delusion and a mockery; suffered severely from cold. It snowed, and blowed, and chilled me through, but the glad greeting of Dr. Denney and warm hospitality of Percy Gaither, of the hotel, soon restored my circulation and equanimity. Percy Gaither is a young man of great natural ability, and a devoted, energetic Liberal. If he could be induced to cultivate his ability as a caricaturist, he would soon rival our favorit, Watson Heston. The whole family of the Gaithers are natural musicians. The sisters, thanks to the lectures, are now in full harmony with their stanch Liberal brothers, leaving the dear old mother alone in her very mild Christian predilection.

Mt. Vernon is a rabid local option town. I was, therefore, more annoyed than surprised to find so much of drunkenness. Some half-dozen boys between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years, and one young man of about twenty-five, were insanely drunk on the evening of my first lecture. The young man at first amused himself, and the poor, drunken Sunday-school boys (I learned they were all children of devoutly pious parents and regular attendants at Sunday-school and church), by standing in the road during the early part of my lecture, repeatedly firing off his revolver at the hall windows; growing tired of this, admission being free, they came up into the hall, and soon became so noisy I had to request them to be silent or leave; finally, finding all appeals in vain, I descended from the rostrum myself to eject them, but the sheriff assured me he would remove them, which, after a little delay, he succeeded in doing. The drunken young man was the son of a very wealthy and devoutly pious widow, and the sheriff lacked backbone to arrest him, but coaxed him down-stairs, and the poor, half-crazed, drunken boys slunk out, and order was restored. There were some threats of terrible vengeance on me the next day, but the Christians themselvs were ashamed and apologized. It seems the boys had purchased pint-bottles of common alcohol at the drug-store and thus became wildly drunk. There was large attendance, with a good number of ladies, and perfect order, the next night. On Saturday, December 16th, Dr. Denney took me over to Phelps, Mo., for one lecture; had large audience, and much of real interest evinced. Sold considerable Liberal literature. Here I met S. P. Wood, of Red Oak, a most earnest, hard-working Liberal. On Sunday morning I accompanied him to Fairview, about two miles and a half from Red Oak, for it appears the Christians were too subtle for friend Wood, and defeated all his endeavors to secure hall or school-house in the village, basely violating their promises, ignoring their pledges. Wood foolishly had some trust that even a most pious Christian would keep his pledged word. But he has bought them cheap enough. He knows them now, and just what their promises amount to.

I delivered three lectures at the school-house in John Blain's neighborhood. A very intelligent Liberal, sound to the core, a deep thinker, and good conversationalist is John Blain, and I greatly enjoyed my visit at his kind, hospitable home. The attendance on Sunday afternoon and evening was surprisingly large, considering that all had to come from considerable distance. Monday evening a severe blizzard set in—snow and rain, fierce wind and dense darkness, roads horrid—consequently attendance slim; yet even here, under adverse circumstances, I had evidence that the effort was not in vain. Not alone did some weakly ones become strengthened, so as to dare declare their convictions, but many were induced to think, to read, to investigate. I was much pleased to meet J. H. Dishler, of Bower's Mills, a fearless, honest-hearted, open-handed Liberal, whose word is ever good as his bond. What a contrast to some Christians of Red Oak!

Early Tuesday morning I started on a fourteen miles' journey in open stage. A blizzard was raging, and the thermometer declared it to be several degrees below zero. This trip made me fully appreciate the delights of coming south, and thus escaping the severe cold and storms of western New York. How I reveled in the balmy zephyrs of the ever genial sunny south! When I reached the railroad, and once more saw the ties and rails, I could hav shouted with delight, only my mustache was frozen to my coat collar. The once considered discordant shriek of the locomotiv was most sweet melody, and certainly was a most soothing lullaby compared to the howling of the marrow-freezing wind roaring over the dismal, barren prairie.

December 21st.—En route via railroad to Galena, Kan. I am not yet certain how many weeks I shall remain in Utah. I shall reach there February 18th, and make but very few stops in Nevada (applications for lectures in Nevada should, to insure attention, be made at once; address me care of Truth Seeker office); thence to California, down to San Diego; then return via the Pacific coast, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Canada, home. C. B. Reynolds.

The Fanaticism of Temperance.

The Temperance Christian Alliance fanatics hav held some three or four meetings in this city at one of the Presbyterian churches, elected officers, and resolved that Uncle Sam should, with a club in his hand big enough to smash things generally, stop the running of all railway trains and the carrying of the mails on Sunday, the opening of the post-offices, the publication of newspapers, the sale of them by the poor little newsboys, and the reading of them on Sundays, the priests' grasshopper day.

The rascally fellows are worse than the Anarchists. They hav no regard for the feelings, privileges, and rights of others. They are not satisfied with the same privileges that all hav of argument and persuasion, but demand harsh laws by which they can worry by fines and imprisonment all those whom they cannot deter by fear.

They do not seem to gain any knowledge by the experience of the past. This matter of attempting to convince by force has repeatedly failed, yet is again as blindly called for by those who are unwilling to use argument and await the results of education.

Truth never fears argument, investigation. It is the fanatic who meets logic with a club.

These Sunday fanatics tear their hair and predict dire calamities on account of what they term Sabbath desecration by the saloon men and baseball players. They blubber and cry, because people prefer and do go to the saloons, attend picnics and baseball grounds, on Sundays instead of going to the cowards' castles where those hirelings do all the talking, blaspheme the universe, libel the memories of the dead humanitarians and patriots, and slander the living women and men, whose shoes they are not worthy to polish. These everlasting priestly beggars stated in their meeting that the baseball playing must be stopped on Sundays, because it was drawing more people away from the churches than the saloons!

Is it possible that a baseball club of nine is more powerful than the Christian's God? If the priests tell the truth, it is. But herein lies their inconsistency, unfairness, and fraudulent pretensions and barefaced hypocrisy. They base their action on the impiety and great sin, crime, of Sabbath-breaking, when it is a well-known fact that these hypocritical grasshoppers violate the Sunday laws more persistently than any other profession or class of people in the state and nation.

It is well known to everyone that every one of them works for salary, hire, wages, every Sunday in the year, unless sick or off on a frolic. The Sundays are thrown into confusion in the mornings, afternoons, and evenings by the discordant jamming and clanging of their miserable old bells. Then the hired men clean up horses and carriages and drive the "unco guid" down to the workshops and remain outside in the cold, rain, or heat, as it may be, with the poor horses' noses drawn up higher in the air in an unnatural and painful position, while the organ-grinder, the musician, and choir and priest all work at the various parts assigned them for pay, for thus much gold—all on hired, stated salaries. All of them, under an honest, just, equitable construction of these statutes, are violators of the laws of the land and are criminally guilty, and should be proceeded against and punished to the full extent of the law. They prate so much and so glibly about the majesty and enforcement of the laws—let them be brought into court as defendants, convicted, fined, and imprisoned, and then see how much they would love and extol these infamous Sunday laws. It will be tried on sooner than they anticipate. P. V. Wise.

The Mauvaises Terres.

'Mid the curling grasses' woven tangle
Where the flowing mists are softly blue,
Our tents awake in a starry spangle
And the morning dreams are coming true.
Hark! the noisy call of prairie chickens,
A thrumming song of the lower lines,
And the stir of wings the red blood quickens
Are gray-white geese from a land of pines.

A broken wave from a far-off summer
Where lilies be not white lies that seem
They caught the song of a silver hammer
Whose golden nail was a waking dream.
Along the land to the western ocean
A swath of steel on the mountains laid;
The drifting tide is a pulsing motion,
And the mad world leaps a fleet decade.

Here the buffalo and deer scarce linger
And the tattered teepee hurrying on,
The mauvaises terres bide the clangor,
Amid faded ruins lost and lone.
The powdered sands of the ages glisten
Where a sea once sang a joyful strain;
Now only winds in the canyons listen,
Only echoes of the waves remain—

Echoes that wail around wasting columns
That mark the buried centuries there,
And gray rocks leave their lettered volumes
Through the under-world all strangely fair;
And the dead yet wait in halls of splendor,
And bones are wrapped in a marble guise,
'Till the men of earth, with passion tender,
Unveil the dusk of the closéd eyes.

'Neath the dim arcades, in beauty sleeping,
Are glittering woodlands pale and dead,
And song is hushed, and the branches keeping
Their tryst, though the summer gladness fled.
A crystal sheen on the frosty arches,
And the iridescent pendant leaves,
In a wonderland of mournful marches,
Where death laid down his shimmering sheaves.

Here the mighty ages' brooding slumbers
Wrought icy chains on the summer hours,
And a haunting siren sang her numbers
O'er the whispering grass and summer flowers.
Unknown abodes! what spectral regions
Thrill their "lost chords" on these silent lands,
Where a cold enchantress sways her legions
With a scepter in her dead white hands!

A Story of Real Folks.

Preface to "For Her Daily Bread."

I hav read this story, this fragment of a life mingled with fragments of other lives, and hav been pleased, interested, and instructed. It is filled with the pathos of truth, and has in it the humor that accompanies actual experience. It has but little to do with the world of imagination; certain feelings are not attributed to persons born of fancy, but it is the history of a heart and brain interested in the common things of life. There are no kings, no lords, no titled ladies, but there are real people, the people of the shop and street whom every reader knows, and there are lines intense and beautiful, and scenes that touch the heart. You will find no theories of government, no hazy outlines of reform, nothing but facts and folks as they hav been, as they are, and probably will be for many centuries to come. If you read this book you will be convinced that men and women are good or bad, charitable or heartless, by reason of something within, and not by virtue of any name they bear, of any trade or profession they follow, or of any creed they may accept. You will also find that men sometimes are honest and mean; that women may be very virtuous and very cruel; that good, generous, and sympathetic men are often disreputable, and that some exceedingly worthy citizens are extremely mean and uncomfortable neighbors.

It takes a great deal of genius and a good deal of self-denial to be very bad or to be very good. Few people understand the amount of energy, industry, and self-denial it requires to be consistently vicious. People who hav a pride in being good and fail, and those who hav a pride in being bad and fail, in order to make their records consistent generally rely upon hypocrisy. The people that liv, and hope, and fear in this book are much like the people who liv, and hope, and fear in the actual world. The professor is much like the professor in the ordinary college. You will find the conscientious, half-paid teacher, the hopeful poor, the anxious rich, the true lover, the stingy philanthropist, who cares for people only in the aggregate, the individual atom being too small to attract his notice or to enlist his heart; the sympathetic man who loves himself, and givs, not for the sake of the beggar, but for the sake of getting rid of the beggar, and you will also find the man generous to a fault—with the money of others. And the reader will find these people described naturally, truthfully, and without exaggeration, and he will feel certain that all these people hav really lived.

The reader of this story will get some idea as to what is encountered by a girl in an honest effort to gain her daily bread. He will find how steep, how devious, and how difficult is the path she treads.

There are so few occupations open to woman, so few things in which she can hope for independence, that to be thrown upon her own resources is almost equivalent to being cast away. Besides, she is an object of continual suspicion, watched not only by men but by women. If she does anything that other women are not doing she is at once suspected, her reputation is touched, and other women, for fear of being stained themselvs, withdraw not only the hand of help but the smile of recognition. A young woman cannot defend herself without telling the charge that has been made against her. This, of itself, givs a kind of currency to slander. To speak of the suspicion that has crawled across her path is to plant the seeds of doubt in other minds; to even deny it admits that it exists. To be suspected, that is enough. There is no way of destroying this suspicion. There is no court in which suspicions are tried; no juries that can render verdicts of not guilty. Most women are driven at last to the needle, and this does not allow them to liv; it simply keeps them from dying.

It is hard to appreciate the dangers and difficulties that lie in wait for woman. Even in this Christian country of ours no girl is safe in the streets of any city after the sun has gone down. After all, the sun is the only god that has ever protected woman. In the darkness she has been the prey of the wild beast in man.

Nearly all charitable people, so called, imagin that nothing is easier than to obtain work. They really feel that anybody, no matter what his circumstances may be, can get work enough to do if he is only willing to do the work. They cannot understand why any healthy human being should lack food or clothes. Meeting the unfortunate and the wretched in the streets of the great city they ask them, in a kind of wondering way, why they do not go to the West, why they do not cultivate the soil, and why they are so foolish, stupid, and reckless as to remain in the town. It would be just as sensible to ask a beggar why he does not start a bank, or a line of steamships, as to ask him why he does not cultivate the soil, or why he does not go to the West. The man has no money to pay his fare, and if his fare were paid he would be, when he landed in the West, in precisely the same condition as he was when he left the East. Societies, and institutions, and individuals supply the immediate wants of the hungry and the ragged, but they afford only the relief of the moment.

Articles by the thousand hav been written for the purpose of showing that women should become servants in houses, and the writers of these articles are filled with astonishment that any girl should hesitate to enter domestic service. They tell us that nearly every family needs a good cook, a good chambermaid, a good sweeper of floors and washer of dishes, a good stout girl to carry the baby and draw the wagon, and these good people express the greatest astonishment that all girls are not anxious to become domestics. They tell them that they will be supplied with good food, that they will hav comfortable beds and warm clothing, and they ask, "What more do you want?" These people hav not, however, solved the problem. If girls as a rule keep away from kitchens and chambers, if they hate to be controled by other women, there must be a reason. When we see a young woman prefer a clerkship in a store, a business which keeps her upon her feet all day, and sends her to her lonely room filled with weariness and despair, and when we see other girls who are willing to sew for a few cents a day rather than become the maid of "my lady," there must be some reason, and this reason must be deemed sufficient by the persons who are actuated by it. What is it?

Every human being imagins that the future has something in store for him. It is natural to build these castles in Spain. It is natural for a girl to dream of being loved by the noble, by the superb, and it is natural for the young man to dream of success, of a home, of a good, a beautiful, and loving wife. These dreams are the solace of poverty; they keep back the tears in the eyes of the young and hungry. To engage in any labor that degrades, in any work that leaves a stain, in any business the mention of which is liable to redden the cheek, seems to be a destruction of the foundation of hope, a destruction of the future; it seems to be a crucifixion of his or her better self. It assassinates the ideal.

It may be said that labor is noble, that work is a kind of religion, and whoever says this tells the truth. But after all, what has the truth to do with this question? What is the opinion of society? what is the result? It cures no wound to say that it was wrongfully inflicted. The opinion of sensible people is one way, the action of society is inconsistent with that opinion. Domestic servants are treated as though their employment was and is a degradation. Bankers, merchants, professional men, ministers of the gospel, do not want their sons to become the husbands of chambermaids and cooks. Small hands are beautiful, they do not tell of labor.

I hav given one reason; there is another. The work of a domestic is never done. She is liable to be called at any moment, day or night. She has no time that she can call her own. A woman who works by the piece can take a little rest; if she is clerk she has certain hours of labor, and the rest of the day is her own.

And there is still another reason that I almost hate to giv, and that is this: As a rule, woman is exacting with woman. As a rule, woman does not treat woman as well as man treats man, or as well as man treats woman. There are many other reasons, but I hav given enough.

For many years women hav been seeking employment other than that of domestic service. They hav so hated this occupation that they hav sought in every possible direction for other ways to win their bread. At last hundreds of employments are open to them, and, as a consequence domestic servants are those who can get nothing else to do.

In the olden time servants sat at the table with the family; they were treated something like human beings, harshly enough to be sure, but in many cases almost as equals. Now the kitchen is far away from the parlor. It is another world, occupied by individuals of a different race. There is no bond of sympathy—no common ground. This is especially true in a republic. In the Old World, people occupying menial places account for their positions by calling attention to the laws—to the hereditary nobility and the universal spirit of caste. Here there are no such excuses. All are supposed to hav equal opportunities, and those who are compelled to labor for their daily bread in avocations that require only bodily strength, are regarded as failures. It is this fact that stabs like a knife. And yet in the conclusion drawn there is but little truth. Some of the noblest and best pass their lives in daily drudgery and unremunerativ toil—while many of the mean, vicious, and stupid reach place and power.

This story is filled with sympathy for the destitute, for the struggling, and tends to keep the star of hope above the horizon of the unfortunate. After all, we know but little of the world, and hav but a faint conception of the burdens that are borne and of the courage and heroism displayed by the unregarded poor. Let the rich read these pages, they will hav a kinder feeling toward those who toil; let the workers read them, and they will think better of themselvs.

Free Trade and the Workingman.

There is an article under this title and signed, "A Briton," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 24th, stating that "the working class all over England is suffering starvation," etc. There is certainly much more pauperism there than here, but it is largely due to the burden of land monopoly, the large standing army, the established church, and the royal family. Much poverty is also caused in England, as well as America, by intemperance, indolence, and extravagance. What I wish especially to insist upon is that, according to impartial specialists, the British poor are about twice as well off as they were forty years ago. Wages rose 50 per cent on the average between 1833 and 1883, and there was a great fall in prices of clothing and rent, as well as of groceries and other articles of food. The number of depositors in savings banks was ten times as great in 1881 as in 1833. The population increased from about 16,000,000 in 1841 to about 26,000,000 in 1881. The number of paupers decreased from 1,119,528, in 1842, to 797,614, and that of criminals convicted, from 23,791 to 11,699. In other words, the number of paupers was more than twice as great, in proportion to the population, at the time of the first important reduction in the tariff, as it was forty years later, and the number of criminals more than three times as great. The average income of men who had less than £150 a year was £53 in 1850, and £83 in 1880; and between these two dates the number of taxpayers, with incomes between £150 and £300 per year, quadrupled, while the whole population increased but 33 per cent. These facts should be kept in mind to offset all vague assertions that the poor are growing poorer in England or anywhere else, or that any harm has been done to Great Britain, or any other country, by any reduction of tariffs.

The benefits to British commerce and manufactures of the repeal of protection forty years ago hav been so great that there has been no attempt in all that time of any importance to rebuild the fallen barriers. The British protectionists are so few and weak that they do not even dare to call themselvs by their real names, but disguise their sentiments under the title of fair traders. There is much less hostility to them among the Conservativs than among the Liberals; but all the recent victories of their friends hav not given them courage enough to make any show in Parliament. In fact, they are of no more importance in British politics than those dudes are in American politics who want to turn our republic into a monarchy and themselvs into a peerage. There is about as much chance of England's going back to hand-looms and stage-coaches as of her going back to protectiv tariffs. I only wish that our workingmen understood their own interest as well as hers do.

As regards this point, I wish to giv a few statistics to meet some statements in an article recently sent me by the author, a workingman in Cleveland, O., Mr. George F. Moore, who shows such a laudable desire to hav the question discussed fairly and intelligently that it is a great pleasure to reply to him. He speaks "of the utter stagnation of business under free trade leading which occurred at three different periods in this country." Perhaps the first of these periods, in his opinion, is that preceding the first establishment of our tariff in 1789. But at that time there was so little need of protection that the average rate of duties was fixed at less than one-fifth of what it is at present. In 1824 Daniel Webster spoke in Congress in opposition to the protectionists and in conformity with resolutions passed four years previously by Abbot Lawrence and other leading Bostonians in Faneuil Hall, thus: "There is a country, not undistinguished among the nations, in which the progress of manufactures has been far more rapid than in any other, and yet unaided by prohibitions or unnatural restrictions. That country, the happiest which the sun shines on, is our own." As there were high tariffs from 1824 to 1863, there was, at all events, no injury done by free trade to American manufacturers before the latter date.

Mr. Moore's second period I suppose to be that of the gradual reductions between 1833 and 1842. One-tenth of every excess of duties above twenty per cent was taken off annually until 1841, when it was three-tenths; while the free list included coarse wool, linens, silks, worsteds, copper, indigo, fruits, nuts, and other useful articles now taxed.

Our condition in 1834, 1835, and 1836 was carefully observed by three visitors from Europe, Harriet Martineau, Michel Chevalier, who thus began a great work for the railroads of France, and Dr. N. H. Julius, who was already distinguished as a champion of prison reform in Germany. Miss Martineau, who was with us from September, 1834, to August, 1836, and met most of our leading men, says in "Society in America" that the advantage of free trade "is now very generally acknowledged," and that "there is in America a smaller amount of crime, poverty, and mutual injury of every kind than has ever been known in any society." Chevalier was here from the beginning of 1834 until late in 1835, and his first letters speak of "the aspect of universal prosperity."

"While all European society is gangrened with pauperism, there is none here, at least in the North." "Nothing is easier than to liv by labor and liv well." In New York every day seemed a Sunday, because all the men wore warm overcoats, and all the women were dressed in the latest French fashions. The physical welfare of women was a characteristic of the United States; and in Lowell he found the factory girls still laying up money, despite a slight check to its prosperity from the new tariff. He found no proletariat in the Northern states, which he calls the laborer's "pays de bénédiction." Dr. Julius came over with Miss Martineau, and found only "solitary and transitory" cases of pauperism. His elaborate work quotes with full approval the remark published by Fanny Kemble in 1832, "There are no poor. I say that there are none; there need be none. . . . None need be born to vice, for none are condemned to abject poverty." An abler observer than any of these, the great geologist Lyell, noticed just before the end of gradual reduction "such entire absence of want and poverty." "We hav met with no beggars, witnessed no signs of want, but seen everywhere the most unequivocal proofs of prosperity and rapid progress." The traveler who visits Lowell might "go away with the idea that he had been seeing a set of gentlemen and ladies playing at factory for their own amusement."

The population of Lowell increased from 17,370 in 1836 to 20,796 in 1840; and in the latter year the factory girls showed how elevated their condition was, in every respect, by beginning to publish the Lowell Offering. The number of cotton factories in the United States rose from 795 in 1831 to 1.240 in 1840; the amount of cloth made from 230,461,990 yards to 398,507.568, and the capital invested from $40,614,984 to $51,102.359. Our exports of manufactures are valued at $5,086,890 for 1831 and $9,872,900 for 1840. The production of pig iron was nearly five times as great in 1842 as in 1830 in Pennsylvania; and the population of Pittsburgh rose from 16,988 in 1830 to 38,931 in 1840, about one-third of this gain having been made since 1836. More than seven times as many miles of railroads were in use in 1842 as in 1833; and the increase has never ceased since the first construction in 1827. The surplus revenue became so great that $30,000,000 were given, in 1837, to the several states. Our national prosperity was really greater than ever, despite transitory panics.

The third period of "business under free trade leading" is that from 1846, when rates were lowered almost to one-half of the present average, to 1861. There was a second reduction in 1857, in which year a book was published called, "Pittsburgh As It Is," and stating that "skilled labor in all the branches of manufacturing carried on in this city finds ready employment."

The protectionist historian of our manufactures, Bishop, acknowledges their "wonderful expansion" between 1840 and 1860 "in spite of temporary checks and adverse legislation." Between 1850 and 1860 our percentage of increase of population was less than 36; but that of our operativs was more than 46, or 10 per cent more rapid; and one-third of our people depended for support on manufacturing in 1860. The annual value of factory products increased, as Bishop admits, fully 86 per cent in these ten years, or more than twice as fast as the population. Our general wealth increased nearly four times as fast according to the census; and we sold nearly four times as many dollars' worth of manufactured goods to foreign customers in 1860 as in 1847.

Thus, experience teaches that neither a gradual nor a sudden reduction of duties, nor an addition to the number of free raw materials, is likely to destroy our manufactures, which could, in the opinion of many leading men engaged therein, be benefited in no way more surely than by letting wool and other supplies for our factories come as free of duty as they did in the prosperous periods we hav been looking at. What could be better for workingmen than to hav the employer enabled to enlarge his market and export his goods? But this is precisely what he is now kept from doing by the artificially high prices which our tariff forces him to keep up.

F. M. HOLLAND.

My Home Town—Monte Vista, Col.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My old friend Powell undertakes to correct me in my statement that there are not many Liberals in San Luis Park, and before he wrote a dozen lines agreed with me. He says (Nov. 19th), "Like most other places where there hav been no Liberal lectures, full-fledged and outspoken Liberals are scarce." That is just what I said. When I was asked the question, I answered truly, without stopping to explain why they are "scarce." As I hav spent most of my life traveling, and mingling with Liberals, it does not take me long to find whether they are "almost as thick as jack-rabbits" or "scarce" as hen's teeth. I did not intimate that there are no Liberals.

As to friend Powell himself, a more outspoken, fearless Liberal does not exist. The church hates him because he is an uncompromising foe to priestcraft, cant, hypocrisy in all its forms. His sons are "chips of the old block." Nicholas and Millard, quiet business men, are earnest workers in our cause; and their young wives are their willing helpers, fearing not the church's frown, which is just "awfully awful" in Monte Vista town.

Well, under Brother Powell's management, I had the honor of giving the first course of Freethought lectures in the history of the village; six in all, night after night, and one on Sunday afternoon. To say that the prim, puritanic little town was "shocked," is drawing the picture with a subdued, dim, religous light. It was horrified, scandalized, scared. As the little wife and self drove into the burg, one of Christ's shepherds was driving out. It was only a coincidence. No harm done. He left his curses. He told friend Powell that he had "no use for me," and supposed I had not for him. Although he is my neighbor, his farm being near mine, I never entertained one unkind thought toward him. Of course, he is a Methodist minister. That is his misfortune. It makes him distrustful of an "Infidel lecturer" who settled in the Park and attended strictly to his own business the livelong summer through, and then concluded to "preach" some himself. But the parson was free to confess that a man who teaches such doctrins as I do must be a very bad man.

The sweet, sisterly saints of this sanctified town went about advising the people to keep away from "those Infidel lectures." The clergyman who remained, the "home guard," visited business men and admonished. How strikingly this conduct calls to mind the good old colonial days, two hundred years ago, when, a lecturer of whom the Puritan preacher did not approve appearing in a New England town, the holy man would walk up one side of the street and down the other, cautioning all to remain away from the lecture of the imp of Satan! And not one dared to disobey. Monte Vista is almost like that. It is, oh, such a godly town! It prides itself upon being as totally abstinent as the Infidel town of Liberal, Mo. I am still studying the question, Why is a person who mixes total abstinence with religion always a bigot? I admit that I never knew an exception.

Monte Vista, however, so devout, believing in the Bible injunction, "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish," keeps the "medicin" in her drug stores. At least, one of her citizens publicly twitted her assembled people with the unwholesome fact, and not one had the hardihood to deny it. Yet in this pretty mountain villa there are four preachers quartered on the one hundred families. They are expected to support these four lazy leeches, with the exception of a little help from Eastern churches. Monte Vista has a heavy load to carry—literally "infested" with preachers. And yet the farce goes on in these Western towns that building churches will build the town and make its people moral. To this end vapid Liberals will contribute. They will promis my friend Powell to attend Liberal lectures, and never appear. But this unflinching Infidel, like a Revolutionary hero, never quailed. He has the courage of his convictions. With the help of such as Mr. Manson, a square-headed Freethinker, our lectures were made financially successful. Brave Liberals, like Nicholas Powell, doubled their "V" subscriptions. In point of attendance the success was not brilliant. The churches united on Sunday at the same hours our lectures were appointed, although in the summer they were quarreling over cash receipts. Blessed Liberalism, how it does make Christians love one another!

W. F. JAMIESON.

Monte Vista, Col.

Around the Circle and Back to Henry George.

At the convention of the National Secular Union of 1886, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll delivered to that body an address in the course of which he remarked that the social questions which are facing the philosophers of the nineteenth century can be removed only as we grow more intelligent; that the world has not yet produced a mind great and grand enough to grapple with these questions of the hour, and that, consequently, by education only may we hope to solve the problem and rescue the millions from misery. When I say that I agree with him, I do not wish the reader to understand me as attempting to draw myself to a level with Colonel Ingersoll's intellectual hight, for many as humble a man as I has agreed with that eminent gentleman on hundreds of occasions.

I do not believe that there are many that would take exception to Mr. Ingersoll's statement, and, accepting that education is our only salvation, it would seem to me as the duty of mankind to at once set about and supply the lacking intelligence. When Mr. Ingersoll referred to education, I assume that he spoke of it in its broadest sense, and education, in the broadest sense of the word, is what we should set out to procure. The object of this paper is to giv an outline of what should constitute this education.

The placing of an effectual restraint upon the spread and growth of sexual vices appears to the writer the most important. Men and women by the hundreds and thousands, at the age when they should be in the prime of life, are physical wrecks, unfit for the marriage state; but, though unfit as they are, no intelligent hand warns them that their offspring will be a generation of weaklings; others, ere the age of twenty or twenty-five, find themselvs without the energy and self-possession adequate to carry them to the end of their miserable existence; and many a mother's pride has reached womanhood only to find that her life had been dashed against the fatal rocks of sexual vice to be a physical and moral wreck, who ekes out a living by the sale of virtue and honor, and thus has an existence to which slavery holds no comparison. Education on the laws of nature should be provided to prevent the spread of sexual vice; the mysteries of our physical structure should be imparted to the young, so that they may know when they are violating nature's laws. We would see the fruit of our endeavors in the second and third generations. The teaching of a good moral code should also not be neglected in this connection.

Over-indulgence in liquor has an alleged remedy in Prohibition. This alleged remedy, aside from what effect it may hav (and the good character of its effect is very questionable, to say the least), being an encroachment on personal liberty, and thus being ruled out, education is left to solve the problem. The pupil should be taught chemistry, that he may know what he forces down his throat in after years; also, be made acquainted with temperance and moderation.

In the matter of sanitation, it should be impressed upon the youthful mind that the time-worn proverb, "Cleanliness is next to godliness," is all wrong; cleanliness is next to nothing—it should be always first. The young should be introduced, at an early age, to the fact that in the neglect of sanitation alone many a disease has its origin. The maxim, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," applies nowhere better than here.

Our libraries should contain all the advanced ideas on marriage. Books treating on this subject in all its bearings should be within the reach of all young people of both sexes.

Gymnasiums should be established in connection with all schools, as they are with colleges. A course or two of calisthenics should belong to the exercises of a school-room. When gymnasiums are half as numerous—aye, one-tenth as numerous—as the saloon is to-day, we will be able to boast of a race not unlike that of the ancient Greeks, instead of a race of consumptiv and dyspeptic weaklings. Developed muscles will make our men brave and strong; our women healthy, and better able to face the winds and storms of life.

One great obstacle in our larger cities to bringing about what I hav above suggested is poverty. "There is land enough to provide work enough to produce enough so that all may eat enough; and yet, with all these 'enoughs,' why is it that there are thousands who do not know to-day if they will eat to-morrow?" So I heard a local philosopher discourse to me the other day. It is my firm and settled opinion that Henry George can answer the query. And, without further argument, assuming that Henry George has the key that opens the gates to prosperity, let us thank him for it. And, with prosperity assured to all, and an education such as I hav above attempted to describe, a heaven would not be a more peaceful and happier spot to reside in than here.

HERMAN TIEDJENS.

Jefferson and Small.

From the Independent Pulpit.

During the Prohibition campaign last summer, Dr. B. H. Carroll endeavored to make the impression that Dr. William Small, of William and Mary College, was a preacher. In his Corsicana speech, Dr. Carroll made Jefferson say that "to this preacher" he owed the destinies of his life. In Jefferson's autobiography mention is made of two preachers, but it is not said that Small was one. The liberty taken by Dr. Carroll was rebuked by an editorial in the Waco Examiner, and Mr. William Edmonds had his (Carroll's) attention called to it privately by a mutual friend, but the wily preacher took no notice of it.

Intent on finding out the truth, Mr. Edmonds wrote to Governor Lee, with the following result:

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
RICHMOND, VA., Sept. 26, 1887.

WILLIAM EDMONDS, ESQ., Waco, Texas, Dear Sir: The governor directs me to say, in reply to your letter of inquiry of August 26th, that, from the best information he can get, he is satisfied that Dr. Small was either an M.D., or scientist, which would entitle him to the degree of doctor.

Mr. Jefferson was a Freethinker, and, as there is no record of Dr. Small ever having a church in Virginia, the natural conclusion is that the Dr. Small was of the same belief. John Randolph claims to hav imbibed some of his skeptical ideas from a Dr. Small.

Yours very truly,
J. E. WALLER, Secretary.

It seems as if the preachers are going to canonize Jefferson in spite of history. Nothing shows the weakness of their cause more than this disposition to bolster it up with the names of illustrious men.

When the Christian Church Made the Laws.

WHEN Mathew Hopkins was witchfinder-general of England, about the middle of the seventeenth century, he hanged many hundreds for witchcraft, and got twenty shillings per head. As an example of the usual lack of reason in the mind of the Christian we quote: "When other evidences of guilt were wanting, Hopkins adopted the trial by water, which had been suggested by King James I., who said that, 'As some persons hav renounced their baptism by water, so water refuses to receive them.' Those accused of diabolical practices were thrown into a pond. If they floated or swam they were guilty, and were taken out and burnt or hanged. If they were innocent, they sunk and were only drowned." To be accused by the Christians meant death. "The old, the ignorant, and indigent—such as could neither plead their own cause, nor hire an advocate—were the wretched victims of credulity, avarice, and spleen."

Some of Colonel Ingersoll's Opinions.

A short time ago a happy call of business took THE TRUTH SEEKER Editor to the office of Colonel Ingersoll, and it occurred to us to imitate the local reporter and ask that gentleman some questions. We wanted to know what he thinks of a minister who could denounce a good and pure woman as a painted courtesan simply because she sang in operas; what he thinks of the six-million-dollar-cathedral scheme of the Episcopalians, by which they propose to advance "Christian unity;" what he thinks of "Christian charity" and "fatherhood of God" as an economic polity for abolishing poverty; what he thinks of the policy of the Roman Catholic church on school matters; what he thinks of the trial and execution of the Chicago Anarchists; how his health is, and in what light he regards the rash ministers and lecturers who are forever sending him "challenges" to debate.

It will be noticed that the questions cover a wide range, but they did not appal Colonel Ingersoll in the least. He answered every one, and Mr. I. N. Baker, his secretary, wrote the answers down in shorthand for the benefit of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and next week we shall print the interview.

Each one of the queries formed a text upon which Colonel Ingersoll preached a sermon in his happiest style, and we value ourself highly upon having been the "humble instrument," as the preachers say, through which English literature has been enriched. It is not likely that the Methodist minister of Nashville, nor his denomination, nor the gentlemen who busy themselvs "answering" the colonel, will appreciate our labor, but the rest of mankind will; and, after all, the people who are not Methodists and Presbyterians form the larger part of the world.

We wish every preacher in the country could read what Colonel Ingersoll says of the comparativ merits of the stage and the pulpit. We imagin they would be less conceited and less inclined to denounce their superiors, the actors and actresses.

The Blasphemy Trial.

The presses of Peter Eckler are at last at work upon Colonel Ingersoll's defense of C. B. Reynolds, indicted for blasphemy by the New Jersey authorities. The argument makes about one hundred pages of type, and the book will be sold in paper covers for 25 cents; in cloth binding for 50 cents. Those who heard the speech know its quality; to the millions who did not hear it, we may say that it is the greatest plea for liberty of speech of the century. Daniel Webster and the other great orators of the bar are simply nowhere. And that Jersey jury achieved an immortality of idiocy by convicting Mr. Reynolds after hearing it. We hope there are not twelve other men in the country who are their equals in dumbness.

This speech ought to be circulated in great numbers. For this purpose we will sell five copies for $1; and twelve copies for $2, paper covers.

Preserving Sunday.

The bigots hav broken loose again in this city. The president and secretary of the Architectural League hav been arrested for keeping the doors to their annual exhibition open on Sunday. The exhibition consists of original architectural designs of churches, towers, mansions, and country houses contributed by members, models of noted buildings, and pictures of famous English churches.

Besides the officers of this League, the bigots hav hauled into court the managers of a sacred concert, the managers of a wax-works exhibition, the exhibitors of Munkacsy's "Christ on Calvary" and Makart's "Five Senses," the proprietor of the Fleetwood park toboggan slide, and the managers of two Bowery museums, all charged with violations of the Sunday laws.

These arrests are at the instigation of a lot of Christians who desire to preserve the sacred character of the Lord's day, and to make it as interesting and enjoyable a period of time as it used to be in the days of the Massachusetts Puritans.

The Pay of Evangelists.

The Rev. Mr. Pentecost, professional soul-saver—otherwise known as an evangelist—rises to explain, in the Independent of last week, that he and his ilk do not "work for money," and are in fact but impecunious apostles, who go about doing good, depending on charity for their food and lodging. To the charges to the contrary, often made by ungodly journalists, Mr. Pentecost replies that it has been his policy to treat them with dignified silence. But he wishes to state now that, as a class, evangelists are a poorly recompensed body of men. And the Independent says: "Ministers do not get paid any too well, and we could tell a case in which an able evangelist, after more than a month's service in a small city, after grand work had been done, and the greatest gratification had been expressed, found that when he had deducted the necessary expenses he had to meet for traveling, hotel, and singing, he had left for himself only a dollar a day, out of which to support his family and carry him through the summer."

This may all be true. But it is not always the case. Only last week we received a letter from a correspondent in a Southern state, in which he incidentally alludes to a perambulating preacher who has been afflicting his section of the country. Our friend writes: "For two weeks' service in Charlotte, N. C., Rev. Mr. Pearson, evangelist, received $800 and free board for self and wife. In Salesbury, for two weeks, $560 and free board for self and wife. In Raleigh, for three weeks, $1,000 and free board for self and wife. In Concord, for one week, $225 and free board for self and wife." Our correspondent adds: "Saving souls is a profitable as well as pleasant and agreeable pastime. Can the evangelists find scripture for so avariciously taxing the credulous and defrauding poor women and children who are sufferers for food, raiment, and fuel?"

The American Nonconformist, published at Winfield, Kan., says that the "Rev. Wilson, evangelist, who has been dealing out the gospel in this city for some time past at the reasonable figure of $100 a week, and throwing in a good supply of slack for the city free gratis, was presented with a bill for $25 by the local authorities as license for selling books, and promptly cashed the same."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the Rev. Mr. Pentecost and his editorial apologist are either mistaken, or Messrs. Pearson and Wilson are exceptionally lucky evangelists. Which it is, is not for an unhallowed layman like THE TRUTH SEEKER Editor to say.

A Freethought Library for Metamora, O.

As an instance of the determined opposition of Christians to the spread of general intelligence, we may note the fight the Kahle family, of Metamora, O., aided by a Christian probate judge, is making to prevent the carrying out of the provision of Daniel Kahle's will which establishes a public secular and scientific library in Metamora.

Daniel Kahle was one of a large family, and, with the exception of a brother, the only one with a mind broad enough to reject the superstition of Christianity. For many years he has been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and on various occasions has engaged Liberal lecturers to talk to the people of Metamora. He was an energetic and enthusiastic Freethinker. By frugality and industry he gathered together a few thousand dollars, a part of which he desired to leave for the benefit of his town.

Mr. Kahle died last October, and his will was found to provide substantially for his sister, by leaving her his house and lot in Metamora; to his Freethinking brother tokens of esteem, and the residue to equip a secular and scientific library, the books to be selected by the Truth Seeker Company, and the library to be managed by the brother mentioned and Victor Burg, his friend. Mr. Burg is the postmaster of the little town, and a Freethinker. He owns a plot of ground next to the post-office, which he is willing to giv to build the library upon, and a gentleman living near has signified his willingness to erect the structure, thus leaving Mr. Kahle's bequest free to purchase books. Metamora is a small town, and the library will be a great benefit to it when opened, and ample for its present needs.

But Mr. Kahle's brothers and sisters do not desire the library. They would much rather hav the two or three hundred dollars each they would receive if the will could be broken and the property distributed as the law provides; and by promising the sister her house in any event, she engaged to keep quiet while the will was set aside. The Freethinking brother who was to help manage the library seems also to possess the itching palm of Judas, and he made no opposition to the proceedings of his family. When, therefore, the will was offered for probate, the whole Kahle family interfered and accused their deceased brother of having been crazy. They could introduce no evidence showing this, but the probate judge was equal to the occasion. A Mr. and Mrs. Sanderson were witnesses to the will, and of Mr. Sanderson the judge inquired:

Q. Were you intimately acquainted with Mr. Kahle? A. I was not intimately acquainted with him, but met him as often as once a month. I hav done business with and for him.

Q. Was he of sound mind and memory at the time of making this will? A. I do not think I am a competent judge of that matter. To every appearance at the time he was of sound mind; that is my belief.

Q. Will you say positivly that at the time of executing this will he was of sound mind and memory? A. I cannot now so say.

Q. Was he under any restraint? A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Had there not been undue influence? A. I do not know.

Mrs. Sanderson testified:

BY THE JUDGE: Q. Was Mr. Kahle of sound mind and memory at the time of making this will? A. I could not say as to that. I was not acquainted with him.

Q. Was he under restraint or influence to cause him to make a will of the peculiar provisions of this will? A. Not to my knowledge. I know nothing on this subject.

Q. Was he of lawful age? A. Yes.

That was all. Not a word of testimony to show that Mr. Kahle was crazy; no evidence that he had ever done or said anything peculiar; no proof that he was mentally deficient in any way. Yet the judge, Mr. L. W. Brown, filed this astounding decision:

"The court finds that the said will was duly executed and attested; that the testator was of lawful age, under no restraint, but from the evidence the court does not find that the testator was of sound mind and memory. The probate of said will is therefore refused, and said application dismissed, and costs of these proceedings ordered paid by administrator of deceased out of the estate of said deceased."

When the Kahle family had got so far in their charitable intention to the memory of their dead brother, we were notified of the proceedings. Previous to this we had no knowledge of Mr. Kahle's design to found a library. By the terms of the will choosing the Truth Seeker Company to select the books we are made a party in interest, along with Victor Burg and the Freethinking brother who is to assist in the management of the library. But as this brother prefers a few dollars in his pocket to a library in his town, Mr. Burg and THE TRUTH SEEKER are the only ones to protect Mr. Kahle's will from the Christians. Through attorneys at Wauseon, the county-seat of Fulton county, notice of appeal from the probate judge's decision was filed. The attorney for the heirs denied our right to appeal, but this was settled in our favor, and the case will be tried next March. There is but very little doubt in the minds of good lawyers that Metamora will finally hav a good Secular and scientific library, despite the efforts of the Kahle family and Christian Mr. Brown, probate judge.

A Jesuit's Lecture.

Hav the readers of the THE TRUTH SEEKER noticed the general advance all along the line of the Roman Catholic force in its attack upon the public schools? Since the Baltimore Council the priests, in every parish whose inhabitants can possibly bear the expense, hav been busy erecting parochial schools, until now these abortiv institutions are nearly as numerous as Roman Catholic churches, and equally worthless. But having got their schools, such as they are, the church authorities are devoting their energies to getting the children into them, and the taxes off them. The first is done by force, and is generally successful. The second is a more difficult matter, but it has succeeded here in at least one instance, as a sufficiently pliable judge has been found who has decided that parochial schools, being religious and charitable institutions, come under the exemption law. A public sentiment is also being aroused which shall permit the distribution, pro rata, of the school funds. This is being done by means of the Catholic journals and by lectures. Puritan Massachusetts even does not escape, though somehow we fancy it will be a long time before the descendents of the Catholic-hating Puritans will consent to allow the state to subsidize Roman Catholic schools. The temper of the Roman church, however, may be inferred from a speech made last week by a member of the Jesuit Society at the dedication of a new parochial school. The speaker, who stands high in the church, said:

"They talk about this being an American and national institution. It's a national fraud. What makes it a national institution? How long has it been a national institution? Until the beginning of this century there was no such thing as public schools in the sense in which we call them now. There were common schools, indeed, but the church, religion, undertook to control that. What makes this a national institution? In what is it a national institution? Because the schools are built and supported, the teachers are paid, from the moneys that are levied upon all the citizens at large, and that is all that makes it a national institution. But if it be contrary to the common weal, if it be against the interest of the citizens, then it cannot be a national institution any longer; it must cease to exist, and the day will come when it will cease to exist. There are some eight millions of Catholics in the United States now. They protest against this institution, and their protest is enough to make it evident that this legal system of education is illegal. A law—and this is a general principle—that is not for the welfare of the commonwealth, is no law at all. In order that it may be a law, in order that it may be binding on the conscience, it must be for the common weal. But, as I hav shown, it is not for the common weal. It is subversiv of the rights of the individual, subversiv of the rights of the family, subversiv of the rights of religion, subversiv of the divine rights of God himself.

"But, perhaps, this is is simply my opinion! Dearly beloved, I did not come here to giv my opinion. I came here to giv the teaching of the Catholic church. What is the teaching of the Catholic church? That parents may not send their children to godless schools unless a certain necessity arises. If they hav other schools to send them to where they can receive a fitting education, and they send them to godless schools, schools where no religion is taught, schools from which religion is banished, they are guilty of mortal sin. If compelled, for the want of other schools in which their children can receive an education, to send them to those schools, they are to look into the teachers for their moral character, they are to look into the text-books that are taught there, they must do everything in their power to prevent their children from being exposed to the danger of losing their faith, and unless they can make this danger to their faith remote, they are guilty of mortal sin by sending them to such a place. Allow me to read a few passages from a work by Father Connolly, of the Society of Jesus: The Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, in a detailed instruction to the bishops of the United States concerning the public schools, June 30, 1876, after quoting the last sentence of the above citation, adds the following words: These words, inasmuch as they are based on the natural and divine law, enunciate a general principle which holds universally, and refers to all places where this most destructiv system has been unfortunately introduced. It is, therefore, necessary that the illustrious prelates should by all possible means keep the flock intrusted to their charge aloof from the corrupting influences of the public schools. In the opinion of all, nothing is so necessary for this end as that Catholics should everywhere hav their own schools, and these not inferior to the public schools. Every effort must, therefore, be made to erect Catholic schools where such do not exist, or to enlarge them and make them more useful and efficient that in the course and method of training they may be in no sense inferior to the public schools. The Sacred Congregation grants that there may be circumstances in which Catholic parents may in conscience send their children to American public schools, namely, when no Catholic school is at hand, or when that which is at hand is not fit to giv the children an education suited to their station and conformable to their age. It is to be remembered, however, that the frequenting of the public schools can be permitted even in these cases, according to the declaration of the Sacred Congregation, only when the danger of perversion can be rendered remote. On that the decision is left to the bishop, and not to the parents of the children. So that even in the circumstance that I hav described, even where there is no Catholic school at hand, it is not lawful for Catholic parents to send their children to these public schools unless they can and unless they will make the danger of perversion, from being approximate, become remote. And when there is a doubt at all with regard to the matter, the judge in this case is not to be the parent, he is not to be the child, but the bishop of the diocese.

"Now, in order to show you that this legislation extends to the whole country, and that it extends to this part of the country, I may mention a fact that ought to hav a great deal of weight with you Catholics of the diocese of Boston. In the synod which was held within the past year and a half in this diocese, the archbishop expressly declared that in all parishes Catholic schools were to be built; that they were to be built as soon as possible; that they were to be under way, at all events, within two years, and that a pastor having the ability to build such schools and failing to do it would giv sufficient canonical cause for his removal from that parish. This is the utterance of the highest ecclesiastical authority in this state of Massachusetts.

"Now, dearly beloved, here is the sense of the Catholic church. Here is her teaching from the pope and the councils-general down to the bishops and to the priests—that Catholic schools are to be built, Catholic schools are to be supported, that the children of Catholics are to be sent to these schools and to no other, that religion must be taught in schools, that religion and education must go hand in hand, that there is no education worthy of the name without the teaching of religion, and this must be done without any let or hindrance on the part of anyone whatsoever."

These are statements sufficiently explicit to alarm the supporters of our public schools when they consider the enormous political power wielded by the Roman Catholic church. Perhaps not in New England, but certainly in the Middle and Northwestern states, the Roman church can get about anything it wants from legislatures and city governments. Both parties make open bids for the Irish vote, which is a vote controled by prejudice, superstition, and slavish obedience to ecclesiastical authority. The bidding for this vote is more noticeable now than ever before, and is done boldly and as a smart trick in politics. Can the ecclesiastical authorities be expected to do otherwise than to trade votes for legislation—franchises for money for the church and the church's schools?

Editorial Notes.

THE following is from the Washington Post:

"It is learned from an official source that President Cleveland's gift of a copy of the Constitution of the United States to Pope Leo XIII. on the occasion of the golden jubilee of his ordination as a priest was suggested indirectly by the holy father himself. When Cardinal Gibbons returned from Rome last summer, he brought a very cordial and congratulatory message to President Cleveland from the pope on the success of his administration and well wishes for him personally. The pope, in his interviews with Cardinal Gibbons, expressed much satisfaction with our Constitution and great interest in its operation. This suggested to the president the character of the gift. No letter was sent with it, but on the fly-leaf, in the president's handwriting, is the inscription presenting the book to the pope on the fiftieth anniversary of his entrance into the priesthood."

Grover Cleveland, of Washington, has the undoubted right to present to Mr. Pecci, of Rome, Italy, as many copies of the Constitution of the United States as he can pay for. But the president of the United States has no business to be negotiating with the pope. However, there are a good many thousands of Irish Catholic votes in New York and other cities, and the politicians want them.

THE Christmas services in Sing Sing prison were unusually earnest in religious tone, and show that institution to be preëminently Christian in character and habitants. The following hymn, composed by an inmate, is an illustrativ example of the power of Christ up the Hudson:

"Rejoice and be glad!
The redeemer has come!
Go look on his cradle,
His cross, and his tomb.

"Sound his praises, tell the story
Of him who was slain;
Sound his praises, tell with gladness,
He liveth again."

THE editor of a Unitarian paper sent a copy of his journal to a Western gentleman, and received the following reply, which he frankly prints:

"Nov. 23, 1887.

"MR. J. L. DOUTHIT, Dear Sir: A copy of your 'Best Words' arrived by to-day's mail, and, like a correspondent on the third page of said paper, I, too, think if those are your 'best words,' prolonged silence would excel them very much, and I can struggle along without any further copies of 'Best Words.'

"Why, in the name of sense and reason, are you sending forth such vapid utterances about nothing as are contained in that diminutiv sheet? Hav you any particular object in talking about nonentities and gushing over religion, that damnable curse of the world? By nonentities I mean your God and Jesus, both of whom are myths, and exist only in weak minds and unreliable records called, when compiled, the Bible. Humanity has been cursed long enough with these things, and it is high time for a change. It is as nauseating to a man who possesses reason, to hear or read of Jesus Christ and the Bible God, as it is to take an emetic, and the world is gradually reaching that condition of enlightenment where it has no use for either. What do you know about any God, or what evidence hav you that such a person ever lived as Jesus Christ, who came to save this world, and met with a cold reception, if the Bible is true as a biography? Contemporaneous history does not mention his name only in cases where forgeries hav been interpolated, and those who write about him in the New Testament disagree, so the impression prevails that they were all liars and not to be depended on. But, supposing he did liv, he had his day, paid the debt of nature, and went—where? I hav no need of a dead man to regulate my actions in life, and as I am an individual, I don't copy after some one else, but try to be myself. This would be a hell of a world if everybody thought and acted like the fabled Jesus, and we would all be tramps too, as he was. No, I hav no use for Jesus, God, or Best Words, and you made a mistake when you sent that senseless sheet to ——.

"P.S.—If you obtain the impression I am not a Christian, you won't be much in error."

Letters like that must be discouraging to the cause of Christ.

ON another page will be found some philosophical observations by Colonel Ingersoll, being the preface to a nineteenth-century novel written by a deserving young girl with a good big amount of literary talent. "For Her Daily Bread," is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with ninety-three dollars, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. There is some love in the work—no one would write a novel without it—but it is, in the main, the narrativ of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted forks, and disreputable hypocrits. The story is well told, lively and humorous when things went well with the heroin, and the reverse when otherwise. The one who picks the book up will find it difficult to lay it down till he knows how the affairs of the girls come out. It is just such a book, full of human life, as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the humane people of the world. We recommend the novel to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The price is 25 cents.

COPIES of the North American Review, containing the articles of Messrs. Ingersoll and Field, may be obtained at this office. Price, 50 cents.

Thank You, Mr. Bradley.

From the Warren, Ark., News.

Last week we received by mail a publication from New York called THE TRUTH SEEKER, an Infidel paper of the blackest dye. It is a contemptible, villainous sheet, full of the basest falsehoods, blasphemy, and libelous attacks on the Christian religion—it spares no church or sect. We hav no respect whatever for such a sheet, but with pride we hold the publisher in supreme contempt—not because he is a non-believer, no, for we do hav a personal respect for respectable Infidels and Atheists—but not for him whose tongue is ever ready to slander or belie Christian men and women because of their true and earnest devotion to God and the church. Its whole aim is to ridicule the church and slander the ministers and members, and to this end directs all of its energies. We are willing to risk the assertion that the author of the publication owes whatever degree of intelligence he has to a pious mother or father—and in this manner repays them. He at least owes the protection of his life and liberty to the institutions of a government founded by Christian patriots. Thus he seeks to destroy the roof under which he was reared—the one that has so often sheltered his defenseless head from the beating and pitiless storm. If the churches with their religions are so repugnant to the sensitiv and refined author, let him go to the interior of the "dark continent," China, or the uncivilized borders of the Far West, where neither the chimes of the church-bell nor the melody of hymns are heard, and there rest his tired soul in everlasting peace.

Letters from Friends.

RUSH, PA., Dec. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: On the expiration of my paid subscription to the old TRUTH SEEKER, Jan. 1, 1888, you will please discontinue sending the paper to me. I may again subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it will be when you take less pains to defend the Anarchists. If they are Infidels, they are such as we do not need; and it is best to import no more of them, and to export as many as possible.

I would say that the illustrations detract from the usefulness of the paper. Yours truly, M. G. SHOEMAKER.

BOULDER, COL., Dec. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $3 25—$3 to be credited on my subscription and 25 cents for the ANNUAL for 1888. I do not know positivly when my subscription expires—but no matter when; I'm sure you are welcome to the use of the money in advance, and I want to be sure of the paper. I do not wish to miss a number. I am especially pleased with the cartoons. If you had to double the price of your paper in order to retain the services of Heston, I should willingly stand the extra tax.

I am sorry to notice so often, in your "Letters from Friends," the fact that your subscribers allow themselvs to take the paper on credit. This is all wrong. Freethinkers should pay for such a paper promptly in advance. Both the cause and the paper are worth it many times over.

JOS. WOLFF.

FALL BROOK, CAL., Dec. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to ask Mr. F. K. Phenix, who has a letter in your issue of December 3d, how he expects to reform a "frightfully unprofitable" church by giving the ballot to the women, its stanchest adherents.

The clergy and the women combined will be such obstinate "defenders of the faith" that the church will obtain everything it asks, gain new light and energy; and Mr. E. A. Stevens's idea of knocking the God of hosts clean out of the laws of our land will never be realized, but very likely the other members of the heavenly firm will be added, as well as certain saints and saintesses to keep them company.

Female suffrage will be more than likely to bring back upon us the intolerable tyranny of the old Blue laws, and the oppression of King George that caused the Revolution will be but a flea-bite in comparison. Better hasten slowly in this matter. M. H. SHEPPARD, M.D.

HOME CITY, KAN., Dec. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There are but few genuin Liberals here, and they are not working at it much, but mossbacks and cranks are as thick as meal in a sack. Yea, they are as full of spite as hell is of brimstone. Some of the Christians are red-hot of late because three or four of our best Liberals hav succeeded in stopping them from using the school-house to hav divine service in. I think if they want a joss-house to fight old Splitfoot in, let them build one of their own; and while they are praying to their God they might get him to build one, as they say there is nothing impossible with him. They say he brought this wonderful world into existence in six days; if he did, it would only be a short job to fix up a church for them. They even want to use the school-house and the coal that belongs there for nothing. But, then, I suppose they think that all right, as they say, "Jesus paid it all." He must hav settled their coal bill, too, in advance. It doesn't look to me as if their Jesus had been doing much for them lately. Perhaps he got tired and is taking a rest for his health. WM. MOMORRAN.

PRINCETON, MO., Dec. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Some time since I received a letter from J. E. Remsburg, wishing to speak in Princeton, Mo. I hied away on foot to Princeton, and worked for two days; succeeded in getting enough money to secure one lecture, minus $3, which I paid myself. Then I wrote to him to come. He set the time, and was on hand. I had it published in both county papers. But it was only one day, and thus notice was too short, and it rained that night; but we had about one hundred intelligent people to listen to the lecture, which was on "Sabbath-Breaking." I wish we could boil down and skim off this holy or sacred idea of Sabbath, and make it a legal holiday. Then the time would soon roll around when the clergy would hav to earn their bread and butter some other way than begging money from poor women, and the weaker class, on Sunday. Remsburg made a good speech, the first Freethought speech ever delivered in the town, and when he got through there was no Sunday left for the poor Christian.

I hav been trying to get some subscribers for the best paper in the world, and hav succeeded in getting two; may get more. T. W. LEMMAX.

PARIS, ILL., Dec. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and until lately hav always obtained much pleasure from a perusal of the paper. In it I hav read hundreds of letters from men who entertain various views in politics and religion, and though of course differing in opinion from many of the writers, could always tolerate their views with due equanimity and make no remarks; but when it comes to tolerating Anarchy under red flags, black flags, or in any way it can be put, I feel compelled to speak and say, Down with it!

Some time ago I read the following sentence in your paper: "Repeal all law—we want none" (Herr Most). I was surprised at the time that you would giv such a sentence a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. And since those unreasonable instigators of murder and riot in Chicago hav paid the outraged law its due, I am more surprised that you hav so much sympathy to pour out for them. I hope that it will be after my allotted time on earth that this country will reach the time when it has no law; and the man who livs to see the Anarchists' ideas carried out will certainly see hell without going to the domain of Satan.

I stand for law and order. And if laws need reform or repeal I want it done in a peaceful and constitutional way, and not according to the method of John Most. If his teachings are carried out, New York will soon find that she has as much need of hemp as had Chicago.

If THE TRUTH SEEKER has for publication more letters or editorials brimming over with sympathy for the Chicago Anarchists, please giv the space occupied by them in my copy a smear with printer's ink, and I will not inquire the meaning of the blur.

Yours for law and order, J. CRETORS.

GREELEY, COL., Dec. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Upon the evenings of December 6th and 7th the Liberals of this community were met by Dr. J. L. York and wife, and well and truly were they entertained by the doctor upon the subjects of "Revelation or Inspiration; or, How God Speaks to Man," and "The Science of Life; or, How to Be Happy." Each lecture drew a generous and select audience.

The doctor expressed himself complimented by the attendance of the largest gathering ever given a Liberal lecturer in Greeley, and particularly was he impressed by the presence of so many ladies, whose interest was manifest and marked; and in return he gave to them, and all, the doctrin of a strong and cheerful mind so well stored with hope, and truth, and love, and logic. He is importuned to come again, and promises when summer comes. The presence of so strong and good a man in such a noble cause inspires us here with courage and with hope, and we think that we can see a little nearer now the battlements of liberty and truth.

L. L. PUTNAM.

ONEIDA, KAN., Dec. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The cartoon on the front page of your paper of Dec. 10, 1887, illustrates the way our undesirable immigrants are creeping into this country most vividly, with them moving their masks that cover their heads, each ornamented with a cross on his spinal column, in hot pursuit of our public schools. If Mr. Heston is not the means of calling the attention of the people to the fact that the crosses they wear on their backbones are a precursor to the attempt by the old man on the other side of the Tiber to place the cross over the dome at the White House at Washington, they must be very dull of apprehension. Octopus-like he is reaching out his arms, it is evident, and closing up around and crushing out the freedom of this country.

On the 1st of this month one of his embassadors was armed and equipped at Nashville, Tenn., by about fourteen others, with the credentials of a full-fledged bishop, and his headquarters or palace is to be at Concordia, Kan.

When will the people of this land wake up and withhold their encouragement from such a formidable enemy to this country and beat back the undesirable immigrants as shown in the cartoon? Echo answers, When? AMERICA.

ORANGE, MASS., Dec. 12, 287 A.S.

MR. EDITOR: Here is a field of superstition badly in need of a sower of the seeds of truth. Orthodoxy is considered the highest virtue, and conformity the only test required for a full and free entrance into our best society, so called.

The weeds of superstition actually flourish in the middle of our streets, and passers-by dare not even brush aside their leaves to facilitate their progress. Intellectual or scientific advancement is discouraged. Huxley, Darwin, and Spencer are known (information imparted, of course, through the pulpit) only as propagators of insane ideas. It is no wonder that the church can hold its dupes under such perfect control when they are required to devote not only every seventh day entirely to its service, but also three nights in the week besides.

Social ostracism, the last weapon of torture that Liberalism has as yet been unable to wrest from the grasp of fanatics, is wielded with great effect, and the continued possession of its power has rendered them almost invincible.

We hav had no Liberal lecturers here since Professor Danton—three or four years ago or more.

I should like very much to correspond with a young lady of Secular principles, if you hav any such among your subscribers, for I do assure you that they are as scarce par ici as superstitious ideas in Ingersoll's head. One capable of writing French preferred. H. W. HAMMOND.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to acknowledge my satisfaction with the stand you so courageously held, and still hold, regarding the Chicago Anarchists murdered and imprisoned. I often wondered and felt disappointed, when I read your correspondence, to find that intelligent men, striving for universal mental liberty, should become so unreasonable as to condemn without proof their true friends for mental liberty, and uphold that very class that clogs every move to elevate the enslaved masses, from whatever standpoint it may be viewed, for this reason—to allow the money power to rule and rob.

In my judgment no man can be a Liberal who wishes to grow fat and liv in ease by those immoral industrial methods carried on at the expense of others. How can I, economically enslaved, be mentally free? Impossible. It was economical freedom those noble men died for, and not a crime committed; for whoever will read the evidence, if fair-minded, will conclude so. I am not an Anarchist, because I do not understand it; but I followed the evidence in the trial—I know the character of the Chicago police—the hatred of capitalists and press, assisted by office-seeking politicians.

While Liberals rely more upon the press, not their own, they assuredly will make slow progress, if any, for they will lack the moral courage so much needed. and so nobly practiced by your secretary, E. A. Stevens. Considering all these little prejudices, which not only affect a man's principles, but more so his material welfare, you, Mr. Editor, had a hard task—i.e., to make a financial success and uphold what you thought was right.

Inclosed please find $3 for another year's subscription that I, too, may become a pioneer in the cause of human liberty.

Yours fraternally, JOHN F. PAULSEN.

MR. EDITOR: My paper of November 5th, containing Colonel Ingersoll's Reply to the Rev. Mr. Field, did not come. It is the first number I hav not received since I commenced taking the paper. Will you please send me the number containing said Reply? I would not miss that number for the price of the paper a year. THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better and better. Those sniveling priests hav had their feelings hurt again by that terrible Ingersoll. What a pity—they are so tender of the feelings of Ingersoll and all other Liberals! I giv them fits every chance I get, and that is quite often. I had it rough-and-tumble this summer with the Methodist minister of our place. He made the statement that he would rather his boys would learn to steal than learn to swear. I asked him why he made such a statement. I told him I had two boys that I was interested in, and if they must do either I would rather they would swear than steal. He said it was a greater crime in the opinion of the almighty to swear than to steal. I asked him what he knew about the opinion of the almighty—if he had ever seen him and got his opinion. He seemed indignant, and wanted to know if I ever made a profession of history. I told him, Yes, I had been a Methodist a good many years. He then wanted me to attend his meetings and let him dig me out. I told him I would attend his meetings and he might dig at me to his heart's content, if he would let me hav half the time to dig at him and his theory, but he declined. They are very valiant behind the cowards' castle. ISAAO GABRION.

ADRIAN, MICH., Dec. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few things concerning Anarchy. It is an unreasonable hypothesis to suppose that industry should share with indolence or laziness. Even equal distribution of land would not satisfy Anarchy or Socialism. It would not be agreed to by those who seek to liv on, or off, free plunder. I, being a man, through frugality and industry hav accumulated a competency, and would not be willing to pool my earnings with lazy cut-throats and thieves. Neither would I allow people from other climes, who could not liv in peace in their nativ land, to come here and seek to break up the best government on earth. We hav no room for bomb or other missil throwers. Wild, turbulent devils, who try to incite murder and undermine our institutions, should be hanged on the first post or gateway as a warning to evil-doers.

I'll bet $1,000 the man who would say, Hats off, to those men who were hung at Chicago, is an Anarchist. Giv him five hundred acres of government land and he would not work a foot of it in an agricultural way, but if he could strike a rich mine that would net him millions, he would load up his shot-gun and shoot the first poor countryman of his who attempted to share with him, though he now shouts, Equal distribution! There are thousands of such men. They will not work themselvs, and will advise others to be of the same ilk. Giv him $1,000 to go West with and purchase a farm; he would not do it, but would go into riotous living in some free-and-easy resort until he spent it all, and then try to kick up a row for another instalment. This country has no room for wild-eyed, murderous missil-slingers. Roust mit em! This is a magnificent government, and should not harbor such elements. O. S. BARRETT.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Dec. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Methodist South and the old-school Presbyterians are holding a union meeting and an insane theatrical display here. It has been going on for over a week. A Presbyterian priest from Portland takes the lead. He has the other priests under his control, on account of his ability and magnetic influence. He commands order and obedience by the young by the same means and through fear. He is a muscular man of middle age, and is possessed of the nervous, bilious, and abdominal temperaments, combined with the cephalio-magnetic. His appeals and influence destroy or paralyze reason in the credulous and unlearned. It appears as though many people hav become partially insane. They cry and shout and plead with others.

Several hav joined the rank and file of superstition, and hav prostrated their reason at the shrine of ignorance and intellectual slavery. Some of them know no more about the Bible than they know about the arts and sciences. This Portland man votes the people quite often to see who are upon the "Lord's side," and who will come to Jesus and escape a fearful hell, etc. On one occasion he said, "If any one is present who does not expect to be saved from his sins by the blood of Christ, rise to your feet." Two of us arose. He said that he never knew it to fail that such characters were converted before the close of the meeting. I told some of them that the happiest experience for me is since my emancipation from the church; that I now hav more regard for everything that livs and feels.

The speaker from Portland recommended the burning of Freethought literature. He said that it was not fit to stop rat-holes with. He recommended social ostracism, and said that we had no right to know the opposit of religion or the Bible. He added that the time to convert people to Christianity is in their infancy, but what is still better is to begin with the mother before the child is born.

Some of the joiners hav done what would not be prudent to publish in the way of deceiving and robbing their fellow-man, yet they show no disposition to make restitution, for "Christ has canceled all." It appears that they are yet ignorant of the consequence of sin. I hav been preaching the gospel of universal liberty in conjunction with the distribution of Freethought literature. What would the clergy and their slaves do with me if they had the power?

L. C. HILL.

GYMPIE, QUEENSLAND, AUS., Oct. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This is the first time I hav written to your valuable paper, as I am a very poor scholar, but I hav a little thinking power left in me after all the humdrum of theology I had pounded into me from the time I can remember, and there is plenty to do yet for the Liberals and truth-seeking men. For some still persist, and rant, and rave that God rules all things well; but for my part, I know nothing of him. All I hav to say is, I would like to see him rule a little as he used to do in the old times, according to the Bible; and likewise the Virgin Mary's son—if a son he could be, but that Holy Ghost trick I cannot swallow. As a miner I work underground, and some of my fellow-workingmen hav different views from what I hold, and one said to me the other day if he believed as I did, that there was no hell, he would throw himself down the shaft and make an end of himself. So I told him, it didn't belong to me to do that, but if I was one of their faith-men I would do it. For my part, I think they should do a few of those tricks as well as talk so much about them, and come off victorious just to show that we Infidels are on the wrong track.

I inclose subscription for another year's TRUTH SEEKER, as I think it is the best paper I ever read, and the cartoons are grand. I hav tried to get you more subscribers. They think it is too far away. We hav a small association of Freethinkers here, formed at the time Dr. York was here. There are about fifty members. I am glad to see he is still working hard for liberty and truth, and so many others besides who want to knock the religion and superstitions out of the people, and make room for more humanity. C. FORMAN.

MT. PLEASANT, TEX., Dec. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am trying to shake off the superstition that has clothed me for so many years (not so many, perhaps, as I am now only twenty-four), but whichever way I turn I still see a fluttering fragment. I so long for the time when I shall be able to hear our great Freethought lecturers, all of them. My brother is the only Freethinker with whom I am personally acquainted.

I am a Communist, and should be glad to hear from any interested that way.

I hav been a member of three churches. When I was seven years old I joined the Methodists. Several of my young friends were already members, and they assured me that I ought to join also. I said that I had rather be a Baptist. But the last night of the revival came, and I was so worked up and nervous about my sins that I half yielded. My friends, seeing that I wavered, fairly pushed me up front, and I found myself sitting beside one of the most dissipated wretches in town. He had joined the church I don't know how many times. I glanced at him timidly, half frightened to find myself so near him. But we were both sinners together. But I still wanted to be a Baptist, as my mother was a member of that church. So, at the age of thirteen, I joined the Baptists. I attended church and prayer-meeting regularly, and wept very much over my sins. I remember going to see an old lady who had read her Bible through three times on her knees. I thought her perfect, so I tried reading mine that way. But youth rebelled. Three times on my knees sufficed. But for a long time I would not go to bed without reading a chapter. Later on I joined the Unitarian church, and liked their liberal teachings. Not liberal enough, however, and I hope by reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Freethought literature, to become a true Liberal, and to help brighten the light that must soon illumin the world.

At first I was a little afraid of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but now I welcome it before any other paper. Long liv its worthy Editor, and all its good contributors.

Yours for liberty, A. H. PARK.

MATERIALISM VERSUS ORTHODOX HEAVEN.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The query presents itself: How great losers are Materialists for not believing in, and relying on, the Christian heaven?

To me, that latter place, as described by its advocates, is a contemptible burlesque, acceptable only to the drunkard, the indolent, and the heartless. To the many who desire naught but free drinks and idleness, the Christian heaven must be the acme of their hopes and ambitions.

But how loathsome, in cruelty and selfishness, it appears to an exalted, divine manhood imbued with a tender love for all kind, a sympathetic, responsiv nature, and withal an ever-increasing and intense desire for greater and greater mental accomplishments aud lofty attainments! To such a one, what temptation is held forth by the promis of a harp and opportunity eternal to sit at the feet and worship a religious fanatic named Jesus, with just enough brimstone odor to assure him that mother, children, and innumerable loved and loving ones are suffering eternal torture?

What hideous mockery! Only words that would "writhe and hiss" could do justice to such a heaven, and to those who recommend it as a just reward for well-doing. All hail to the day which has dawned wherein such abominations of creed and doctrin are being swept away as chaff before the wind!

Materialism is a holy calm and rest compared to such a place. But is there no choice between those two—Materialism and the Bible heaven? To me, it is easier to believe in a future life without the Bible than with it; and though many may wail forth to Brother Reynolds that he is taking from them their "blessed Bible and faith in the Lord Jesus," I would assure them that when they loosen their rigid hold on the abnormal and monstrous they will find a peace and aspiration for righteousness which will surprise them and make them aglow with enthusiasm for the truth, for the natural, for the consistent, and harmonious. I would say to all, Welcome the physician, whoever he may be, that will eliminate the abnormal; the normal will then establish itself, and the beauty and symmetry of its outlines will be discernible at once.

Reason and divine intuition assure me that the result of this life is a higher and more perfect state of existence, where progression is continuous and all the divine chords of our being are attuned to greater tenderness and harmony; where all love-ties are eternally united; where, besides mental attainments incomprehensible to man, is that perfect joy of doing good unto others, ministering tenderly unto those who are in a darker and inferior stage of development, owing to an erroneous—unspiritual—earth career, and where the most degraded among us will ultimately attain unto perfect peace and happiness, not by shifting their sins upon another, but by undoing by slow and careful erasures and atonements the results of their ignoble and selfish ill-doing.

FANNY DE VILLO.

PORTLAND, ORE., Nov. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: An invitation to be present and address the people at the dedication of the Freethought Hall at Silverton, Oregon, was the first I had heard of this enterprise, and I was too glad to be with these noble co-workers in their hour of triumph. Silverton is fifty miles from Portland and twelve miles east of Salem, the capital of Oregon. The time was Friday, next day after Thanksgiving. The day before, I was at the depot by noon and found myself in the hands of a committee of safety and in the possession of a home with S. Ames, Esq., one of the enterprising business men of the place. The Hall is on the most prominent lot in town, and is a massiv brick building, two stories, 32 by 70 feet. It is the result of Mr. Putnam's labors, who spoke there the last of June.

High above it floats a large American flag, and one old orthodox brother said, "If they had placed it on the outside of town, I would not hav keered, but they went and put it right sock in the center."

In the hall I found a score of ladies and gentlemen ornamenting and placing the furniture in position, which cost several hundred dollars.

By 10 o'clock Friday morning, farmers with their families came rolling into town, and by 1 from five to six hundred persons were in and about the hall. The Silverton brass band took their position on the left—all intelligent, bright-looking Liberals; the Secular Union choir had the center of the stage, and a musical club from Salem, six in number, occupied the right, looking like young princes. And never was music better or more heartily enjoyed.

Dr. ——, whose name I hav forgotten, opened the meeting with a short, logical speech, which was a gem. As president of Secular Union No. 307, he will be a success.

Professor McLary, of Stayton, gave the opening address, which was a Radical cyclone. The forests seemed to bend before it. This young man's oratory, logic, and power are of the highest order; so much so that none of the exponents of superstition will meet him in debate.

R. D. Allen, Esq., secretary, read a poem from Mr. Putnam, written for the occasion, which we all hope to see in print. R. D. Allen is a farmer of fine business and administrativ abilities. He is as modest as a lady, good-looking—yes, and good too, so good you would take him to be a Liberal at sight.

C. Beal next delivered an address of twenty minutes on "The Head, Heart, and Hand of Liberalism."

Dr. ——, of Aumsville, closed.

At night the six young men from Salem gave a musical concert of two hours, and then played for the dance till broad daylight in the morning. Supper all night at the hotel; everybody happy and good behavior everywhere; only one saloon in the place—meek as Moses.

To be brief, Liberal emigrants can't do better than settle on these rich lands about Silverton and commune with these intelligent people. Let us make this place the head-center for our cause on this northwest coast.

Write your name on a book or journal and send it to their library. Lecturers, pass that way.

Direct letters, books, and the like to R. D. Allen, Esq.

CORNELIUS BEAL.

BARCELONA, SPAIN, Nov. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This beautiful Sabbath—Saturday—morning finds me seated at the table in the salon on board the Spanish steamer Miguel M. Pinillos, at anchor in the bay of Palma, Isla de Mallorca, about one hundred miles southeast of Barcelona, Spain. We embarked at New York on the 29th ult., and steamed directly for Cadiz, at which port we arrived on the 12th inst. Palma is one of the most salubrious cities extant, except that it is befogged with twenty-eight monuments to superstition of the malignant type, viz., Roman Catholic. The majority of the people here are mere machines (especially the women), wound up occasionally by the priests, and run down to the tune of faith, hope, and ignorance.

I hold that those Anarchists at Chicago had a constitutional right to express their silly views in regard to Anarchy from the rostrum, or from whatsoever public place they might desire to do so, just so long as they did not practice Anarchy. Just as the New York Herald of Jan. 22, 1887, p. 28, editorial relativ to polygamy, said: "If the adherents to the Mormon faith want to preach polygamy, they are free to do so; that is a matter of belief, etc. But to practice it is a crime." From their earliest infancy the minds of the people are so much deluded and distorted by and through false teachings, ideas, and doctrins that it is almost impossible to find a person whose mind is qualified to occupy a position in the jury-box, or upon the judge's bench, and while there to render a fair, impartial, and just verdict or decision. For instance, I will refer to the person who, by and through teaching and training, believes—or tries to believe, for it seems impossible that a rational human mind could be taught to believe it—that a veritably just, benignant, and merciful God made man, poor, frail, erring creature that he is, scarcely able to distinguish between right and wrong, and whose mind is susceptible of being taught to believe that barbarism, even cannibalism, is right and just, and capable of being seduced in every conceivable manner, and then made a hell of fire and brimstone in which that man must writhe and burn not for a few millions of ages, that thereby he might be purified and prepared for a higher position of rectitude and perfect holiness and bliss, but to writhe and burn in that hell throughout all the ceaseless ages of eternity; and that, too, for a crime that was committed by his ancestors hundreds of generations prior to his birth. The mind that veritably believes such barbarous nonsense as that would, in the eyes of rationality, be about as well qualified to render a just decision or verdict as the Christian's hell would be fit for a powder-house. If the Christian's idea of a God, a hell, a devil, and eternal punishment is in conformity with justice, then why not establish justice in our courts? And if it can be established and proven beyond doubt—the Christians hav not done this—that anybody's great-great-great-grandfather or other ancestor stole anything, if even so insignificant as an apple, why, of course, arrest him, the offender's descendant, and, upon the establishment of the fact that he is the descendant of him who stole the apple or other little thing, skin him alive, little by little, a shoestring at a time, once a day, and from head to foot. Even then you would fall far short of doing him veritable justice according to the Christian's standard. And it must be remembered that, when Adam and Eve disobeyed the law of the Christian's God, they did not in the least know right from wrong, good from evil, till after they had violated the law; and still, the poor. debased simpleton believes it is just to hold even their posterity for thousands of generations down responsible for it, and under the most severe punishment conceivable to the human mind. Well, my gawky Christian friends, if you will agree that the punishment shall be meted out to the descendants of your Adam and Eve in this world, just so soon as they may hav attained to the age of majority, or at any time thereafter, I will join hands with you. But, be it remembered, that I and all of mine are descendants from the brother of Cain's wife, whom he found in the land of Nod. Adam and Eve are no ancestors to me. It seems to me that the gawky Christian is not aware of the barbarous condition of his own benighted mind. The Feejee, while he is killing, cooking. and eating his fellow-man, does not know that he is practiciug a horrid barbarity; like the Christian, he has been taught from his earliest infancy.

The man who is endowed with a nature so obdurate and void of justice as to be able to sit down and witness the horrid spectacle, the various shocking injustices, of a very Christian Spanish bull-fight, and enjoy it, experiencing veritable pleasure and enjoyment at the sight of it, probably, does not know that himself is endowed with a very fiendish nature, and the same may be said of the man possessed of over a million dollars' worth of other people's labor converted into various kinds of wealth, and who goes about among his poor fellow-men, beholding them writhing in hard labor and in the uttermost depths of hunger, rags, and want, without disbursing among them at least every cent of the net income that he may derive from his wealth. All such people may not know that they are veritable fiends, endowed with diseased minds; but, if I know anything of justice, I know it, and it enables me to behold a little justice in death I think that much of the injustice, fiendishness, of the human minds that are thus distorted is the result of their having been taught and imbued with the barbarous idea that there possibly could be any justice, or anything else than fiendishness—utter fiendishness—in the creation or establishment of the Christian's hell; and, if such a hell does not exist, then out falls the bottom of all Christianity. No wonder that our judges and jurors are so barbarously craving the blood of innocent men and lunatics, such as were the Chicago Anarchists and Charles J. Guiteau. They are first made barbarians by being stuffed full of barbarism by the preachers, priests, and editors, and then placed in the jury-box and upon the judge's bench to display that barbarism; and hence the anarchy, injustice, in and before our courts.

When a lawyer, being a rationalist, goes into one of our courts and gains a case in favor of iniquity and crime, and obtains the acquittal of a veritable culprit, as is often done, it must be remembered that the rationalist shyster is playing the game—eucher, for instance—that the Christians hav spread upon the board, and, if he happens to hold a good hand, such as ability to thwart the path of justice—both bowers, ace, king, and queen—he plays it alone and wins the game, and gains his case according to the rules of the game, the rules of practice in and before our courts, our machines, our inquisitions. If the jurors chance to be muddle-minded Christians, accustomed to being driven hither and thither from one false premis to another by the absurd oratory of eloquent priests and preachers, why, any eloquent shyster can, by means of a short spurt of oratory, so distort their minds as to obtain the acquittal of even a Star Route swindler, or the conviction of seven innocent Anarchists. Just pause for a moment, and behold what Christian barbarity has done and is now doing in the land of Lafayette, of Paine, and of Washington, at the sides of the deathbeds of whom no priest or preacher was permitted to practice mummery.

Oh, that the rationalists could but hav one state in our Union entirely to themselvs! I feel sure that in one short generation they would show to the world a great difference between rationalism and barbarism, and that the latter would soon forever die. Anarchy would not exist then in our courts as it now does, and the people of the world would be far more just and happy than they now are.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

If Ingersoll Is Right.

What if Ingersoll is right?
Shall all of good go out in night?
Will mothers cease their babes to love?
From white to black must change the dove?
Will Cupid all his arrows break,
And drown himself in Lethe's lake?
Will people lose their power to dine?
Can fiery Sol forget to shine?
Or optic nerve not sense a sight
Because one Ingersoll is right?

What if Ingersoll is right?
Why, pious lies shall perish quite,
And canting cut-throats sneak away,
While decent men make safe the day.
The fagot will refuse to flame
To roast who honor Reason's name;
And dungeon cells cannot doom such
As saints suppose may think too much;
But all who walk in Science's light
Know Colonel Ingersoll is right.

What if Ingersoll is right?
Is therefore all of life a blight?
What though dude Zion's bell be broke,
If we smell not Gehenna's smoke?
Why should the songs of heaven swell
For chorus to the sighs from hell?
Fond hope that all forever sleep!
Huge fear that one should wake to weep!
We shall be free from Satan's might
If Robert Ingersoll is right.

What if Ingersoll is right?
Hav then a reason for the right,
Not curse and kill men for the cause
That they interpret nature's laws.
Pure Truth will for herself be praised
When hoodoo temples hav been razed.
When ghostly Gods shall cease to reign,
And spooks not vex our minds in vain,
Then man shall rise to virtue's hight,
Because our Ingersoll is right.

Prize Essay.

WHY I AM A LIBERAL.

I believe my own conscience to be a better udge of right and wrong than a book written two thousand years ago to govern the barbarians of that time.

I cannot find the beauty in a religion whose essential is faith in one's own sins being transferred to another's shoulders.

I see all days alike—parts of our lives, hours that can never come back again, to be filled with efforts to make others happy, to work blessed miracles in bringing smiles to sad faces, lightening others' burdens, and changing tears to laughter, and I think there should be no "day of rest" from our life-work, for there is not a day nor an hour to spare.

In nature is the true religion.

Every flower in the field and every stone in the brook preaches a sermon, a beautiful sermon, whose every word is truth.

A man who is to benefit this world of ours must liv here in mind as well as body, with a kind heart, a free mind, and a pair of hands whose glory is in their good and noble work.

Is it not true that he will liv a second life in the spirit his good deeds hav excited?

I do not believe that there are two people in all the world who can hav precisely the same belief, so when we see thousands of the same church, and professing the same creed, what can we think but, "The nineteenth century, with all the brave men and women who hav made it what it is, has wrought for them no benefit?"

Slavery, we say, does not exist on our continent, yet we hav millions of slaves here, mind-slaves, and in fetters of their own forging.

I cannot believe in the absolute truth of a book which has been handed down from generation to generation, revised, and translated from tongue to tongue.

Luther, while engaged in the translation of this very book, threw his inkstand at the head of a devil, which he thought stood tempting and persuading him from his task; and the stain on the wall still remains, a monument to excited imagination.

All acknowledge the superiority of our mode of life over that of the people who lived so long ago.

And why should not these improvements giv birth to a newer and better religion?

And so I am a Liberal.

Let us not giv our thoughts to a God of whom we do and can know nothing, but let each man liv for the good of the world and his fellow-man, and his interest will be their love and respect, and let Liberty be goddess of the world.

LAURA PRICE STEWART (age 15 years).

[Winning prize of $1.—ED. C. C.]

The Stompoodle Christmas Reception;

OR, HOW YAWCOB PATRICK STOMPOODLE RECEIVED HIS NAME.

Old man Stompoodle, of Greensburg, was of German descent, and was the proprietor of the Stompoodle Tippling House.

Old woman Stompoodle was old man Stompoodle's consort, and had been this for the last five-and-twenty years; her ancestral land was Erin.

Old man and woman Stompoodle were blessed with four-and-ten children, the youngest of which (a boy) was aged three months, and as yet was destitute of a name—the cause being that Bridget (old woman) disapproved Teutonic "set-offs," as she termed names, and approved Irish ones, while Fritz Yohannes insisted that appellations like Pater, Yawcob, and Karl took the lager and sauer-krout every time. Bridget and Fritz Yohannes, finding they could come to no conclusion in regard to naming their young son, resolved, as Christmas was near, to giv a Christmas reception, and allow their guests to discuss, and some one (who was to act as judge) decide from the arguments, what type of name should be best.

The 25th of December finally came. By Christmas evening, the Stompocdles had completed their German and Irish preparations for their invited Irish and German guests. The German and Irish reception and dining rooms had been Irishly and Germanly decorated; German and Irish musicians had been engaged, and the table was well supplied with Irish and German favorit dishes—sauer-krout and potatoes constituting a big part.

The guests began to appear at about 8 o'clock, and by 8:30 they were all present. The Irish guests, headed by old woman Stompoodle, immediately convened. The German guests, headed by their host, did likewise.

Bridget bribed her party, by promising them each three swallows of good Irish whisky if they won the evening by securing her son an Irish name. Fritz Yohannes had likewise bribed his party, by promising each of them more sauer-krout than they could eat (which meant no less than two gallons apiece), if they won the evening by securing a German name for his son.

After conversing a short while, all the visitors and Stompoodles assembled in the reception room, both parties being confident of victory. The Irish orators, with old woman Stompoodle, gathered on one side of the room; the German speakers, with old man Stompoodle, congregated on the other side. Between them, or in the center of the room, sat Stompoodle's eldest daughter, who was to act as judge of the occasion.

After the judge had called order, the contest opened with Terry McGinnis's address. It ran thus:

"Ledies an' gintlemean: Es Oi've bin keld opon to ravale tha apinyen of me moind on this gret palitical metter, it's me wish to compla without father saromonies.

"Now, ledies and gintlemean, its ferr me perrt that I praferr Moike and Pat to eny names inder tha sun; an' its rasons ferr it Oi hev too.

"In the ferst pless, it's becase it's somethin' ramentic they hav about them, which sartinly trims thar oners off; and becase it's selid to tha backbone they arr; an' shure an' it's prode it max its oner; but me princapel rason is becase it's strong they max one, ferr arr not meny of the praize-ring min named Moike and Pat? Then it's 'cess the young min in an Indian bettle gits, which he's very laible to do; it's but an' Oi'm Pat or Moike he's to haller, and his brick-calered intagenists will flay at the icho of his voice. Now, ledies an' gintlemean, aftaire having all thase substantial rasons, if it's not Pat or Moike the child is keld, it's meself, by jabers, who'll jimp through Terry McGinnis's stove paipe." (Takes his seat.)

Much applause follows this eloquent address, and the orator is made the recipient of many bouquets of choice flowers. The next speaker was Yoseph Stopenbrakes. His oration was in this shape:

"Mens und vimens: In recards dot battle Inshens-pisness, does Yawcob not shignifies supplanter? Und if de poy's name was hav been Yawcob, he voot endoutevly hav exhploded dem red-colored brick consagenists before dot Mike or Patrick was gets his sphyglass to his neck to see vere dem red-colored brick consagenists vas. Und anoder tings, I would likes to spheaks of—Mike und Patrick so much like onions zounds, und disagreeables like dot vas nuting else." (Takes his seat.)

Wild cheers and mild bouquets follow this short but racy speech.

The next person on the list was Mrs. Flanagan (Stompoodles called her Flannel-cakes), the substance of whose oration was that Patricks and Mikes, of late, had all turned out to be great and brave; she then referred to Patrick Henry, and, to evince how brave he was, said: "He was found of liberty and death." She concluded her oration by asking to be excused for not giving any more examples of celebrated Patricks and Mikes, on the grounds of not wishing to waste time. (Bouquets.)

Next came Hans Flopenbecker, who was an amateur, and was unprepared for the occasion; but he anyhow succeeded in stammering out:

"Mine Peoples: Very much I likes Yawcob and Pater, but very much I don't likes Patrick and Mike." (Takes his seat amidst applause and bouquets.)

A dozen or more speeches were indulged in by both parties, but the last one will only be repeated. It was by Robert McBernon, a noble, learned, and honored gentleman. It was as follows:

"Ledies and Gints: Tha rason ferr me prefarin our pertie's names, is in cess the young gint enjoys no schoolin', he will enyhow be abble to spill Moike or Pat, for averybody can spill them—M-u-k-k-e, Mike, end P-r-x-t, Pat. Anether good rason, is in cess the young gint hes a poor mimory, he'll niver forgit Pat or Moike; for if he cen't think of Moike he's but to ramember spike, end that will ramind him o' Moike; end if he forgits Pat he's but to ramem-ramem-ramember—ah!—ah!—fat, end that will ramind o' Pat; so let the name be Moike or Pat." (Takes his seat.) Much applause follows, but no bouquets, as they were exhausted.

Next was the judge's or Miss Stompoodle's decision to come, as to which side had won. Silence reigned for a time, both parties still being confident of victory.

The judge arose at last. All cast their eyes upon her admiringly. Indeed, the judge was not a bad-looking nor ignorant girl. Her words which followed were the only well-spoken ones of the evening. They were these: "The only way I see to adjust this matter properly is, to bestow upon my brother a middle as well as Christian name; one to be of a German and the other of an Irish type. I am of the opinion that Yawcob Patrick would make as good a combination as any, so let his name be Yawcob Patrick Stompoodle." (Takes her seat amidst deafening applause.)

As if by magic the Irish party cry in concert the question, "Who is that gairl?" and in the same manner the German party reply, "She vas all right."

The orchestra then immediately struck up a German and Irish march, while everybody, Irishly and Germanly, promenaded into the dining-room, and as they did they sang, "Long Liv Yawcob Patrick Stompoodle." At the same time old Kris, who was on his homeward journey, sang as he passed by, "They won't get home till morning."

Chats With Correspondents.

LILLY.—Yes, dear, we hav always loved children. They are the sunlight of the world, the innocent angels that make living in a world of shadows endurable.

DANA L.—It may be that everything is for the best, as you say, but it is not easy always to think so. We hav to learn to bear what is with as much composure as possible.

MARGARET, OLIVER, AND ANNIE.—Thanks for your beautiful pictures. They are a lovely addition to our gallery of TRUTH SEEKER children. Thanks, also, for the souvenir from "bonnie Scotland."

J. H. B.—Many thanks for your kind remembrance. No; do not learn to smoke. It is a needless and expensiv luxury. With cigar money buy useful books. Send to Truth Seeker Company for catalog. The works you inquire for may be found in the office there.

JESSIE BREWSTER.—Your article received, and will appear as soon as we hav room for it. Your contributions are always welcome. We thank you for your kind interest, and we shall always strive to deserve the good opinion of the friends of the Children's Corner. No, we hav certainly not discontinued for good the Science stories. We realize their importance, but ill-health has prevented their appearance of late, as we hav not felt able to write a great deal in these days, but hope to be well again soon.

LEWIS.—Chewing gum is injurious in several ways. It is neither a wholesome nor beautiful habit. A boy who chews gum might some time chew tobacco. We don't like to think of our bright boys and girls as being addicted to any such habit. It is said that a million dollars is spent every year in the United States for chewing gum. There are large factories engaged in its manufacture, but, none the less, its use is not in good taste, nor is it conduciv to good health.

A FRIEND writes, in a private note, and she will please pardon us for making it public, of the Science Column: "It not only interests the children, but instructs older people who during their early lives were denied such advantages. You know there are many grown people, with undeveloped minds, who would not hav understood those matters as they are treated in scientific works; but, simplified and stripped of their technicalities as you treat them, they are read with an intelligent understanding by some of my Western acquaintances, and I feel sure the Science Column does more good than you know." We are glad to know our efforts are appreciated, but we fall very short of our ideal; still we do the best we can, and shall resume the Science chapters soon as health permits.

J. K. P. B.—Thanks for puzzles. You are very kind and thoughtful; indeed, I think no one has better and truer friends than the EDITOR OF THE CORNER.

Correspondence.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 11, 287.

MISS WIXON: Comfort is the first factor of life. The only worthy contentment is being contented with doing our best, and making the best of what we hav while it lasts. I do not know of anything better to do than to keep the children clear of those baneful illusions and invasions, God and gin, Bible and beer, so I send you another cargo of rhymes for the Corner. One piece is an answer to some slurs in a recitation-book, claiming that everything worth having will go to the condemned canines if Ingersoll is right. If those who pretend to so much piety about what they know nothing of would do one-quarter as well as Colonel Ingersoll, and be a fourth as pleasant as his family, no one would be kept awake by senseless barking or hurt by biting. Death is as natural as birth, and it is only the howling of hypocrits that makes it seem a terror.

JOHN R. GUILD.

GRANTFORK, ILL., Dec. 20, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never seen any letter from this part of the country, I thought that I would write a few lines. I am a boy, fifteen years old. I am not going to school this term. I would go, but my father is postmaster, and he needs me at home, for I am assistant. Our town is situated about (by public road) thirty miles from the city of St. Louis. Father is the only person that takes your valuable paper. I like to read it very much. I would like to correspond with some boy. I would like to see more boys write letters. Hoping you will see fit to publish my letter, I remain,

Your friend, NICHOLAS J. KRAFT.

[We would like to see more letters from the boys, too. As it is now, the girls hav the larger part of the correspondence column. But the boys who do write for the Corner are able and capable, and we are pleased to add the name of Nicholas, the young assistant-postmaster, to the list. Who knows that he may not be some time a postmaster-general?—ED. C. C.]

OMAHA, NEB., Dec. 18, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I beg to inform you that I hav received your letter containing $2, being the second prize for essay entitled, "Why I am a Liberal," and I wish to tender Mr. Marlett and yourself my most sincere thanks for awarding me the prize.

I want to get your books entitled, "Apples of Gold" and "All In a Lifetime." The "Story Hour" I already hav.

Inclosed find money order for the sum of $3, to pay for "Apples of Gold," "All In a Lifetime," and "Liberal Song Book."

I will also inclose likenesses of my three-year-old brother, Oliver, my ten-year-old sister, Annie, and myself. I would like to hav your photograph, if convenient. Please send me books which contain your portrait, if you hav them. When I write another essay will you select the subject, or shall I select one myself? I will now close.

From your friend,

MARGARET S. COLVIN.

P.S.—I will not send the money order in this letter, but will send it in an envelope by itself. I will mail them both at the same time.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Dying Atheist to Death.

Nearer, nearer, Death, I see thee;
Thou hast surely come to free me
From my care.
When afar off thou didst track me,
Fearing that thou wouldst attack me
Caused despair.

Then thou wert a grim annoyer;
Now thou art a dear destroyer
Of my pain.
With thy frigid hands and fingers
Chill the fever that still lingers
In my brain.

Fainter grow my heart's pulsations,
And my indistinct sensations
Seem to cease.
Boldly, Death, at last I face thee;
Benefactor, oh, embrace me—
This is peace.

Church and Mammon.

Dimes and dollars, dollars and dimes!
An empty pocket is the worst of crimes.
When a man is down, giv him a thrust;
Trample the beggar under the dust.

Presumptuous poverty is quite appalling.
When a man is down, kick him for falling;
When he is up, lift him up higher.
His life is for sale, but who is the buyer?

Dimes and dollars, dollars and dimes!
An empty pocket is the worst of crimes.
I knew a poor but honest man
Who tried to liv on the Christian plan;

But poor he is and poor he'll be;
A despised and wretched thing is he.
At home he meets a starving wife;
Abroad he leads a leper's life.

Join the church, and ne'er forsake her;
Learn to cant, and insult your maker;
Be hypocrit, liar, knave, or fool—
But don't be poor. Remember the rule:
Dollars and dimes, dollars and dimes;
An empty pocket is the worst of crimes.

Difficulties Encountered in Evangelizing Harvard Students.

From the Omaha Herald.

BOSTON, MASS., Oct. 19th.—They do say that a movement is contemplated at Harvard, the object of which is to evangelize, in some measure, this notoriously heathen university. It must not be supposed that the devil has obtained undisputed possession of the college. On the contrary, I hav reason to know that not a few young men of exceptional godliness are numbered upon its roll of undergraduates. Among themselvs these pious guzzlers at the Pierian spring hav a society, the object of which is the propagation of the faith within Alma Mater's classic precincts. As a rule, the members of this prayerful sodality are unusually poverty-stricken. I cannot imagin why it is, but I hav never met a fairly well-to-do student who entertained a prepossession in favor of the catechism and the hymn-book. The solution of this enigma I modestly refer to wiser thinkers.

Upheld by that consciousness of moral rectitude which distinguishes the seeker after religious truth, the devout sophomore employs his personal influence to spiritually educate his unregenerate classmates. He does not hesitate to call upon the especially unsanctified in their rooms and to giv them all sorts of valuable suggestions regarding the mending of their ways. Suppose, for example, he finds that dissipated youth, Splasher, engaged playing draw-poker with a few equally dissipated acquaintances. So absorbing is the game that they do not hear his timid knock. But the jackpot winds up at length, and the summons elicits a tardy response.

"Toddle in, my blooming," says the hospitable Mr. Splasher, opening the door. "You're just in time to make a sixth hand in the game."

"You are very kind," replies the visitor, "but I hav not any acquaintance with these soul-destroying pastimes."

"That's all right," responds the genial host. "If you won't join us, pray take a seat and look on."

So the evangelical amateur balances himself on the extreme edge of a chair, and eyes the proceedings with an air of grieved disapprobation. Presently one of the players deposits in the middle of the table a small white disk of celluloid. "May I ask what that is?" says the missionary apologetically, evidently inspired to investigate this curious form of iniquity.

"That's the ante," explains one of Mr. Splasher's friends politely.

"But what is an ante?"

"Five cents."

"What! You don't mean to say that you are gambling for money?"

"Well, we should rather smile! You don't suppose we're playing this for gum drops?"

"Gentlemen!" exclaims the advocate of salvation, with ill-dissembled horror, "I am inexpressibly distressed to discover such immorality among my fellow-students. Before taking my departure, however, I may as well scatter a few seeds of holiness upon this barren ground." And with this he distributes among those present a handful of tracts, demonstrating the uselessness of trying to be happy in this world, and recommending various ways of making oneself utterly wretched with a view to future reward. Then taking up his shabby hat he says good-bye, and trips down the stairway of the dormitory, while a howl of impious hilarity awakens the echoes of the apartment he has just left, and Mr. Splasher, with his friends, executes a frantic war-dance about the corridor.

Some trifling rebuffs hav no discouraging effect, however, upon the godly-minded, who are simply inspired thereby to additional efforts in their soul-saving task. At their hands especially hopeless cases receive exceptional attention, and undergraduates whose depravity is unusually notorious are sent a dozen invitations for every prayer-meeting held in the college yard. But now it is understood that a very determined assault is to be made upon the fortifications behind which the evil one has intrenched himself. A corps of "Christian brethren" has been organized for the purpose of visiting the iniquitous in their rooms, and praying for them. The members of this pious association do not expect to be welcomed with much enthusiasm by those upon whom they call. On the contrary, they are prepared to be kicked out of every other door they enter upon this merciful errand. They are prepared, if necessary, to kneel in the hallways and howl such spiritual songs as are most appropriate outside the closed portals of the unevangelized. Then to pass a few copies of scripture texts through a crack beneath, and away to invoke divine intercession in behalf of another castaway upon the desert shore of unbelief. Oh, you may be very sure that the life of an university missionary is an activ if not a very merry one.

How the Methodists Intend to Hustle the Baptists and Episcopalians.

While we were camped on the edge of a little Nebraska town a man came over and sat down on the wagon tongue and began to praise up the place, mentioning among other improvements a new steeple that was going up on a church near at hand.

"Isn't that steeple just a little high for the size of the church?" suggested Briar.

"There, struck it the first whack! I told 'em that was the way it would go! Now, I'll tell you," he went on confidentially, "'bout that steeple. It's a 'Piscopal church; they put it up 'bout a year ago with jes' an ord'nary steeple stickin' upon it. Then what did the Baptists do but up an' build a church over here an' r'ar up a steeple on their's ten feet higher. This nat'rally galled the 'Piscopals some, an' this spring up they socked their steeple fifteen feet higher! It ran along till July, an' all the time the Baptists was gittin' hotter 'n hotter an' one day jes' after the Fourth what should they do but put some carpenters to work on their steeple and shove her up 'nother ten feet? Then they went round town steppin' high, an' the 'Piscopals began to sweat again. It run along till day before yesterday, when they seen the Baptists an' are goin' 'em ten better! An', do you know, I'll be snaked if I don't b'lieve the Baptists 'll raise 'em 'fore winter? Oh, we're game in this town ev'ry time!"

"Er—well, which one do you belong to?" Briar inquired.

"Neither; I'm a Methodist. That's our church over there on the hill."

"Well, you're getting left entirely, aren't you—no steeple at all?"

"S-sh! That's all right—we know our play! We let on we don't b'lieve in steeples, an' go 'round blowin' 'bout our big bell an' the scolloped shingles on the side of the buildin'. 'Bout next June you'll see these Baptists' and 'Piscopals' steeples blow over, an' then jes' watch us Meth'dists shack to the front an' r'ar a long, slim steeple up into the air so high that they'll be too sick to ever build again! Us Meth'dists may be laggin' a little jes' at present, but you wait till the proper time comes an' we'll make some o' these lightweight denominations think the brick court house has fell on 'em!"—Fred. Carruth, in Chicago Tribune.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

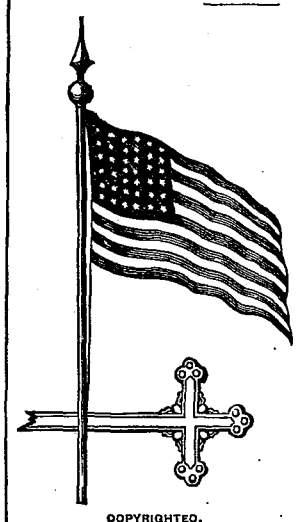
SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.



NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents. For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 40 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

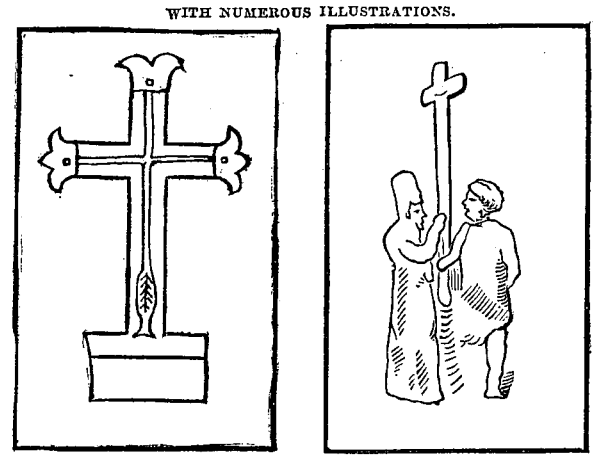
BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

News of the Week.

THE latest of the "combinations," "corporations," "companies," or "syndicates" that are lately formed for the purpose of making the commodity they are to buy cheaper, and that which they are to sell higher, is one in lard.

HERBERT SPENCER is in very poor health, and suffers from insomnia.

AN order for the reduction of judicial rents in Ireland creates great rage among the landlords.

AT Killybearn, Ireland, a desperate battle between Catholics and Orangemen occurred on the 26th ult.

A PROPOSAL of a Russian government commission to allow Jews to reside in that country has been rejected by higher authority.

THE railway conductors' association is to present to Congress a bill requiring the licensing of conductors on all railways in the United States.

AT Newmarket, Ireland, on the 30th ult., five men were sentenced to three months' imprisonment at hard labor for attending a meeting of the National League. An appeal was taken in each case.

RUSSIA continues to make stealthy advances toward the Asiatic countries that she covets, and givs great anxiety to the other European powers, who fear to interfere.

THE pope is preparing autograph letters to all the sovereigns that wrote to him on his jubilee day.

COMPLICATED strikes and threats of strikes of Pennsylvania miners and Reading railroad employees continue.

SUICIDES are unusually numerous lately in the big cities. The two chief causes seem to be intemperance, and poverty and failure to get employment.

CIGARMAKERS are indignant at an attempt of the manufacturers to reduce their wages, and to revive the tenement house system.

THE Italian papers say that Mr. Gladstone will treat with the Vatican for its support in the efforts being made to obtain autonomy for Ireland, Mgr. Persico having begun the negotiations.

THE empress of Russia, on her fortieth birthday, November 27th, received an emerald necklace composed of forty stones, which had been collected during the past two years at an immense expense.

THE Liverpool Journal of Commerce says that "one of the most startling and important inventions of the day" for propelling vessels by steam is now being considered, and £100,000 hav been offered for the patent.

THE book and job printers' strike at Chicago has ended and the defeated strikers are returning to work. The non-union men are being discharged as fast as the strikers return, notwithstanding most of the employing printers swore that not a man who came to their aid should be discharged to make room for a striker.

IN the midst of revolting daily reports of the cruelest oppressions of the Russian government, and wholesale barbarous punishment of all the patriots who attempt resistance or revolution, and even of their families, distant relativs, and all suspected of possible connection with them, our government maintains the most warm and respectful relations with that power, condoles with it at the removal of a czar, and now fashionable American society has entered upon a furore of admiration of everything Russian—Russian literature, Russian fashions, Russian names; and prazdniks, or Russian fêtes, with profuse decorations of interblended Russian and American flags, are "all the rage."

Gems of Thought.

IT seems to be thought of a thousand times more importance to instruct the people how to dress a kid in its mother's milk, in what fashion the priests should cut them open, and how they should sprinkle the blood of bullocks and rams on their right thumbs, their right big toes, on the tips of their ears and all over their garments, than to tell how to construct good carriage-roads, or how to build comfortable dwellings.—D. M. Bennett.

THE outside of Socrates was that of a satyr and buffoon, but his soul was all virtue, and from within him came such divine and pathetic things as pierced the heart, and drew tears from the hearers.—Plato.

IF the judges be unable to giv a just judgment about the causes that come before them (which case is not unfrequent in human affairs), let them send the causes undetermined to the holy city, and then let the high priest, the prophet, and the sanhedrim determin as it shall seem good to them. But let not a single witness be credited, but let them be three, or two at the least, and those such whose testimony is confirmed by their good lives. But let not the testimony of a woman be admitted, on account of the laxity and boldness of their sex: nor let servants [slaves, bond slaves?] be admitted to giv testimony, on account of the ignobility of their soul; since it is probable that they may not speak truth, either out of hope of gain or fear of punishment. But if anyone be believed to hav borne false witness, let him, when he is convicted, suffer all the same punishments which he against whom he bore witness was to hav suffered.—Josephus's Antiquities of the Jews.

JOSEPH MEETETH HIS FATHER.

And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while.—Gen. xlvi, 29.

Odds and Ends.

IT is easy enough to pay fifteen cents a drink for whisky; but when it comes to buying shoes for the baby and that sort of thing, it beats all how the money slips away.

THERE are certain ties that knit us together in one common humanity. We believe that Herbert Spencer would take a real red-hot human interest in chucking bean-bags at a hole in a board, if a reasonably pretty girl undertook to teach him the game.

THE satirist makes no fun of the father-in-law. He can't. The subject's attitude is too sympathetic. The father-in-law meets the young man on the threshold of matrimony and welcomes him into the family with a weary wink; and as the years go on they understand one another better and better.

ONE day Gracie and auntie were speaking of an uncle who had died before Gracie was born. "Uncle John loved little children dearly," said auntie. "If he were alive he would be very kind to you. He would giv you ever so many playthings." "Well, never mind, auntie, if he is dead I shall see him when I get to heaven. We've got him saved up down in the cemetery, havn't we?"

"WELL, my son, what did you learn at Sunday-school to-day?" asked Johnny's mamma. "O mamma! sich lots of things the teacher told us. She told us about a man who preached so long the people went to sleep and one of them fell out the window and broke his neck, and they went and gathered up the fragments, and they were twelve baskets full! and—and—they fed 'em to a herd of swine that ran violently—that ran away!"

HARRY is frequently so sleepy at nights that it is hard work for him to say his prayers. On one or two occasions his mother had felt obliged to spur him on to greater energy by telling him to speak up so that "God and she could hear him." She was recently somewhat shocked after one of her repeated admonitions to hear him say, straightening himself up in bed, "O mother, you and God just make me tired!"

PATRICK (landed by shipwreck on a strange isle): "Phat sort of government hav yez here?" Nativ: "We hav no government at all." P.: "Phat sort of religions hav yez?" N.: "None." P.: "No Orangemen?" N.: "Not one." P.: "Yez hav landlords maybe?" N.: "Not one." P.: "No rints?" N.: "Every man owns the place he livs on." P.: "Man, man! Would yez be afther runnin' in Sunday on a poor, iggerant fellow-craitchure sivin days in the wake? Sure whin do the nixt shtamer be lavin'? This is no place for the loikes of me!"

YOUNG doctor: "You workingmen are not the only ones who require sympathy. Look at our case. We are half of us starving." Labor leader: "What's the matter?" Young doctor: "In the first place, there are too many of us." Labor leader: "Well, get a law passed limiting the number of students at the colleges." Young doctor: "But that isn't all. The fashionable people hav taken to walking for their health, and now our patients never get sick." Labor leader: "That's an outrage. Get a law passed to prohibit aristocrats from walking."

A SPECIMEN of Katie's faith in the efficacy of prayer shows that she believes in faith with works. She and a little companion had got locked into the bath-room, and after long and fruitless efforts to unlock the door, Katie proposed a prayer for deliverance, which she immediately began, but after first directing her little fellow-captiv to make, while the prayer was under way, a vigorous and industrious use of a screw-driver, which they had got hold of. "The door come wide open," said Katie. "But why didn't you use the screw-driver and let Mary do the praying?" "Cos she can't pray 's well 's I can—and she can use screw-drivers."

A LARGE number of Chicago girls met one evening last week for the purpose of forming a "ladies' anti-slang society." The meeting was called to order and Miss Sadie de Pork elected president. Before taking her seat she said in a clear, calm, well-modulated voice: "Really, girls, I'm too badly rattled by the honor conferred upon me to giv you much of my guff. It's the first time I ever tumbled to anything of this sort and I hardly know just how to catch on. However, I'll try to be sufficiently up to snuff not to let any flies light on me while doing the president-of-this-society-act. I'm with you in this move and don't any of you forget it. All over our land slang words and phrases are multiplying like fleas in sorghum time, and it is our duty to help knock this crying evil as silly as possible. Let our motto be, 'Shoot the slangist.'"

CHRISTIANITY teaches that woman is man's inferior, and enjoins submission on her part. Both the Old and New Testaments teach this. The New Testament teaches that as the church is subject to Christ, so should wives be subject to their husbands in everything (Eph. v, 22, 23); that the husband is head of the woman as Christ is head of the church; that a woman should not be permitted to speak in public, but to be under obedience, as also saith the law; that a woman should not be permitted to teach, but to learn in silence, with all subjection, for the reason that "Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression" (1 Timothy ii, 11-15). Materialists, on the other hand, rejecting the teachings of Moses and Paul, say that woman is man's equal and companion, and that there should be no feeling of superiority or inferiority on account of sex.—Underwood's Materialism and Christianity.

AMONG those who hav been obliged to abandon not only the Trinitarian conception of Jesus, but the supernatural conception of him, even in the mildest form, I often notice what I think Dr. Channing would call "a swollen way of talking about Jesus," if he were with us now. It is the talk of men who do not wish to be left behind by supernaturalists in their verbal homage of Jesus. So they reiterate that Jesus was the greatest of mankind. They call him the ideal man, the perfect man, and so on. Now, if there is anything that I despise, it is the disposition which many persons manifest to disparage greatness. For myself, I love to believe in greatness and to rejoice in it. But I cannot see that our knowledge of Jesus and of all other men is so exhaustiv that we hav a right to predicate his absolute superiority over all other men. I see that, in the evolution of history, his is the most commanding position and the most stupendous influence ever exerted by one man, but concerning his moral perfectness I do not care to dogmatize. I know that if the record is trustworthy, he did not consider himself perfect. He was baptized in Jordan, confessing his sins. [And, again, did he not challenge the propriety of the epithet "good" as applied to himself?] "Why callest thou me good?"—Chadwick. [NOTE.—The record nowhere asserts that Jesus confessed his sins on the occasion of his baptism. The remark is a general one, but not specially applied to the individual. As to Christ's repudiation of the epithet "good" much might be said. On the assumption that he was "very God of very good,' the rejection of the young man's compliment is inexplicable and capricious, and even on the supposition that he was a mere man—and that is all that Chadwick claims for him—it was a case of captiousness or affectation. As to Christ's being "without sin," there can be no doubt of the orthodoxy of the sentiment. It goes without saying that if he was not "without sin," he could not make atonement for the sins of others. Besides, do we not read that he was free from all sin, in Hebrews iv, 14? That ought to settle the point with those who believe that the scripture, etc., and that the Hebrews are scripture; but the discussion is a useless one, and I shall let it drop. If Jesus was God, of course he was without sin; if a man, he must hav had a man's infirmities, weaknesses, and sins.—Hylax.]

To argue with a man who has renounced the use and authority of reason, is like administering medicin to the dead.—Thomas Paine.

CATHOLICISM

Notes and Clippings.

THE Cincinnati Musicians' Protective Union has decided that no member shall play in an orchestra with women under penalty of expulsion, and a fine of $100 if he applies for reinstatement.

IT is recorded as a remarkable fact that the Rev. Dr. Dewitt Talmage dictates his sermons to his secretary at the rate of 150 words a minute. This is nothing, says the World, to the activity he disp ays when delivering a sermon. He can, at a crisis, make 238 gestures a minute and never turn a hair.

THE intelligence of the colored guardian of hats at the door of a Washington hotel during the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance attracted the attention of a minister. "How did you know," asked the wondering delegate, as he received his hat on coming out of the dining-room, "that this was my hat?" "I didn't know it wuz your hat," was the quick response; "I only knows it wuz de hat you gub me."

THE announcement that the gigantic Lick telescope on Mount Hamilton, in California, is at last ready for its work of exploring the heavens will interest many people besides the astronomers. This is the greatest refracting telescope in the world, and now that its maker, Alvan Clark, is dead, there is very little probability that it will ever hav a rival, unless some unexpected discovery should greatly advance the art of telescope-making It is to be hoped that this wonderful glass will be used to better purpose than most great telescopes serve to-day. If Mr. Lick's money could hav provided a new Herschel as well as a mighty telescope, we should now expect to hear interesting news from the sky.—Sun.

THE Flatonia Argus is glad to see that the Galveston News commends the action of Attorney-General Hogg relativ to the enforcement of the Sunday laws in San Antonio, and adds: "It is not a question whether Sunday laws are right or wrong, or whether they infringe on the liberty of the individual, or whether they are constitutional or not, but simply they are laws, and it is the duty of the attorney-general of the state to see them enforced. When the people object to the laws, they hav the power, through their legislativ servants, to repeal them."

WE find this quoted in the Galveston Daily News from the Lufkin Leader: "Texas needs a legislature that will repeal about half the laws now existing and pass a few practical, common-sense laws in their stead. What is the use of having laws that are never enforced? If the Sunday law cannot be enforced in Texas, it ought to be repealed. We can hardly see the use of a Sunday law, anyway. The man who will not respect the divine laws which forbid the breaking of the Sabbath cannot be expected to regard a human law, when the crime is not punishable beyond a small fine."

A PARIS Socialist the other day went into the office of the mayor of the Eleventh arrondissement and asked to see the register of births. He had just been made the happy father of a daughter. To the usual question as to the name of the child he declared she was to be called "Egalite." The clerk said that by the law of the French capital that name was illegal. A lively conversation ensued, during which the Socialist declared he had taken a triple oath to the effect that if he had three daughters, their names should be Liberte, Egalite, and Fraternite, respectivly. Liberte had been born and christened in the provinces, and now Egalite had come.

WRITING of a beatific vision said to hav been seen recently by the worshipers in a Catholic church, a correspondent of the Home Journal recalls the story of the old Roman Catholic, Bishop Milner, to whom a lady devotee recounted certain wonderful visions she was wont to see, winding up with the apostrophe, "O father! aren't they blessed, aren't they wonderful, isn't it a great privilege to be so favored?" Whereupon the bishop replied: "Very beautiful, very blessed, and, as you say, it is a great privilege to be so favored; but, my dear child, don't you think you had better take a little blue pill?"

ALL the French printers in Quebec are on strike for nine hours per day and increased wages. They are backed by the Knights of Labor. Some of the French papers hav temporarily suspended publication, and the others print half-sheets only. The publishers are determined to stand out, and they hav the sympathy and encouragement of the Catholic church authorities. The strike has given rise to fierce attacks upon Cardinal Gibbons's advocacy of the Knights of Labor in the French papers, which are regarded as the principal organs of Cardinal Taschereau. The Canadian says: "What is now going on here proves how right Cardinal Taschereau was in executing the orders of the court of Rome. He condemned the organization of the Knights of Labor in Canada. Other influences temporarily prevailed. Cardinal Gibbons feared the consequences of a difference with the Irish Catholics of the United States, and his representations were heard at the Vatican. He has rendered a sad service to Canada and to America."

THE following list of a clergyman's duties is given by a church paper: "An average of, at least, five hours a day hard study; three to four hours visiting; attending from thirty to one hundred and fifty funerals per annum, each requiring visits upon the family before and after service; the service itself, with the preparation, requiring the greater part of an afternoon, with subsequent visits to the afflicted; attention to from ten to fifty interruptions in the course of a day; two discourses on the holy Sabbath; the visit to the Sabbath-school, with an address, and in many cases teaching of a Bible class; attendance upon thirty to sixty business meetings per annum; the burden of remembering the names of the entire flock, from the infant in arms to the most aged, remote, and infrequent attendant, and of keeping a correct record of their places of residence; to be ready to speak upon all kinds of philanthropic subjects; to confer with the agents of every benevolent cause; to be adviser-general of strangers and young people; to listen to the tales of all who are in distress; to compose feuds; to prevent misunderstandings; to suggest new departures." The editor, who is also a preacher, concludes that all this makes up a pretty hard life. He does not suggest, as he might hav done, that the clergy could avoid this laborious life by entering upon some useful calling.

The Stage and the Pulpit.

AN INTERVIEW WITH COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, IN WHICH HE GIVES HIS OPINION OF THE COMPARATIVE MERITS OF THE STAGE AND THE PULPIT, OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, OF THE TRIAL OF THE CHICAGO ANARCHISTS, AND OF OTHER INTERESTING THINGS

Question. What do you think of the Methodist minister at Nashville, Tenn., who, from his pulpit, denounced the theatrical profession, without exception, as vicious, and of the congregation which passed resolutions condemning Miss Emma Abbott for rising in church and contradicting him, and of the Methodist bishop who likened her to a "painted courtesan," and invoked the aid of the law "for the protection of public worship" against "strolling players?"

Answer. The Methodist minister of whom you speak without doubt uttered his real sentiments. The church has always regarded the stage as a rival, and all its utterances have been as malicious as untrue. It has always felt that the money given to the stage was in some way taken from the pulpit. It is on this principle that the pulpit wishes everything, except the church, shut up on Sunday. It knows that it cannot stand free and open competition.

All well-educated ministers know that the Bible suffers by a comparison with Shakespeare. They know that there is nothing within the lids of what they call "the sacred book" that can for one moment stand side by side with "Lear," or "Hamlet," or "Julius Cæsar," or "Antony and Cleopatra," or with any other play written by the immortal man. They know what a poor figure the Davids, and the Abrahams, and the Jeremiahs, and the Lots, the Jonahs, the Jobs, and the Noahs cut when on the stage with the great characters of Shakespeare. For these reasons, among others, the pulpit is malicious and hateful when it thinks of the glories of the stage. What minister is there now living who could command the prices commanded by Edwin Booth or Joseph Jefferson; and what two clergymen, by making a combination, could contend successfully with Robson and Crane? How many clergymen would it take to command, at regular prices, the audiences that attend the presentation of Wagner's operas?

It is very easy to see why the pulpit attacks the stage. Nothing could have been in more wretched taste than for the minister to condemn Miss Emma Abbott for rising in church and defending not only herself, but other good women who are doing honest work for an honest living. Of course, no minister wishes to be answered; no minister wishes to have any one in the congregation call for the proof. A few questions would break up all the theology in the world. Ministers can succeed only when congregations keep silent. Where superstition succeeds, doubt must be dumb.

The Methodist bishop who attacked Miss Abbott simply repeated the language of several centuries ago. In the laws of England actors were described as "sturdy vagrants," and this bishop calls them "strolling players." If we only had some strolling preachers like Garrick, like Edwin Forrest, or Booth and Barrett, or Haworth, or some crusade sisters like Mrs. Siddons, or Madam Ristori, or Charlotte Cushman, or Madam Modjeska, how fortunate the church would be!

Question. What is your opinion of the relative merits of the pulpit and the stage, preachers and actors?

Answer. We must remember that the stage presents an ideal life. It is a world controlled by the imagination—a world in which the justice delayed in real life may be done, and in which that may happen which, according to the highest ideal, should happen. It is a world, for the most part, in which evil does not succeed, in which the vicious are foiled, in which the right, the honest, the sincere, and the good prevail. It cultivates the imagination, and in this respect is far better than the pulpit. The mission of the pulpit is to narrow and shrivel the human mind. The pulpit denounces the freedom of thought and of expression; but on the stage the mind is free, and for thousands of years the poor, the oppressed, the enslaved, have been permitted to witness plays wherein the slave was freed, wherein the oppressed became the victor, and where the downtrodden rose supreme.

And there is another thing. The stage has always laughed at the spirit of caste. The low-born lass has loved the prince. All human distinctions in this ideal world have for the moment vanished, while honesty and love have triumphed. The stage lightens the cares of life. The pulpit increases the tears and groans of man. There is this difference: the pretense of honesty and the honesty of pretense.

Question. How do you view the Episcopalian scheme of building a six-million-dollar untaxed cathedral in this city for the purpose of "uniting the sects," and, when that is accomplished, "unifying the world in the love of Christ," and thereby abolishing misery?

Answer. I regard the building of an Episcopalian cathedral simply as a piece of religious folly. The world will never be converted by Christian palaces and temples. Every dollar used in its construction will be wasted. It will have no tendency to unite the various sects; on the contrary, it will excite the envy and jealousy of every other sect. It will widen the gulf between the Episcopalian and the Methodist, between the Episcopalian and the Presbyterian, and this hatred will continue until the other sects build a cathedral just a little larger, and then the envy and the hatred will be on the other side.

Religion will never unify the world, and never will give peace to mankind. There has been more war in the last 1800 years than during any similar period within historic times. War will be abolished, if it ever is abolished, not by religion, but by intelligence. It will be abolished when the poor people of Germany, of France, of Spain, of England, and other countries find that they have no interest in war. When those who pay, and those who do the fighting, find that they are simply destroying their own interests, wars will cease.

There ought to be a national court to decide national difficulties. We consider a community civilized when the individuals of that community submit their differences to a legal tribunal; but there being no national court, nations now sustain, as to each other, the relation of savages—that is to say, each one must defend its rights by brute force. The establishment of a national court civilizes nations, and tends to do away with war.

Christianity caused so much war, so much bloodshed, that Christians were forced to interpolate a passage to account for their history, and the interpolated passage is, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." Suppose that all the money wasted in cathedrals in the Middle Ages had been used for the construction of school-houses, academies, and universities, how much better the world would have been! Suppose that instead of supporting hundreds of thousands of idle priests, the money had been given to men of science for the purpose of finding out something of benefit to the human race here in this world.

Question. What is your opinion of "Christian charity" and the "fatherhood of God" as an economic polity for abolishing poverty and misery?

Answer. Of course, the world is not to be civilized, and clothed, and fed through charity. Ordinary charity creates more want than it alleviates. The greatest possible charity is the greatest possible justice. When proper wages are paid, when every one is as willing to give what a thing is worth as he is now willing to get it for less, the world will be fed and clothed.

I believe in helping people to help themselves. I believe that corporations, and successful men, and superior men intellectually, should do all within their power to keep from robbing their fellow-men. The superior man should protect the inferior. The powerful should be the shield of the weak. To-day it is, for the most part, exactly the other way. The failures among men become the food of success.

The world is to grow better and better through intelligence, through a development of the brain, through taking advantage of the forces of nature, through science, through chemistry, and through the arts. Religion can do nothing except to sow the seeds of discord between men and nations. Commerce, manufactures, and the arts tend to peace and the well-being of the world. What is known as religion—that is to say, a system by which this world is wasted in preparation for another—a system in which the duties of man are greater to God than to his fellow-men—a system that denies the liberty of thought and expression—tends only to discord and retrogression. Of course, I know that religious people cling to the Bible on account of the good that is in it, and in spite of the bad, and I know that Freethinkers throw away the Bible on account of the bad that is in it, in spite of the good. I hope the time will come when that book will be treated like other books, and will be judged upon its merits, apart from the fiction of inspiration. The church has no right to speak of charity, because it is an object of charity itself. It gives nothing; all it can do is to receive. At best, it is only a respectable beggar. I never cared to hear one who receives alms pay a tribute to charity. The one who gives alms should pay this tribute. The amount of money expended upon churches, and priests, and all the paraphernalia of superstition, is more than enough to drive the wolves from the doors of the world.

Question. Have you noticed the progress Catholics are making in the Northwest, discontinuing public schools, and forcing people to send their children to the parochial schools; also, at Pittsburgh, Pa., a Roman Catholic priest has been elected principal of a public school, and he has appointed nuns as assistant teachers?

Sectarian schools ought not to be supported by public taxation. It is the very essence of religious tyranny to compel a Methodist to support a Catholic school, or to compel a Catholic to support a Baptist academy. Nothing should be taught in the public schools that the teachers do not know. Nothing should be taught about any religion, and nothing should be taught that can, in any way, be called sectarian. The sciences are not religious. There is no such thing as Methodist mathematics or Baptist botany. In other words, no religion has anything to do with facts. The facts are all secular; the sciences are all of this world. If Catholics wish to establish their own schools for the purpose of preserving their ignorance, they have the right to do so; so has any other denomination. But in this country, the State has no right to teach any form of religion whatever. Persons of all religions have the right to become citizens, and citizens have the right to advocate and defend any religion in which they believe, or they have the right to denounce all religions. If the Catholics establish parochial schools, let them support such schools; and if they do, they will simply lessen or shorten the longevity of that particular superstition. It has often been said that nothing will repeal a bad law as quickly as its enforcement. So, in my judgment, nothing will destroy any church as certainly, and as rapidly, as for the members of that church to live squarely up to the creed. The church is indebted to its hypocrisy to-day for its life. No orthodox church in the United States dare meet for the purpose of revising the creed. They know that the whole thing would fall in pieces.

Nothing could be more absurd than for a Roman Catholic priest to teach a public school, assisted by nuns. The Catholic church is the enemy of human progress; it teaches every man to throw away his reason, to deny his observation and experience.

Question. Your opinions have frequently been quoted with regard to the Anarchists—with regard to their trial and execution. Have you any objection to stating your real opinion in regard to the matter?

Not the least. I am perfectly willing that all civilized people should know my opinions on any question in which others than myself can have any interest.

I was anxious, in the first place, that the Anarchists have a fair and impartial trial. The worst form of anarchy is when a judge violates his conscience and bows to a popular demand. A court should care nothing for public opinion. An honest judge decides the law, not as it ought to be, but as it is, and the state of the public mind throws no light upon the question of what the law then is.

I thought that some of the rulings on the trial of the Anarchists were contrary to law. I think so still. I have read the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, and while the conclusion reached by that tribunal is the law of that case, I was not satisfied with the reasons given, and do not regard the opinion as good law. There is no place for an Anarchist in the United States. There is no excuse for any resort to force; and it is impossible to use language too harsh or too bitter in denouncing the spirit of Anarchy in this country. But, no matter how bad a man is, he has the right to be fairly tried; and if he cannot be fairly tried, then there is anarchy on the bench. So I was opposed to the execution of those men. I thought it would have been far better to commute the punishment to imprisonment, and I said so; and I not only said so, but I wrote a letter to Governor Oglesby, in which I urged the commutation of the death sentence. In my judgment, a great mistake was made. I am on the side of mercy, and if I ever make mistakes, I hope they will all be made on that side. I have not the slightest sympathy with the feeling for revenge. Neither have I ever admitted, and I never shall, that every citizen has not the right to give his opinion on all that may be done by any servant of the people, by any judge, or by any court, by any officer—however small or however great. Each man in the United States is a sovereign, and a king can freely speak his mind.

Words were put in my mouth that I never uttered with regard to the Anarchists. I never said that they were saints, or that they would be martyrs. What I said was, that they would be regarded as saints and martyrs by many people if they were executed, and that has happened which I said would happen. I am, so far as I know, on the side of the right. I wish, above all things, for the preservation of human liberty. This government is the best, and we should not lose confidence in liberty. Property is of very little value in comparison with freedom. A civilization that rests on slavery is utterly worthless. I do not believe in sacrificing all there is of value in the human heart, or in the human brain, for the preservation of what is called property, or rather, on account of the fear that what is called "property" may perish. Property is in no danger while man is free. It is the freedom of man that gives value to property. It is the happiness of the human race that creates what we call value. If we preserve liberty, the spirit of progress, the conditions of develment, property will take care of itself.

Question. The Christian press during the past few months has been very solicitous as to your health, and has reported you weak and feeble physically, and not only so, but asserts that there is a growing disposition on your part to lay down your arms, and even to join the church.

Answer. I do not think the Christian press has been very solicitous about my health. Neither do I think that my health will ever add to theirs. The fact is, I am exceedingly well, and my throat is better than it has been for many years. Any one who imagines that I am disposed to lay down my arms can read my Reply to Dr. Field in the November number of the North American Review. I see no particular difference in myself, except this: that my hatred of superstition becomes a little more and more intense; on the other hand, I see more clearly, that all the superstitions were naturally produced, and I am now satisfied that every man does as he must, including priests and editors of religious papers.

This gives me hope for the future. We find that certain soil, with a certain amount of moisture and heat, produces good corn, and we find when the soil is poor, or when the ground is too wet, or too dry, that no amount of care can, by any possibility, produce good corn. In other words, we find that the fruit, that is to say, the result, whatever it may be, depends absolutely upon the conditions. This being so, we will in time find out the conditions that produce good, intelligent, honest men. This is the hope for the future. We will know better than to rely on what is called reformation, or regeneration, or a resolution born of ignorant excitement. We will rely, then, on the eternal foundation—the fact in nature—that like causes produce like results, and that good conditions will produce good people.

Question. Every now and then some one challenges you to a discussion, and nearly every one who delivers lectures, or speeches, attacking you, or your views, says that you are afraid to publicly debate these questions. Why do you not meet these men, and why do you not answer these attacks?

In the first place, it would be a physical impossibility to reply to all the attacks that have been made—to all the "answers." I receive these attacks, and these answers, and these lectures almost every day. Hundreds of them are delivered every year. A great many are put in pamphlet form, and, of course, copies are received by me. Some of them I read, at least I look them over, and I have never yet received one worthy of the slightest notice, never one in which the writer showed the slightest appreciation of the questions under discussion. All these pamphlets are about the same, and they could, for that matter, have all been produced by one person. They are impudent, shallow, abusive, illogical, and in most respects ignorant. So far as the lecturers are concerned, I know of no one who has yet said anything that challenges a reply. I do not think a single paragraph has been produced by any of the gentlemen who have replied to me in public, that is now remembered by reason of its logic or its beauty. I do not feel called upon to answer any argument that does not at least appear to be of value. Whenever any article appears worthy of an answer, written in a kind and candid spirit, it gives me pleasure to reply.

I would like to meet some one who speaks by authority, some one who really understands his creed, but I cannot afford to waste time on little priests, or obscure parsons, or ignorant laymen.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.

If cleanliness be not exactly godliness, a familiar proverb makes these two qualities very nearly akin. A "dirty saint" is an anomaly and a contradiction of terms. The present inhabitants of the "Holy Land," if we may believe the reports of modern travelers, are not remarkable for the virtue of cleanliness. On the contrary, ophthalmia, leprosy, and other skin diseases abound there as in former times. We read that Naaman the Syrian was a mighty man of valor, but he was a leper. He was also a rich man, but he had an unwholesome dread of soap and water. When he sent to Elisha for relief, the prophet's simple prescription was, "Go and wash," and to insure the operation being thoroughly performed, he was to do it seven times over. The remedy was effectual, the most marvelous part of it being that Naaman had never thought of or tried it before. It is usual in the present day to consult all kinds of doctors before following the dictates of common sense. I hav consulted no other doctor for more than forty years, and during the whole of that time hav never had an ailment! The translators of the New Testament adopted the words "baptism" and "baptist" from the original Greek, because they supposed they had no English equivalent. This was a mistake, and it has led to a number of errors and malpractices. "John the Washerman" would hav been literally correct, but if they had said, "John the Sanitary Reformer," it would hav been more elegant and equally appropriate. When a pauper is admitted to the casual ward of a London workhouse, the first thing done is to administer a bath. He is literally baptized by immersion, which, if it does not wash away his sins, at least removes some of the impurities of his body. The effect of this, no doubt, on some, is to produce a "heavenly" feeling of cleanliness and comfort; but it is a fraud and fatal mistake to suppose that this heavenly feeling will remain, or that, being once washed, the effect will last through a lifetime. It is best to repeat the dose every twenty-four hours, and never to neglect it even in the coldest of weather. Crede experto. I hav tried it, can speak from experience; and laugh the doctors to scorn.

John the Baptist was an eccentric, as most reformers are, but he inaugurated a good work, which the Christians hav travestied and explained away. They hav converted baptism into a religious rite, and the priests are the only qualified washermen. This would be all very well if the priests did their duty, but they do not. In most of the churches, if a dirty person goes to be baptized they merely sprinkle a few drops of water on his face, and say the thing is done. This would be manifestly insufficient even if it were repeated every day, which it is not. One such a farce is sufficient for a lifetime, and common sense tells us it is one too many.

About forty years ago, an English gentleman, having more money than wit, offered a prize of a thousand pounds for the best picture representing the baptism of Christ in Jordan. He thought so handsome a sum would induce first-class artists to enter into the competition, but was disappointed. The figures of naked men are not so attractiv as those of naked women. A few big canvases were sent in, but one and all were pronounced to be miserable failures. I saw the one supposed to be the best, but it did not gain the prize. It was a Protestant version of a papal altar-piece. The heads of the disciples looking on were evidently models from deacons and pastors of some Baptist or Congregational church—smug, smooth-shaven, and sanctimonious. Spurgeon was young and unknown at the time, or he would probably hav posed for John the Baptist, who in this case bore some resemblance to Moffat the missionary. As for Jesus—an imbecil-looking young man, with the brain capacity of a dude, his hands folded meekly over his breast, standing knee-deep in the water, whilst John is pouring it on from a small and shallow basin. If that was the way John baptized, he did not half do it. Perhaps the artist meant to imply that Jesus, being of course a clean subject, required only mild treatment; but most of John's converts must hav required a good scrubbing and plenty of water.

John's baptism was no doubt well intended and useful as far as it went, but it did not go far enough. Like a modern religious revival, the effect soon went off—"the dog returned to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire." In a few weeks, at most, John's converts were as dirty as ever. He foresaw this, and warned them that his successor would baptize them with fire. "I indeed baptize you with water." John used cold water as a detergent, but if that did not suffice, Jesus would make it hot for them. If correctly reported, Jesus talked a great deal about fire and brimstone, but did not use it. His bark was worse than his bite. The baptism of fire was not administered by his disciples until many years after his death, perhaps not until the invention of gunpowder. But they have been using it ever since.

OUTIS.

To the Sabbatarians.

From the New York Star.

A scene was enacted in the Jefferson market police court on Wednesday which was a disgrace to the intelligence and civilization of New York.

Five citizens were arraigned for violation of the Sunday law, that ridiculous relic of Blue-nosed barbarism.

The first case called was that of the proprietor of the Eden Musee, who was charged with exhibiting wax figures of great historical value and considerable artistic merit, and of permitting a first-class orchestra to play on the premises. The policeman who made the complaint testified that there was a large number of well-dressed and respectable people present who enjoyed the entertainment in a highly decorous manner.

Of course there was. What more rational way of spending a Sunday afternoon with one's wife and children than in familiarizing them with the great men and good music of all countries? And bravo! policeman, for keeping your eyes open and testifying in the interests of the people. Complaint dismissed.

The next "case" related to Munkacsy's "Christ on Calvary," exhibited for a small fee in a house of worship. Here again the policeman "saw nothing to offend good taste or decency"—God save the mark!—and the visitors to the Tabernacle were also respectable and well-behaved. There was no music. Complaint dismissed.

Complaint No. 3 alleged that a man played the "Cujus Animam" and an "Ave Maria" on a cornet at Koster & Bial's. He stood on a platform which had no stage accessories. The listeners were orderly and edified. Complaint dismissed.

Case four was against the Architectural League of New York for exhibiting drawings, sketches, plans, and specifications. A few very respectable people were present, who seemed capable of restraining their hilarity, and were probably the families of the very eminent gentlemen who compose the League. Complaint dismissed.

The last "violation" of law passed upon had reference to Makart's celebrated painting, the "Five Senses." As no judge in his seven senses could consider such a complaint, this one also was promptly dismissed.

Now, what is all this worth? What are you Sabbatarians aiming at that you instigate an espionage of the very proper and innocent pleasures of our wives and children, and lay information against respectable citizens which brings them within the nauseating atmosphere of the police court, and puts them to great inconvenience and expense?

What good do you hope to accomplish? Which sin do you combat, which virtue typify, when you busy yourself with the Sunday recreations of your neighbor?

You must be perfectly well aware that you are doing infinitly more harm than good. You are arousing an intense feeling of hostility to even what is good in your convictions and precepts. You are straining the relations of the police to the cause of order and good public morals, and are bringing the administration of justice into ridicule and contempt. It does not giv the citizen a more exalted view of his relations to God and man to hav you hound him because he will not say "Ay, ay," and "No, no," when you do.

It does not sanctify the Lord's day to make the community laugh and chaff at your bigoted schemes to keep it holy. And it surely does serious injury to the efficiency of the police to cause them to make arrests which they know cannot be sustained in court.

If this town, with its thousands of churches and Sunday-schools, and the few innocent Sunday amusements that are left to it, is too vicious, too rowdy, too noisy, too irreligious for you so-called Sabbatarians, then, in the name of the mercy you lack, leave it. You hav finally tired us to death.

Church and Czar in Russia.

A Russian doing business on Broadway, New York, the other day laughed while reading a cable dispatch from London that "public opinion in Russia is in favor of peace." "Why," said he, "there is no such thing in Russia as public opinion, and we Russians laugh at the ignorance which can speak of it. There may be a thousand men in all the Russian empire who are permitted to form a few opinions on some political question, but they are the official or military servants of the czar, and echo his opinions. I find it a great luxury in this country to be an element of public opinion."

HERE is further testimony to the efficacy of the faith-cure, brought to our notice by the Tribune: "Not long ago a man in Wisconsin got up before a large audience and claimed to hav had eyesight restored to an eye which had been put out in his youth. The story was the talk of the day in the region where it was told, but the sequel was not so widely published. The man was sent to a lunatic asylum within three months, and at the time he made his statement was undoubtedly the victim of hallucination."

Gone West.

DEAR GENE: I presume it is not necessary for me to apprise you that I hav left New York. You remember the 16th of December; the handshake all around with the boys in the office; the little dinner at Mouquin's, where you, and Mr. Putnam, and Counselor Sherman, and Harry Thomas sat down, and Captain Smith of the Gil Blas dropped in to say good luck. Then the hurried skip to the cars, the last grasp and shake of the hand, and good-bye to New York.

My companion on this trip is Mr. Putnam—the genial Samuel P.—and if he had not been along with me I do not believe I should hav had half so much fun. Our destination was San Francisco, Cal., and as we boarded the cars I noticed that Mr. Putnam escorted a valise far disproportionate to his stature, and having lifted it I agreed at once that he should hav all the enjoyment to be derived from carrying it all the way. With this arrangement we got along first-rate for a while. But I may as well say here, that at Chicago he invested me with a satchel of books weighing about one hundred pounds, and after that our friendly relations were somewhat strained, particularly at the elbow joints.

The cars that run by night on the Ontario and Western railroad are provided with seats that go down behind and rise up in front like a dentist's chair, so that the passenger, if he is sufficiently exhausted, may drop from consciousness to nightmare without the expense of a berth in a sleeping car. The chair I captured did not fit me, and as the condnctor would not allow my feet to occupy the seat forward of me, my slumber was not sweet. Putnam, being of shorter build, fared better, and composing his countenance into a cherubic smile, he slept the sleep that knows no waking except the call of incense-breathing morn, or the conductor looking for tickets. A night and a day found us at Niagara. I was prepared to be astonished at the marvels of that place, but after I had paid sixty cents for a plate of corned beef and beans, I grew callous and learned not to be astonished at anything. I would advise all persons visiting the falls to look at the scenery before entering into any financial transactions with the nativs. The price of corned beef and beans at that place throws all the natural wonders into the blank of commonplace.

We crossed the Niagara river on a suspension bridge, one end of which rests on Canadian soil. The first conspicuous foreigner we noted was an aged Briton on a roaring spree. This gentleman drew expressions of sympathy from the passengers when he related that he had left his nativ soil in England and traveled three thousand miles to see the falls, and upon arriving there found himself so blind drunk that he couldn't see a demd thing. Likewise he had licked a minister without knowing it, and it augmented his grief and helped to spoil the pleasure of his trip to feel that he had lifted his hand against a preacher of the gospel.

The next event on our route was Chicago. E. A. Stevens got up early Sunday morning to meet us at the depot and to show us the places where we would fare the best. Chicago is a great city, and is aware of that fact. What there is of it is just as big as a portion of New York of the same size. Upon inquiring for a bath-room at the barber shop in the depot, I was shown one and assured that Chicago had the reputation of providing the best plain baths to be found in this country. How one mixture of hot and cold water could surpass another save in cleanliness I did not inquire, but took the bath and went to breakfast. I do not remember the name of the restaurant, but Mr. Stevens told me it was the finest in the country, and I guess he was right. The day being Sunday, we went to the Opera House and heard Mr. Salter discourse before the Ethical Society on the recent discussion between Colonel Ingersoll and the Rev. Mr. Field. The audience was not so large a one as the house would accommodate, and the sermon was less exciting than I expected to hear. Mr. Salter is a learned, polished, and cultured gentleman, and givs evidence of having been expensivly educated. His deportment on the platform is good, and he never so far loses control of himself as to become eloquent. He recited what he termed Dr. Field's strong points, and also what in the light of ethical culture were his weak ones. Then he performed the same service for the colonel, and summed up for both disputants. I think the audience would hav been more edified if Mr. Salter had confined himself to reading the discussion and let his hearers judge for themselvs as to the relativ merits of Presbyterianism and Freethought. I received no new light, and if I had never read the discussion I should not hav had the slightest notion what it was all about. Mr. Putnam awoke much refreshed in season to receive the benediction.

During the day we met Mr. and Mrs. Freeman. Mr. Freeman is a steady, reliable, and useful worker. Mrs. Freeman is a bright and engaging lady, full of enthusiasm. She is shortly to go out upon a lecturing tour, and I should think everybody would want to see and hear her. She is secretary of the Chicago League. And here is a good place to say that we attended a meeting of this League. Mr. Stevens presided, and Mrs. Freeman read the Nine Demands and the minutes of the previous meeting. There was vocal and instrumental music, and a Mr. Zimmerman read a paper on the fallacies of Socialism. The lecture was criticised at the close after the fashion set by the Manhattan Liberal Club. The critics complained that Mr. Zimmerman had failed to inform himself what Socialism was, and therefore was incompetent to discuss it either one way or the other. Professor Orchardson went so far as to say that between him and the lecturer there was a first-class idiot, and he wasn't ready to confess himself one. Mr. Zimmerman bore the adverse remarks with complacency, and if he had been worsted he certainly betrayed no consciousness of it. At this meeting I met Prof. W. S. Bell. I also had a long conversation with a lady believer in Dr. Cyrus Romulus Remus R. Teed. The doctor is printing a magazine in Chicago, and conducts a College of Life with numerous students. I expect that he is a humbug.

If you ever go to Chicago, don't fail to go and see Mr. A. D. O'Neil. If you don't find him at home, wait for him or hunt him up. He took us in his carriage and showed us the glories of the Garden City, for he, like other residents of Chicago, takes pride in the great central metropolis of this country, and I don't wonder at it. Until I reached San Francisco I thought Chicago, next to New York, the finest place in the Union.

The traveler going west from Chicago for the first time naturally looks with some impatience for the Father of Waters, and when he finally crosses a big stream he settles himself back in his seat and says he is west of the Mississippi at last. But he isn't. That big stream is the Illinois river, and the Mississippi is miles away. When he once sees it he can make no mistake. There is but one Mississippi, and it is a fresh-water ocean flowing down to the sea. All other streams are rivulets.

Before we reached Kansas City, Mo., we received an introduction to a blizzard. The storms of the East are summer blows compared with a blizzard. It took just one hour to snow in a freight train just ahead, and for six more hours we waited, while the engin took a few cars at a time and plowed its way to the next station. It was fifteen hours that day between meals.

Kansas City received us one cold, cold night at 12 o'clock—snow to a man's knees, and the thermometer at zero. Across the way from the depot is a hotel. The first thing that greeted us here was a sign reading, "Relief for Kansas sufferers put up in bottles. Take one along." Not being from Kansas, we passed up-stairs. Putnam grabbed the pen to register. The pen fetched the ink-bottle with it, being frozen in, and we scrawled our names with a pencil. In the room assigned us there was a hoary beard around the keyhole, the pitcher was solid ice, and the washbowl a skating rink. We partially undressed, slid between the icy sheets on the bed, and froze up until a slave built a fire in the room next morning and thawed us out. The train was advertised to go at 10 o'clock A.M. At 4 P.M. it went, and all the way across Kansas we had the blizzard with us. If you hav read the news from the West you hav learned that that was the worst storm Kansas ever had. Passengers getting on the train at way stations had stories to tell of men and cattle found in the snow frozen stiff.

The topic of discussion in Kansas is Prohibition. I heard an argument on the subject between a resident and a stranger. The resident had a bottle, which he shared with the stranger, and he got the best both of the bottle and the argument. He was a Prohibitionist, he said, from principle. He had drank Prohibition whisky for fifty-seven years, and it never had hurt him, while a quart he got in Missouri made him sick for a week. Therefore he was in favor of Prohibition, and wished election day came once a month, so he could vote as he prayed, early and often. My observation leads me to conclude that the remark of the governor of North Carolina to the governor of the adjoining state is never heard in Kansas.

The stranger above mentioned was a journalist on his way to southwestern Kansas to start a local paper, and the resident belonged to that part of the state. The latter stated that they had one editor in his locality, but his lot was not an enviable one. He was about as fat as a gray wolf, and had to giv up wearing a watch-chain because it rattled against his backbone. He managed to enjoy one meal a day and get kicked twice, and he counted the kicks for the two other meals.

After we left Kansas and passed through the corner of Colorado into New Mexico, the weather grew warmer, although the altitude was high and the snow-storm still prevailed. At Raton (which is called Ratoon), N. M., we were 6,688 feet above sea level. Then we went down a couple of thousand feet to a plateau. This is the land of fire. The country appears to hav been toyed with by earthquakes and melted by volcanoes until the life was burnt and shaken out of it. Some Indians manage to liv there in their adobe huts. At several villages where we stopped the squaws came scampering up to the train with specimens of volcanic glass, colored stones, and bits of pottery for sale. I saw no Minnehahas among these tan-colored damsels. They were squatty of figure, dull-faced, coarse-haired, greasy, and dirty. When not bare-legged, they wore the male trousers of civilization stuck in moccasins, shirts open from the throat nearly to the waist, and old blankets slung over one shoulder and belted around them. Some of the squaws had babies wrapped up and strapped to a board. It cost five cents to get a good look at the dirty little villains; a smell of them cost nothing, and could not very well be avoided, except by keeping at a distance. Others of these Indian girls trick out in gay-colored finery, and look quite gorgeous, but the railroad men gave me to understand that they were bad squaws. I admire the climate of New Mexico and Arizona, and if a man could subsist on a salubrious atmosphere, that would be a good place to liv, but nothing grows there. It is Gehenna.

Arizona has the same beautiful climate and the same arid soil. It was while going through this territory that I encountered my first cowboy. Four or five men got on the cars at a station called Angell. At Flagstaff they got off and drank bad whisky, until only two were able to board the train. One of these got into a seat across the aisle from mine. He was in a wicked state of mind and stared about him insolently. A few moments after the train got in motion, he stretched himself and observed that it was about time for a little hip-pocket work. He addressed me as "pard" and asked if I wanted to fight. I ignored his inquiry as long as possible, and then said, No. He was equally unsuccessful with several other passengers, some of whom he offered to shoot. Then he returned and lounged across the arm of Putnam's seat facing me. He entreated me to go out and enjoy a little "gun-play" with him. I declined. An offer to enter into a sparring contest met with a similar reception. Then he wanted me to take my valise off Putnam's seat and let him sit down. I wouldn't do it. He followed with requests for a drink, for a feed out of a lunch-basket on my seat, and for the loan of four bits. He got neither. He said perhaps I didn't know what happened to folks who failed to "pungle up" at the request of one of his class of people. I replied that I hadn't the slightest idea. About this time he called me a chub and a tenderfoot. I thought he was growing a trifle fresh and may hav indicated that I was getting weary of his society. He soon left the car. I am a man of peace and dislike violence, but, to tell the truth, I had steeled my heart and resolved to thump him on the nose if he stayed where he was. He saved his nose by going away. I subsequently ascertained that he was a bogus cowboy—that is, he was not a cowboy at all, but the foreman of a gang of section hands on the Santa Fé road. The conductor told me that "tenderfoot" is a fighting word in Arizona, so I kept watch for the cowboy's return, resolved to show him no mercy. I tremble for the result if he had come back. But he didn't. I saw him on the track at Williams, so drunk that he couldn't walk between the rails, and I was satisfied to let tanglefoot avenge the tenderfoot. I met some genuin cowboys. Hale and hearty fellows they were, well dressed, well behaved, and picturesque. It is the bogus cowboy, in a cheap sombrero and full of whisky, that givs the fraternity a bad name.

About the toughest place we struck on our journey was Barstow, in the southern part of this state. Here a bad man, a burly miner he looked like, went strolling up and down the platform of the depot swinging his arms and howling for a fight. A rather slight young fellow dressed in the uniform of the G. A. R. stepped off the palace car and asked what the nativ desired. The nativ said he was offering $50 to any man who would hit him. He was immediately accommodated. The young fellow's fist took him in the chin and he sat down with all his weight. The crowd hooted, and the nativ picked his person off the ground and went away with the look of a man trying to get rid of himself. The victor jumped thrice in the air, emitted a howl of triumph, and retired. I heard that on the other side of the train another nativ was similarly laid out by a passenger to the joy of all beholders.

I reached San Francisco December 26th. It is a great city, a beautiful city. I hav seen little of it, but the seen givs me a good opinion of the unseen. And I am now reminded that I hav so far omitted to tell why I left New York and came West. The truth need not be concealed. I hav embarked in journalism. Mr. Putnam and myself hav begun the publication of a Liberal paper called Freethought. We chose the West, not necessarily because we deemed the East effete, but because there is no Freethought paper on the coast. Besides, we did not want to take all your subscribers away from you. Mr. Putnam will go ringing the word of truth up and down this coast, and I shall edit the paper during his absence. This is quite an important step, but it was not taken without some signs of encouragement. Several of my friends in the East hav promised to read the paper if I will send it to them and pay the postage; and out in Chicago a man said if I ever wanted to return I might call on him and he would giv me a hundred dollars to stay here. Under such conditions it seems to me success is assured. When you come to San Francisco, drop in and see us. We are in the heart of the city—504 Kearny, corner of California street, up two flights, front. If you hav a brother's regard for me you will subscribe for Freethought, a twelve-page paper printed in nice plain type, $2 per annum. All Liberals under whose eye these words may fall are invited to call on us. They may not be able to note the convolutions of the editorial brain, but they can get acquainted. We are always at home.

I remain your affectionate brother,

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Inspiration and Revelation.

Science is classified knowledge. It is only by classifying and comparing phenomena that we can arrive at the truth. "He who knows but one language," says Goethe, "knows none." To this Max Muller adds, "He who knows but one religion, knows none." We cannot tell where religious ideas and doctrins emanate without searching the past, for Christianity is a comparativly modern religion. Others were gray with age ere Christianity was born. The great ethnic or race religions represent man's effort to formulate and enforce the moral law, and all originated in ages when our methods of study were unknown and the sum of human knowledge limited. This earth was supposed to be the center and all-important part of the universe; the sun, moon, and stars, greater or lesser lights hung in the sky. We now know through the teachings of astronomy that all the fixed stars are suns, centers of planetary systems, and that our earth is one of the smaller planets of one of the smaller sun stars—one of millions, and an infinitesimal atom in a universe so grand that the human intellect fails to grasp its immensity—and that this universe is one, governed to its remotest bounds, in its minutest as well as grandest operations, by immutable law. The oldest by far of the great religions of the earth and the grandest in its conceptions is the Brahman or ancient religion of the Hindoos. Here originated the belief in the supreme being, the doctrin of the trinity, the incarnation of the second person of the trinity, the immortality of the soul (which they believed to be the life-spirit, not the mind), inspiration and revelation, good and evil spirits, heaven and hell. Here we hav the foundation and groundwork of all the succeeding religions laid down by those whom we in our ignorance hav been pleased to designate as the "benighted heathen."

The doctrin of inspiration and revelation was first applied to the Rig-veda, the oldest of known books. This, the first of the sacred books of the Brahmans, is a collection of Mantras, or hymns, composed by the Rishis, or seers, under the shadow of the Himalayas in prehistoric times, transmitted by memory until the art of writing was invented, then fixed in the ancient Sanscrit text, and now acessible in good translations. They represent religion in its rudimentary stage when the human intellect was in the infancy of its development. Some of the hymns bear a resemblance to certain psalms in the collection known as David's Psalms. Later the Yagur and Sama-vedas were added, and last of all the Atharva-veda. The Institutes, or laws of Menu, the two great epic poems which contain the descriptions of the incarnation of Vishnu as Rama and Krishna, and other books constitute the Brahman Bible, held by them in the greatest reverence as a divine revelation.

The origin of a religion is always followed by a flood of religious literature by its devotees. It was so with Buddhism, which originated from the teachings of Sakyamuni about five hundred years before our era. A council of the Buddhist church, called after the death of its founder, formed the canon of scripture constituting the Tripitaka, the Buddhist Bible, revered as an inspired revelation. The Persians had their Bible, the Zend-Avesta; the Jews theirs; the Christians theirs, selected by a church council from a mass of pious literature, now mostly lost—gospels, acts, and epistles without number. The Mohammedans hav their Koran, and the Mormons the book of Mormon; the followers of Swedenborg, the Arcana Cœlestea.

The law of inspiration that produced all these books still exists and is in operation. These books were all written by men, and hav a certain family resemblance. Some are the meditations of sages. Some are codes of laws. Some are biographies conveying moral lessons of great beauty in a cloud of myth, miracle, and fiction. This was a favorit style with oriental writers, whose perception of the importance of truth was as yet very feeble, and who frequently forged the names of elder sages to their books to giv them greater weight, as the Wisdom of Solomon, book of Enoch, apocryphal writings.

Some are the visions of epileptics, who soar on fancy's wing to the highest heaven, and amid agitated stars and flashes of lightning behold the throne of God, the ancient of days, the son of man, surrounded by angels and archangels and all the company of heaven. These visions, recorded as revelations from on high, hav produced a profound impression in all ages and been embodied in all religious beliefs.

Inspired writings are what a man is impelled to write by an impulse which he does not understand. Thousands of clouds pass overhead unheeded, but from the cloud surcharged with electricity the lightning flashes and the thunder rolls. So from the mind of the sage or the scholar flash forth those revelations which enlighten the world; so from the mind of the poet that combination of music, wisdom, and beauty, that "sweet fruit upon the poisonous tree of life," which we call poetry; so from the seer those moral and religious lessons which hav been the guide of humanity, now, as ever, struggling toward the light. Such is inspiration, and every new truth is a revelation to those who receive it.

P. ROOSEVELT JOHNSON, M.D.

A Voice from the Tomb.

A correspondent sends the Evening Post the following extract from a fast day sermon delivered in the Presbyterian church of Columbia, S. C., by the Rev. James H. Thornwell, D.D., just one month before the secession of the state of South Carolina.

Dr. Thornwell was in his day looked upon as a bright ornament of the Presbyterian church. He was elected a moderator of its general assembly in 1847, and from 1852 to 1855 was president of the South Carolina college, doing duty as college chaplain and as professor of moral philosophy. He was a man of great learning, and of his wonderful eloquence many who heard him preach, both North and South, still liv to testify. During the latter part of the career of John C. Calhoun, Dr. Thornwell, who was his bosom friend, wielded in South Carolina an influence scarcely less than that of the father of secession himself, and would, in all probability, but for his calling, hav succeeded the celebrated South Carolinian in the Senate of the United States.

The extract referred to is as follows:

Having adverted to the sins which belong to us as members of the confederacy, let us turn to those that belong to us as a particular commonwealth. I shall restrict myself to our dealings with the institution which has produced the present convulsion of the country and brought us to the verge of ruin. That the relation betwixt the slave and his master is not inconsistent with the word of God, we hav long since settled. Our consciences are not troubled, and we hav no reason to be troubled, on this score. We do not hold our slaves in bondage from remorseless considerations of interest. If I know the character of our people, I think I can safely say that if they were persuaded of the essential immorality of slavery, they would not be backward in adopting measures for the ultimate abatement of the evil. We cherish the institution, not from avarice, but from principle. We look upon it as an element of strength, and not of weakness, and confidently anticipate the time when the nations that now revile us would gladly change places with us.

In its last analysis, slavery is nothing but an organization of labor, and an organization by virtue of which labor and capital are made to coincide. Under this scheme labor can never be without employment, and the wealth of the country is pledged to feed and clothe it. Where labor is free, and the laborer not a part of the capital of the country, there are two causes constantly at work which, in the excessiv contrasts which they produce, must end in agrarian revolutions and intolerable distress.

The first is the tendency of capital to accumulate. Where it does not include the laborer as a part, it will employ only that labor which will yield the largest returns. It looks to itself, and not to the interest of the laborer.

The other is the tendency of population to outstrip the demands for employment. The multiplication of laborers not only reduces wages to the lowest point, but leaves multitudes wholly unemployed.

While the capitalist is accumulating his hoards, rolling in affluence and splendor, thousands who would work if they had the opportunity are doomed to perish of hunger. The most astonishing contrasts of poverty and riches are constantly increasing. Society is divided between princes and beggars. If labor is left free, how is this condition of things to be obviated? The government must either make provision to support people in idleness, or it must arrest the law of population and keep them from being born, or it must organize labor. Human beings cannot be expected to starve. There is a point at which they will rise in desperation against a social order which dooms them to nakedness and famin, while their lordly neighbor is clothed in purple and fine linen and faring sumptuously every day. They will scorn the logic which makes it their duty to perish in the midst of plenty. Bread they must hav, and bread they will hav, though all the distinctions of property hav to be abolished to provide it. The government, therefore, must support them, or an agrarian revolution is inevitable. But shall it support them in idleness? Will the poor, who hav to work for their living, consent to see others as stout and able as themselvs clothed and fed like the lilies of the field, while they toil not neither do they spin? Will not this be to giv a premium to idleness?

The government, then, must find them employment; but how shall this be done? On what principle shall labor be organized so as to make it certain that the laborer shall never be without employment, and employment adequate for his support?

The only way in which it can be done, as a permanent arrangement, is by converting the laborer into capital—that is, by giving the employer a right of property in the labor employed; in other words, by slavery. The master must always find work for his slave, as well as food and raiment. The capital of the country, under this system, must always feed and clothe the country. There can be no pauperism, and no temptations to agrarianism. That non-slaveholding states will eventually hav to organize labor, and to introduce something so like slavery that it will be impossible to discriminate between them, or to suffer from the most violent and disastrous insurrections against the system which creates and perpetuates their misery, seems to be as certain as the tendencies in the laws of capital and population to produce the extremes of poverty and wealth. We do not envy them their social condition. With sanctimonious complacency they may affect to despise us, and to shun our society as they would shun the infection of a plague. They may say to us, "Stand by—we are holier than thou!" but the day of reckoning must come. As long as the demand for labor transcends the supply, all is well; capital and labor are mutual friends, and the country grows with mushroom rapidity. But when it is no longer capital asking for labor, but labor asking for capital—when it is no longer work seeking men, but men seeking work—then the tables are turned, and unemployed labor and selfish capital staud face to face in deadly hostility.

We desire to see no such state of things among ourselvs, and we accept as a good and merciful constitution the organization of labor which providence has given us in slavery. Like every human arrangement, it is liable to abuse; but in its idea, and in its ultimate influence upon the social system, it is wise and beneficent. We see in it a security for the rights of property and a safeguard against pauperism and idleness, which our traducers may yet liv to wish had been engrafted upon their own institutions. The idle declamation about degrading men to the condition of chattels, and treating them as cows, oxen, or swine; the idea that they are regarded as tools and instruments, and not as beings possessed of immortal souls, betray gross ignorance of the real nature of the relation. Slavery givs one man the right of property in the labor of another. The property of man in man is only the property of man in human toil. The laborer becomes capital, not because he is a thing, but because he is the exponent of a presumed amount of labor. This is the radical notion of the system, and all legislation upon it should be regulated by this fundamental idea.

Business Notes.

If any of our readers has copies of Mr. Green's Freethinkers' Magazine of March and August, 1887, that they do not want, they can find a purchaser at this office.

The price of "Christian Paradoxes," by Francis Bacon, printed so elegantly by Peter Eckler, is 10 cents. It is a good pamphlet to hand to your orthodox neighbor.

Freethinkers residing in New South Wales can find copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for sale at the book-store of W. Willis, 715 Haymarket, Sydney. Mr. Willis will fill mail orders, if postage is sent him.

People possessing sufficient decency to despise Anthony Comstock and his society will find Lum Smith's Agent's Herald for December congenial reading. Mr. Smith seems to hav had wide experience with Comstock and his backers, and to appreciate them at their proper value. His address is 706 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Coarse Baptist.

From Life.

A certain reverend gentleman, at the recent conference of Baptist ministers, advised Mr. Anthony Comstock to proceed against this journal for the indecency of its cover, and said, "Those dancing figures on the title-page of Life are lewd pictures, and they suggest lewd thoughts."

Now, this is a confession that reflects rather seriously upon our reverend friend. We hav been laboring under the impression that Mr. Anthony Comstock possessed the nastiest mind in New York, but for imaginativ licentiousness, so to speak, the Rev. Dr. W. F. Taylor is a close competitor. If the title-page of this journal suggests such a wealth of lewdness to this gentleman's most receptiv mind, he had better change his diet or subscribe to some other periodical. As for the high priest of suggestion, Mr. Anthony Comstock, we are ready for his "proceeding" at any time he may select, and shall enjoy nothing better than a larger share of his attention. If we fail to stir this gentleman up a little when the ball begins, or to strike one or two square blows for art and honest decency, we promis to get some trousers for the "lewd figures" that decorate our cover. These men do much to make a thing indecent when once they open the sluiceways of their minds upon it.

From Puck.

The Rev. Dr. W. F. Taylor, at a recent conference of Baptist ministers, made complaint of the "dancing figures" on the title-page of our esteemed contemporary, Life, on the ground that they "are lewd pictures, and they suggest lewd thoughts." The figures on the title-page of our E C. are not lewd; they are delicate, pretty, artistic, and full of the pure, wholesome grace of childhood. We are not prepared to deny that they suggest lewd thoughts—to the Rev. W. F. Taylor. But if he is that sort of a man, he acts most unwisely in advertising the fact.

THE Methodist conference at Danville, Va., held recently, passed resolutions condemning theater-going. The Richmond State remarks that "camp-meeting" instead of "theater" would hav been more reasonable, and certainly would hav resulted much more beneficially to the country."

THIS is the way the Galveston News records an event of great interest to Tennessee congregations: "'Sucker No. 82' was the name applied by New York swindlers to Deacon Allen Gilliland, of Tennessee, to whom they sold $10,000 of 'green goods' for $650 of the deacon's hard-earned money. And when the deacon prosecuted them he failed to secure a conviction, and the judge told him to go back to Tennessee and pose as a horrible example to the congregation."

SAYS the Christian Advocate, organ of the Methodist church: "Never upon earth will there be an organic unity of all Christians. If there should be, causes similar to those which hav produced the present divisions would at once begin to operate, and neither the iron heel of a sacerdotal despotism, nor the remorseless ukase of Peter the Great, nor the indifference of opulent piety, nor the quiet assumptions of universal scholarship, could prevent, but would rather stimulate, departures from the common type, whatever it might be. The composit photograph, whether in individuals or churches, will forever remain 'the impossible she.'" That is plain talk, right out from the shoulder, and is the truest thing we hav found in a Christian journal for a long time.

The Distribution of Wealth.

If Long's Peak and Pike's Peak did not split the sky with their wastes of ice and granit in Colorado; if there were no Rocky mountains and no Sierras west of the Mississippi, no rains would fall in Illinois, no descending thunders would send up their smoke at White Niagara. The Mississippi valley would be another Desert of Sahara. If there were no Alps nor Pyrenees, there would hav been no Roman empire, no modern European civilization. The spring that trickles by a farmer's door is caused to be by the mountain-chain one thousand miles west, attracting the snowy fleets of heaven from the seas two thousand miles eastward. These same fleets of clouds were launched in air by the attractiv and distributing power of a vast, seething furnace of burning capital, a sordid monopoly of combustion, placed ninety-six million miles away, the sun, compared with whose dimensions Milton's hell would be like a lighted cigaret. At what a vast seeming waste of matter and of space does nature bring about comparativ equality of fertility and capacity for production over the whole earth! That is because nature has plenty of space, plenty of time, and plenty of patience, and withal has a far greater taste for variety than for excellence, as we should judge of things.

In the social world the relation between the great seeming wastes of capital and the activity of production are even less apparent, and by most are altogether denied. If in nature, in the upheaval of continents and the gathering of oceans in their beds, vast apparent wastes of matter, or, at all events, prodigious cheap accumulations of it, do help to promote fertility, productivity, and equality of enjoyment over the whole earth, is it in like manner true in society that inequality in the distribution of wealth, and of all intellectual and moral powers, all of which are but forms of wealth, is essential to the largest activity and most equalized enjoyment of all? I hold that it is; that inequality in the distribution of wealth of every kind is essential to the highest rapidity in its production, the greatest economy in its use, and the largest enjoyment in its consumption; in short, that some must be rich and others poor, in order that mankind may liv at all, and that, instead of the poor being made poorer by the contrast with the wealth of the rich, it is only because of the involuntary services rendered to them by the wealth they do not own that the poor can liv at all. To prove this, let us first consider what would befall society if the really impossible hypothesis that all men were rich could be realized.

Second, what would befall society if the destructiv hypothesis that all wealth were equally diffused could be realized.

And, thirdly, let us consider analytically in what ways and for what reasons society at large achieves results through the unequal distribution of wealth and power which could not be obtained at all except upon the basis of universal inequality.

First. To suppose all men rich is to suppose all men relieved from the necessity of performing any of those services whose performance is essential to the daily and hourly maintenance of life. It is to suppose ourselvs living in a world wherein we could get no other services performed for ourselvs by anybody than we could now get performed for us by Jay Gould, Vanderbilt, or the Rothschilds, by the use of such inducements as we could to-day employ toward either of those persons.

For argument's sake, we will suppose we begin our day to-morrow with all men thus rich. Fortunately for us, the sun rises in the morning without the help of toil. Therefore it is sunrise and day. Fortunately, also, the provision made during previous days leaves us in a position to rise, bathe, and put on our attire. For the builders, artists, and manufacturers who constructed our abode, the furniture of our room, and our clothing, even to the bedstead and bedding; the maid who brought the water yesterday and left pitcher, washbowl, and towel in their accustomed place, were not then as rich as they desired to be—none of them had "enough." It was because they worked with the specter of want stalking behind them under the old capitalistic order of things that all these things are here ready for us to rise, put on our attire, and go down as if to breakfast.

There, however, the game is up. Yesterday's work will not get this morning's breakfast, which must be placed before us, if at all, by somebody who is rich. No fire in the dining-room grate, none in the kitchen range, no dishes on the breakfast table, no coffee or chocolate, no steak, potatoes, hash, or sardines—nothing but a dreary recollection of former breakfasts in that now blank and hungry room.

"What's all this?" we ask. "What's the matter with Bridget? Is she married, paralyzed, dead, or gone to a ball?"

The folding doors open slightly, and through those a female voice answers:

"Bridget is rich! As rich as Jay Gould! No lady worth $80,000,000 ever gets a gentleman his breakfast!"

With that the door closes in perfect independence. Nothing more to be made out of me.

Whew!

Nothing left for us but to go out, get our own steak, bring it home and cook it—an elegant start indeed for a man just entered on the enjoyment of his $80,000,000.

At the front door we find no morning paper.

"Ah!" we sigh. "The carrier rich, too, poor fellow. No Jay Gould ever delivers morning papers. Strange effect of universal wealth. Cooks and morning papers both abolished before 8 o'clock."

At the sidewalk. No car in sight either way. No! rich men don't drive horse-cars or punch tickets. Always heretofore it has been that "them that's rich could ride in chaises," but somehow, now that all are rich there seems to be nobody to drive: therefore all must walk—which has the effect of making all poor, despite their riches.

We walk to the butcher's. The thought occurs to us that at the corner, having got our $80,000,000, we'll just giv a cool hundred to the beggar who usually sits there. Nobody there! Sure enough—he's got his $80,000,000, too. Why, money is like universal suffrage—when everybody's got it it's good for nothing, not even for alms. As you walk the street you note that everybody is hungry, sallow, mad, and idle. Nobody has had his breakfast. Neighbors look at you as butchers look at an ox to take the measure of his meat. Long before you hav reached the butcher's, you feel like a fat man on a polar expedition, as if your fat were tempting the appetites of your friends. At the butcher's the shutters are up, and a brief notice, thus:

> Being notified by the central committee of the new Socialistic state, T. B. Wakeman, secretary, that I am worth $80,000,000, I feel that I hav got enough. I will therefore sell no more meat.

At the market, the bakery, grocery, and dry goods, hardware, and crockery stores all is the same. The courts are all closed. No man acts as judge or lawyer after he has got "enough." Railroads stop running. The late busy city is as silent as if Lady Godiva were to ride abroad. But it is not she—it is Famin, Pestilence, nothing less than the disappearance of the human race. The wheels of society all stop under the test of universal wealth as the wheels of the factory stop when all hands strike.

In social science the conception of universal wealth is as impossible, as unthinkable, as self-annihilating, as in physical science would be the conception of illimitable light without darkness, life without death, levity without gravity, or heat without cold.

When every man is lifted above the inducement to render service to his fellow-men, every man would be sunk below the power to obtain service from his fellow-man. When no man wants anything, all men will lack everything. Hence, to make wealth universal is to annihilate it, and those who desire this consummation rightly and logically call themselvs Nihilists and Anarchists, not Socialists.

But, secondly, suppose all wealth equally diffused, which is the doctrin of the Communist. If this equalization were applied throughout the world, each person living would hav probably $250. If applied to the United States only, each would hav about $1,000. Dividing our entire land in equal areas, each would get 43 acres. Dividing our cultivated farms, each would get 10 acres. Dividing it in equal values, each would get $600 worth of land, $400 worth of personal property. Suppose the division effected as to the United States, so that every person in the country has $1,000, and no one has more. In our present system of industry, organized by large capitals, one might buy with it a building lot and shanty in a by-street, a butcher stall, small grocer's stock, truck and team of horses, or the like, because of the use and value which would belong to these things by reason of their position relativly to the great population around us. These values in turn are dependent on the 4,008,907 outlying farms of the country, having an average value of $3,000 including land and live stock; the great railroads, banks, factories, and means of production and transportation. The average capital invested in each of the 54 railways reporting to the Illinois railway commissioners is $23,000,000. The average capital invested in the 253,852 manufacturing establishments enumerated in the census of 1880 is $11,068. In agriculture every $1,500 employs or supports a human being. In railroading every $8,000 of capital employs a man. In manufactures every $1,000 of capital employs a worker. Now, while all this organization of labor by means of capital exists, a man may do a few things with a thousand dollars, besides stopping wark and consuming it, though not many.

He hardly dare buy $1,000 worth of stock in these great railways, for he cannot find out enough about their management and means of income to know whether the stock is a safe one to buy. But, if he buys intelligently, he does so because he knows one, two, or three great capitalists who, as owners of the majority of the stock, giv it stability. He would not be one of a mob of 23,000 holders, each holding $1,000 each in a railway; for the most Socialistic worshiper of the democratic idea could not be made to believe that any railway or other productiv investment could be run at a profit by a roaring, ranting, howling, cozening, bribing, hell-e-to-split democracy of 23,000 members. Every man suddenly turns traitor to democratic principles, and shows his confidence in the superiority of the aristocratic principle over the democratic, when he goes to invest his money in a stock company, by inquiring, not whether it maintains equality among its members, but whether it has any men of known quality, any good men and strong men—in a word, any impregnable monopolists of wealth—in it. Every expression of a preference for good men for any purpose is an aristocracy. Pure democracy recognizes no distinction among men as being good or bad.

In England a few cooperativ concerns hav been able to run, notwithstanding their large membership, but evidently these are the late flowers of a capitalized soil. The ground was prepared for them by the industries conducted by capitalists, and they had but to imitate the operations of capital.

Suppose our owner of $1,000 invests in four teams or "trucks," with which to haul merchandise in a great city from the depots to their points of delivery. His investment derives its whole value from three facts: First, the non-ownership of teams by the persons whose goods are to be hauled; second, the existence of the railways, which could not exist but as large capitals; and, third, the existence of three laborers, without capital and without means of living, except by work, and who are therefore willing to drive his teams. Hence, without riches on the one side of him and poverty on the other, he could make no profitable use of his money in this form. The same is true of every possible investment that can be made of any sum. Wealth could hav no definition and no value without want, as being only the means of relieving want. When want disappears, wealth, great or small, is abolished. Hence, it is evident that to equalize wealth would be to abolish it.

And now, thirdly, wherein and why does society make this stupendous economic gain through the unequal possession of wealth, insomuch that without this inequality progress does not begin, and the intensity, rapidity, and power of the progress are measured often and usually by the ever-increasing disparity in the conditions of men as custodians of capital? I assert as matter of historic fact that wherever all the members of a given society hav remained comparativly equal in wealth, as among the Bushmen of Africa, the nomadic Arabs of the desert, the Tartars, North American Indians, Chinese, ancient Jews, and comparativly among our colonial forefathers during the century and a half from 1670 to 1790, progress has been slow and painful, and the mental development has been, perhaps, independent and self-denying, but narrow, bigoted, and barren. Meanwhile the creativ civilizations of the world, Egyptian, Greek, Roman, Venetian, Dutch, French, British, American, and German—the periods in which the great originating and commanding types of men hav run their careers of progress, invention, and enterprise in useful and fine art; in legislation, eloquence, philosophy, and freedom; in science, research, and mental emancipation and highest social order—hav been periods of great differentiation of ranks, grades, and classes among men, periods when the organization of society was most intensely aristocratic, and when public thought emphasized dignity of character and capacity of achievement, by acknowledging, gratefully, proudly, and without envy, all the actual inequalities that exist among men.

Why is it, then, that periods and peoples of most unequal distribution of wealth, intellect, rank, and honor are periods and peoples of most progress in wealth and in civilization? I will try to answer this question candidly. All wealth, i. e., everything that has value, or will sell for a price of any kind, is either enjoyable or reproductiv, i. e., its value consists either in the use we make of it when we consume it for our comfort, support, or pleasure, or in the use we make of it when by its use we produce something to be consumed or enjoyed by others. The motiv with which we use enjoyable wealth is pleasure. The motiv with which we use reproductiv wealth is profit, i. e, the obtaining presently of the means of securing future pleasure. The function of enjoyable wealth is to be consumed by ourselvs—it is egoistic. The function of reproductiv wealth is to forward, or create, or furnish some form of enjoyable wealth for others. It is altroistic. Food, shelter, clothing, ornament, amusement, instruction, worship, association of man with his fellowmen, and social position, esteem, honor, or fame, are prominent forms of consumable wealth. Land, buildings for rental, capital for employing labor, machinery, implements, or stocks and shares representing them, railways, and means of transformation, transportation, or transfer, the ship, mine, furnace, factory, and every edifice used to earn an income in, are all reproductiv wealth.

To make a thing wealth, either enjoyable or reproductiv, it need not be a physical commodity nor exchangeable. For in the end all that a commodity can do is to produce a pleasurable sensation, and all sensations are imponderable and mental. An emotional satisfaction is, therefore, the last and highest form of wealth. For wealth is that which relieves want and givs pleasure. If it comes to relieve our own want, it is enjoyable wealth, be it a salad, a sealskin, a solitaire, a song, or a sermon. If we make a profit out of it by using it to relieve the wants of others, it is to us reproductiv wealth, be it a plow or a farm, a loom or a factory, a bank note or a bank.

The Age of Man on the Earth.

Before commencing my argument on this subject, I will notice the following from Professor Moss, viz., "That the investigations of oriental scholars hav added immensely to our knowledge I am not prepared to dispute, but I deny that they corroborate what Mr. Grabill calls the brief allusions of the Bible. What brief allusions? What could oriental scholars corroborate in reference to the Mosaic account of the origin of man by reference to monuments, inscriptions, or fragmentary remains? Certainly not that man was less than six thousand years old, and most assuredly not that he was of one type and one race? What, then? Let Mr. Grabill reply."

As to the type and race of man, that has been fully answered, and it is with great confidence in the strength of my position that, in reply to the remainder of this quotation, I affirm that, waiving the question of the inspiration of the scripture records, and viewing them simply as a mass of documents, subject to the laws and to be judged by the principles of historical criticism, their authenticity is vindicated.

The evidence shows that we possess in the scripture records, not only the most authentic account of ancient times that has come down to us, but a history absolutely and in every respect correct. It is a treasure of wisdom and knowledge; a history as important to the historical inquirer as to the theologian. There may be obscurities; there may be occasionally, in names and numbers, accidental corruptions of the text; there may be a few interpolations, glosses which hav crept in from the margin, but upon the whole it must be pronounced a genuin and authentic work, and one which—even were it not inspired—would be, for the times and countries whereof it treats, the leading and paramount authority; and let me assure the professor that, after a careful and candid consideration of all the evidencebearing upon this subject, he will be convinced that those who resist the scripture records, by impugning their veracity, like Jannes and Jambres of old resist the truth.

There are a few other statements which are not only beside the question, but unworthy of notice, and I will pass them and take up the subject under discussion, viz., "The Age of Man on the Earth," or, The length of the human period as given by Moses in the ancient Hebrew scriptures and science are reconcilable.

The professor (considering the weakness of his cause) made an able effort to refute my argument on this question by presenting us with what he calls "historical evidence," and what may be justly termed geological and paleontological speculation; now I will proceed to examin those branches of evidence which he has produced, not in a partisan spirit or manner, but to present our readers with what I believe to be the truth.

He commences his argument with this statement, "That the Chinese might be found in a highly civilized condition, with a monarchy and a government, as far back as 2500 B.C., while, according to such eminent authorities as Lepsius and Bunsen, the Egyptians hav a history that carries us back more than four thousand years B.C."

Now, in respect to Egypt, he asserts that "the sculptures of the fourth dynasty, the earliest extant, show that the arts of that day (some 3500 B.C., date of Menes; more than 3400 B.C., Humboldt; 3643 B.C., Bunsen; 3892 B.C., Kenrick; 3893 B.C., Lepsius; 3895 B.C., Hincks—in each case more than a thousand years before the Usherian date of the deluge) had already arrived at a perfection little inferior to that of the eighteenth dynasty, which until lately was regarded as her Augustan age."

The professor supposes this quotation from Nott's "Types of Man" to settle the question as to "the vast antiquity of man," and he would hav us believe that architectural history began at one of these periods ranging from 3500 to 3895 B.C., for he plainly says in the same connection that "her tombs, her temples, her pyramids, her manners, customs, and arts—all betoken a full-grown nation;" but again he admits "that, in connection with Egyptian history and tradition, there are a number of religious fables, such as we find associated with the early history and tradition of all other nations;" consequently he could not, with the least shadow of success, affirm that there is any source of history of those ancient people "that carries us back" to either of the dates given, but he simply givs the quotation with the dates, and leaves his readers to separate the true from the mythical as best they can.

I will just here remind the professor that one important fact we must bear in mind is, that modern criticism no longer accepts primitiv tradition, venal eulogiums, partisan pamphlets, and highly-wrought romances, as equal and trustworthy evidence, merely because of their age, but is teaching us to sift the testimony of ancient authors, and to discern the special aims which may determin the light in which their works should be viewed. The researches of oriental scholars hav thrown a flood of new light upon ancient events; and, above all, the inscriptions discovered and deciphered within half a century hav set before us the great actors of ancient times, speaking in their own persons from the walls of palaces and tombs; therefore I will present the facts as taught by these histories, written in the light and with the advantages of the latest discoveries.

Now, the statement I made in my first paper I still maintain, viz.: "That those ancient nations are known to us by four kinds of evidence: (1) written records; (2) architectural monuments; (3) fragmentary remains; (4) tradition.

"Of these, the first only can be considered as a true source of history, though the others afford its most interesting and valuable illustrations." Moreover, I affirm that those ancient nations hav no true source of history that "carries us back" so far as the Mosaic records.

Constance Manasses says that the Egyptian monarchy was founded about 2125 B.C. Durviage, in his Cyclopedia of History, says that Menes was the first king of Egypt, and that the dynasty of the shepherd-kings commenced about 2048 B.C.; this would giv us for the founding of the empire by Menes about 2200 B.C.

In Willard's Universal History we are told that Menes, or Misraim, founded the first Egyptian monarchy about 2188 B.C.

According to Thalheimer, Egypt commenced its existence not as a united kingdom, but with a number of scattered nomes, or families. One historian mentions fifty-three, and another thirty-six, of these nomes, and as one became more powerful, it swallowed up its neighbors, and thus grew into a united kingdom, with Menes as the first king. About seven kings in regular descent formed this dynasty, of which little is known; it belongs rather to tradition than to ascertained history.

Monumental history began about 2440 B.C. Egypt at this time was governed by three dynasties which reigned simultaneously in upper, middle, and lower Egypt. Proofs of this are found in the vast architectural monuments and fragmentary remains which overspread Egypt (Thalheimer's Ancient History, pp. 51, 52).

It appears that Professor Moss is accustomed to assert that "according to Lepsius and Bunsen, the Egyptians hav a history that carries us back more than four thousand years B.C.," and Professor Thalheimer says that his work "is a brief though accurate outline of the results of the labors of Niebuhr, Bunsen, Lepsius, Arnold, Mommsen, Rawlinson, and others;" that he is confident of the justice of his aim; and that on the authority of these learned oriental scholars he can only trace the Egyptian history back to about 2440 B.C., with an addition of a short period of the reign of the first dynasty of about seven kings.

Now, it is evident that either Professor Moss or Professor Thalheimer, the learned historian, is mistaken as to the teachings of these eminent scholars. Though the theory of Professor Moss seems to be supported by the quotation from Nott's "Types of Man," yet this support is found only to be apparent when Nott's work is properly examined.

Professor Ridpath, another eminent historian, informs us in the preface to his great work that he "freely availed himself of the best and most recent authorities," and givs the names of Wilkinson, Brugsch, Bunsen, Ebers, Duncher, Rawlinson, Smith, Curtis, Grote, Niebuhr, Falke, and Mommsen as the sources which he most relied upon.

After discussing the chronology of the earlier ages of Egyptian history, stating that the sources from which the dates are taken are in many parts obscure, and in some conflicting, owing to the widely different estimates of ancient writers, he says that the historian Brugsch has fixed upon 4400 B.C. as the true date of the founding of the Egyptian monarchy by Menes; that Professor Lepsius set the era of Menes at the year 3892 B.C.; that Duncker accepted the date of Lepsius only as the best approximation in the present state of historical researches, though Bunsen stoutly maintains that the Lepsian date ought to be reduced to the year 3643 B.C.

Of all the eminent scholars which Professor Ridpath mentions in his preface, it is strange indeed that he only givs the dates fixed upon by three of them for the epoch of Menes; and of these three he does not adopt either as true, but only as an approximation (Ridpath's Cyclopedia of Universal History, pp. 43–46).

The authorities mentioned in Johnson's Universal Cyclopedia in relation to the antiquities and chronology of Egypt are Bunsen, Champollion, Lepsius, Wilkinson, Sharpe, and Poole, who differ widely in their computations.

Menes was the founder of the Egyptian monarchy. His accession as fixed by Bunsen and Lepsius is the same as given by Ridpath, while Professor Poole estimates his epoch at 2717 B.C.

The estimates made by the other authorities are not given, but it is known that the dates fixed by Rawlinson, Wilkinson, and other eminent authorities are substantially the same as that set by Professor Poole.

Thus we find that while Professor Moss quotes a few eminent authorities who make up chronologies of Egypt which suit his side of the question, there are a large majority of the most celebrated scholars and eminent authorities who reason differently and who estimate chronologies of Egypt which are found to be reconcilable with the Mosaic records.

It is a fact that Egyptologists differ widely in their estimations, for the sources from which the dates are taken are in many parts obscure, and in some, corrupt. No period of ancient history is more obscure or uncertain than that of the first kings of Egypt. This proud nation, fondly conceited of its antiquity and nobility, thought it glorious to lose itself in the abyss of infinit ages, which seemed to carry its pretensions backward into eternity. According to its own historians, first gods, next demigods, and then spirits, heroes, etc., governed it successivly through a period of more than 20,000 years.

Manetho, a nativ historian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about 286 B.C., wrote a history of Egypt. Erasthenes, a historian of Cyrene, who was invited to Alexandria by the next succeeding king, made a list of thirty-eight kings of Thebes, all different from those of Manetho, and this list was afterward completed by Apollodorus, who added the names of 53 additional Theban kings, making 91 in all. Herodotus traveled in Egypt about 450 B.C., made an estimate of the antiquity and chronology of Egypt. Four centuries after the time of Herodotus, Diodorus traveled in Egypt, and wrote a history giving the chronology of the Egyptians; and also in the works of Syncellus is to be found a list of Egyptian kings.

According to the Encyclopedia Britannica, another great authority, some of the Egyptian dynasties are represented by monuments from which these lists can be verified; others hav left little or no record. Thus, there are no monuments of the period of dynasties 1–3; then a blank follows without a monument that can be assigned to dynasties 7, 8, 9, and 10. Under dynasty 13 they become scanty, and of dynasties 14, 15, 16, 17, there are but a few, which may be of 15, 16, or 17. Therefore we hav in the monumental history of Egypt three blank periods—the period before known monuments, the long periods between dynasties 7–10, and that between dynasties 13–17.

With all these difficult problems to solve, the writer does not pretend to giv "a definit chronological system for the period before the synchronism of Egyptian and Hebrew history, about 980 B.C., and that approximativ chronology becomes possible about 1591 B.C."

"It is significant that, whereas M. Mariette's estimate exceeds that of Professor Lepsius 1,112 years in the whole sum of the dynasties before the second Persian conquest, the excess is 966 years in the sums of dynasties 7–10 and 13–17. Such difference between two such great authorities is a proof of the want of even probability for solving this part of the problem" (Encyclopedia Britannica on Egypt).

Almanacs.

A correspondent in the Investigator of December 21st inquires whether the birthday of Thomas Paine is mentioned in the almanac, the same as the birthday of other great men. I would like him and all Liberals to know we hav one almanac that has been regularly issued since 1884 that givs the honors to all great men and women alike, be they pagan, Christian, or Infidel. It is published by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette Place, New York, at twenty-five cents a copy, and it is really worth $1, for it is an encyclopedia of Liberalism as well as an almanac. I file my copies regularly, and they are very handy as a reference.

Every Liberal should secure the yearly issue of this truly valuable publication. It is a terrible waste of time to hav the names of old pietists, whom one knows nothing about, or knows something worse than nothing about, meet one each time one opens the almanac, while if you had one devoted to the true history of great people it would be a continual teacher and educator.

I wish some capable Liberal would get up a regular farmer's almanac—even embodying the old signs and weather-guessings, if desirable—and rub out all those "saints'" names, and substitute true, useful, historical names and events, as is done in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL; but get it up for the average country farmer and mechanic, at the usual price, ten cents a copy, so all can afford one. The ALMANAC is next to the school-book.

Ready.

Those who hav ordered the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888 will, ere this reaches them, hav received their copies. Those who hav not ordered them will, we venture to say, do well to do so at once.

The contents of this issue of the ANNUAL are varied and useful. The calendar has been corrected to date; the Freethought work of 1887 is succinctly summed up; the progress of Freethought, both at home and abroad, is noted, and the picture gallery of Freethinkers and scientists is enlarged by twenty-four portraits. The contributions are humorous, philosophical, descriptiv, and critical. The contributors are such able writers as Capt. R C. Adams, E. J. Bowtell, F. M. Holland, L. K. Washburn, J. E. Remsburg, and George E. Macdonald—the latter contributing twelve short Bible stories describing incidents from holy writ, illustrated by Watson Heston. Mr. Adams is the theologian of the issue; Mr. Washburn, the philosopher; Mr. Bowtell, the revealer of monkish secrets; Mr. Holland, the political advocate of Liberalism, and J. E. Remsburg and the Editor, the biblical critics. The table of contents includes: Calendar for 1888; Freethought in the United States for 1887; Bible Studies; Deism and Atheism; Life in a Trappist Monastery; The Secular Union and the International Freethought Congress; Sunday Amusements; The Blasphemy Case; How the Layman is Deceived; A Horrible Man; an inquiry into the chronology of Jehoshaphat's death, and brief biographies of the subjects of illustrations. The pictures are of the old Hall of Science in this city, a Baptist church purchased by Frances Wright in 1829 and converted into a Freethought hall; portraits of Theodore Parker, Benjamin Franklin, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Abraham Lincoln, Frances Wright, Ethan Allen, Thomas Jefferson, Robert Dale Owen, John Adams, Peter Cooper, James Lick, E. L. Youmans, Charles Sumner, Thomas Paine, Abner Kneeland, Horace Greeley, Abby Kelly Foster, Wm. Denton, George Washington, Stephen Girard, Gilbert Vale, Lydia Maria Child, Gerritt Smith, and John W. Draper, and thirteen scenes from scripture.

The ANNUAL is printed in the same elegant shape as previous issues, and sells for twenty-five cents.

Christianity's Carnival in Connecticut.

The appended four paragraphs are from the Evening Sun of January 5th:

"A young man until recently highly respected and an enthusiastic worker in church and Sunday-school, was on Tuesday sentenced to the Connecticut state prison for a long term.

"He had pleaded guilty to a charge of dishonest management of a bank.

"The district attorney, in moving for sentence, made this astoundin; assertion. He said that within the past ten years there had been lost by dishonest management over $5,000,000 in Connecticut.

"Every cent of this was stolen by men who had stood high in the community, and in nearly every instance been prominent, and in some cases peculiarly zealous, in church matters. No wonder District-attorney Stanton intimated his doubt as to the teachings of the churches of which these men were members."

What are we to think of this but that the doctrins of Christianity are not a moral force sufficiently strong to restrain men from evil? Indeed, the fundamental idea of evangelical Christianity, that, no matter what a man has done, if he but repents and believes in Christ as his divine redeemer, he can get to heaven even at the last moment, is a direct premium on crime, placing a repenting rascal, in the estimation of the Lord, above an honest man, who has done no wrong, but who cannot believe the claims made for Christ. The query with which the editor of the Evening Sun follows the foregoing, whether the immorality of Connecticut is not due to widespread unbelief, "hypocritically concealed," has no facts back of it to make it worth the asking. A man who squares his conduct by the utilitarian morality of Liberalism will not steal other people's property. He knows better; and he knows, also, that the consequences which will follow are too dear to be bought at any price.

No, it is not unbelief—there is little of that in Connecticut—but it is the evil tendency in human nature which no false religion can overcome. We must hav a morality based on human experience and utilitarian worth—a practical, up and down, every-day honesty and justice—to insure the community against repetitions of Connecticut's crimes. Morality which has its source in the supposed dictum of a supposed personal deity never has been, and in the nature of things never can be, a positiv force for good, or even a negativ restraining power of much value.

What Good?

Wednesday night of last week was devoted by the Catholics of this city to jubilating over the fiftieth anniversary of Mr. Pecci's ordination to the priesthood. Mr. Pecci is now pope, under the name of Leo XIII. Cooper Union was crowded to the walls, and the corridors were filled by a mass of men and women unable to get farther into the hall. Archbishop Corrigan was there, and all the prominent Catholic laymen of the city.

The object of the meeting seems to hav been two-fold—religious and political. The religious part, of course, consisted in eulogizing the Roman Catholic church and the pope. The political part was a condemnation of Dr. McGlynn and an attempt, but ill concealed, by a Democratic politician to swing the Catholic voters back into the Tammany Hall ranks. Resolutions were adopted declaring that the Catholics of the metropolis unite in cordial congratulations to the pope on having happily celebrated his jubilee, praying that there be granted to him many years of health, strength, and activity to devote to the guidance of the church, and assuring him of the faithful allegiance of "Catholics who are proud of their American citizenship." This submission of his servants was not wholly unexpected by Mr. Pecci, for this economical telegram from him, which must hav started early in the evening, was read:

"ROME, Jan. 4.

"Holy Father grateful; willingly grants apostolic benediction. CARDINAL RAMPOLLO, Secretary of State."

Now, what we want to know is, What good is that apostolic benediction to any one of that audience? Will it feed him? Will it clothe him? Will it relieve his sickness? Will it giv him employment? Will it make the winter's cold less icy, or temper the wind to the coalless Irishman? Did it, or will it, do anything but excite the cheers of ignorance and help the wolfish priesthood to get a tighter grip on their flocks?

The political effort of the jubilants will probably prove more successful. Congressman Bourke Cockran's eulogy of the pope, which moved many priests to tears, and his praise of Archbishop Corrigan as a "shepherd tender and gentle, but firm and prudent," will undoubtedly help the penitents who cheered the sentiments to reconcile themselvs to deserting Dr. McGlynn and going back to the church. Catholicism is nothing but sentiment backed by imposture, and people are easily moved who hav been trained slaves and drudges in a groove centuries deep.

But then, supposing the Catholic voters who hav followed Dr. McGlynn do go back to the church and obey her orders, what good is that to the rest of this country?

Good for St. Stephen's Parishioners.

Following the jubilee meeting described in the preceding article came a gathering of St. Stephen's parishioners, numbering several hundreds. The speakers seemed to easily read the political significance of the jubilee gathering, and they also paid their respects, amid round after round of applause, to "my lord" Preston, who had said in his sermon on the previous Sunday that, "If any man will say, 'I will take my faith from Peter, but I will not take my politics from Peter,' he is not a true Catholic." The author of this statement was characterized as a liar, and then the following resolutions were adopted by a howl of yeas and a tornado of Irish cheers, with cries of, "We'll kick Mgr. Preston out of the Catholic church! Let the renegade go back to Protestantism! He's no Catholic!"

"WHEREAS, In a political harang, delivered in his church on Sunday last, Mgr. Preston grossly misrepresented the principles and outraged the citizenship of American Catholics by the declaration that, 'If any man will say, "I will take my faith from Peter, but I will not take my politics from Peter," he is not a true Catholic:'

"Resolved, That we denounce this proposition as an insult to all Catholics, and we reject and repudiate it with all the emphasis and indignation of which we are capable; and,

"Resolved, That we reiterate our refusal to recognize that the pope has any claim or title whatever to allegiance or obedience from Catholics in political affairs; and,

"Resolved, That we indorse and adopt the principles emphasized by Daniel O'Connell in his declaration that he would as soon take his politics from the sultan of Turkey as from the pope; and,

"Resolved, That as citizens and within the domain of politics we will render neither allegiance nor obedience to any authority other than the Constitution and laws of our country."

This is good. We like it. It shows independence and a determination by each parishioner to be at least a part of an individual. By and by he may conclude to be another part, and take his religion as he takes his politics, and render obedience to no authority but his own reason. What a magnificent world this will be when every human male is a Man, every female a Woman, and the children's minds are not warped by the pernicious teachings of superstition!

The Saturday Half Holiday.

During the past year the workers of this state, and especially of this city, obtained through their trade organizations a great many concessions from the employers, and through their political organization several laws benefiting themselvs in various ways. Chief of these laws was that making a legal holiday of every Saturday afternoon. It is a good law in the main. The laborers need all the rest they can get, and by shortening the hours of work the law also operated to giv employment to many more artisans, which was another good thing. Now this is all in danger of being overturned by the action of the bankers, who are supported by a considerable portion of the press.

On the second day of the legislativ session a bill was introduced repealing the Saturday half-holiday law. An intimation was made that perhaps during the months of July and August the custom might be observed, but during the rest of the year the weekly grind must be continued as of old. This bill and these bankers should be looked after by the gentlemen who procured the passage of the holiday law. The effectivness of the law should be permanently kept at five months at least—May, June, July, August, September. During the other seven it might well be suspended, as indeed it generally is by consent of both workmen and employers. But there are many reasons why the thousands upon thousands of clerks and mechanics of the great cities should hav a chance in the spring to get out of doors, get some good air in their lungs, and get their backs straight.

ened up. A long winter's close application to work has a tendency to make narrow chests, pale faces, and debilitated systems. When the warm winds of May begin to blow and windows are raised for the first time since the previous fall, the desire to wander away from the stone pavements and brick walls to the soft ground and wooded fields possesses everyone. "Spring fever" is an insidious disease, and the opportunity to cure it by a few hours' wandering out of doors each week should not be taken away. July and August even the most grasping employer admits to be months unfit for human beings to slave through. But if these months are from necessity periods of relaxation, September should be counted in for pleasure. In these latitudes September is the great month for out-of-door sports.

The plea of the bankers that the half-holiday injures the business of New York and givs Chicago and Boston and other cities which do not observe it an advantage over the metropolis is scarcely worth considering, because it is not proved. No facts are adduced to support it; no figures are paraded for the mystification of the unlearned. And we venture to say that the dollars lost by a few shopkeepers are more than balanced by the money paid to additional workmen. Besides, who are the "business men," that their interests must be paramount to all others? But if it were true, what of it? Business is not all there is of life; money is not the only thing worth living for. Good health is above trade and dicker. An afternoon spent with the birds and flowers is worth more than a dollar. It is an investment that will pay large interest when the threescore years hav been rolled off. For these reasons, and others too numerous to mention, the Saturday half-holiday should not go.

However, it looks very much as though it would go, if the employees of the city do not stir themselvs.

The S. S. V. and the S. S. W.

Justice Kilbreth has the case of Knoedler & Co., arrested by Anthony Comstock for selling photographic copies of well-known paintings, under consideration, and will probably giv his decision some time this week. Among the photographs seized are copies of "La Baigneuse," the original of which was viewed by hundreds of thousands at the Philadelphia Centennial Exposition; "The Two Servants," illustrativ of one of La Fontaine's fables; and the Paris Salon pictures (which were selected by a jury of forty eminent French artists and prominent men), "Borgia s'Amusé," "Floreal," "Coquette," and "Le Printemps." Mr. William Beecher, son of the late Henry Ward Beecher, was counsel for the Society for the Suppression of Vice. The substance of his argument was that the viciousness of the photographs is a question of fact and not of opinion, motiv, or intent. The rule laid down by the law and decided in the higher courts is that if the tendencies are pernicious they must be checked. The Venus of Milo in the Louvre may not be indecent when seen only by people of cultivated tastes, because their morals will not be affected; but when cheap photographs of this subject are scattered broadcast among the youth of the land, the influence is immoral.

In connection with the doings of Mr. Colgate's agent in this city, the subjoined account of the proceedings of the Society for the Suppression of Worldliness is not without more than local interest. It is forwarded by our correspondent, Mr. F. L. O., from a Western city, where the theaters are open on Sunday and worldliness generally disports itself to the consternation of the pious:

"At the recommendation of their efficient general agent, Prof. St. Augustine Stockom, the Society for the Suppression of Worldliness has decided to publish the following injunctions and resolutions:

"1. The Committee on Plastic Immoralities will charter a special cruiser for the pursuit and capture of vessels infringing the provisions of the act regulating the exhibition of mermaids, tritons, and similar pagan emblems.

"2. Ornamental stoves, gates, metal sign-boards, and other castings, representing mythological nudities, will be confiscated and destroyed, unless the proprietors should prefer to remove the salacious portions and replace them by devices recommended by the Committee on the Distribution of Moral Mottoes.

"3. Private Detectiv J. G. M'Sniffen, having reported the discovery, in the park adjoining the residence of Dr. C. D. Casella, of a statue described as a 'naked governor of the gods,' the report is adopted and referred to the immediate attention of the Committee on the Surveillance of Private Pleasure-grounds.

"4. The purchasers of bath-tubs will hereafter be required to prove the possession of proper bathing-suits, or furnish security for the observance of paragraph 212 of the act for the enforcement of domestic morality.

"5. Circus proprietors and the managers and owners of public or private menageries are hereby warned to avoid the exhibition of nude baboons, especially of the varieties known as Cynocephalus Anubis and C. Porcarius. Nude individuals of the species named will hereafter be confiscated and turned over to the agent of the society's private reformatory, unless the proprietors should prefer to invest the hairless parts of the animals specified in decent and durable raiment of the pattern recommended in the last annual report of the Committee on Dress Reform.

"6. Unclad individuals of the species of dogs known as hairless terriers will be prosecuted in accordance with the provisions of the act for the enforcement of personal decency.

"7. Parents or servants in charge of nurseries will be held strictly accountable for any future neglect in the enforcement of the act for the suppression of dancing on the Sabbath day. On the day named, children in leading-strings must be carefully prevented from romping, capering, and all similar manifestations of frivolous propensities; and the evolutions of the equivocal toys known as 'jumping jacks' must be limited to decorous movements of the upper extremities.

"8. The nocturnal conventions of carnal-minded he-cats must be promptly dispersed during the nights preceding and following the Sabbath day; and house-owners will adopt special precautions to prevent the female cats of their families and servants from visiting such assemblies.

"9. On the Sabbath day, soda-water fountains, ice-cream freezers, and similar temptations to worldly enjoyments must hereafter be left in the custody of our special agents, and the proprietors of the mineral spas known as soda springs will be required to employ special constables to guard the approaches of such springs from Saturday evening to Monday morning.

"10. Lumber-dealers, and the owners of saw-mills and ship-yards, will modify their advertisments in accordance with the provisions of the act for the suppression of impure literature, and carefully abstain from the use of the immodest term describing unplaned boards as undressed lumber.

"11. The removal of bed covers and underclothing during the warmer nights of the year can be permitted only under the restrictions of paragraph 342 of the act for the suppression of domestic immorality. An observance of the provisions named will hereafter be enforced by domiciliary visits under the supervision of our private detectivs."

We are glad to be able to call public attention to this last-named society, as it is undertaking a work of no less importance than Mr. Comstock's, and Mr. Stockom should be as zealously supported as the former agent. We appeal to the churches everywhere to do this, confident that when the purity of our back-yards, parks, and natural histories, and soda-water fountains, and other high moral agencies is imperiled, the mothers and fathers of the nation, and all those who love Jesus and do his work, will cheerfully respond. Our children must be protected from the evil influences of the things whose tendency is to deprave the minds of those who view them, and to excite suggestions of a lewd and libidinous character. As Chief-justice Cockburn said in the case of the Queen against Hecklin, "the matter need not be absolutely against morals, as a soda-water fountain when seen in the Louvre is not, but the test of worldliness must always be coupled with 'test' or 'tendency.'" And, as the eloquent Mr. Comstock said to the Baptist ministers, better, a thousand times, that the mermaids, the ornamental stoves, the naked governors of gods, the owners of private menageries, the servants of nurseries, the soda-water fountains, and lumber-dealers take a back seat than that your children be debauched.

We understand that the Society for the Suppression of Worldliness will at once apply to Congress and the state legislatures for laws to enforce their resolutions.

Mr. Foster, Religious Politician.

The Rev. J. M. Foster, of Brooklyn, has been engaged by the National Reform Association, which is the corporate title of the God-in-the-Constitution party, to stump his city in the interests of "national reformation." Two Sundays ago he obtained access to the pulpit of the Reid avenue Methodist church, and chose for his text, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord." The substance of the sermon, as reported by the Tribune of this city, was as follows:

"God meant this land to be the home of civil and religious liberty—it was settled by Christian men with Christian ends in view. A Christian nation ought to hav a Christian government, because the character of the government ultimately determins the character of the nation. Under the influence of a secular constitution, our nation is fast becoming secularized. The liquor traffic is dominant; the Sabbath is ignored; polygamy and Anarchism threaten the land. We hav planted the tree of our civil and religious liberties in the vase of a secular Constitution. Shall the Constitution giv way, or the tree perish? The state is a moral being subject to God's law the same as an individual. The lesson of history is that a nation righteous in character and upright in conduct will enjoy the divine favor, while ungodly and wicked nations are obnoxious to the divine judgments."

Now, the Rev. J. M. Foster may be deep in the secrets of the Lord, and know just what was meant when this government was established, but we prefer to rely for our information upon the intentions of its human founders, as expressed in various public documents. For instance, when George Washington said that "this is in no sense a Christian government," we think we discern therein a more reliable statement of what this government was meant to be than we do in Mr. Foster's interpretation of the Lord's desire. Washington's plain affirmation that this is not a Christian government carries with it the further affirmation that it is a government under which all people hav equal rights; for under every Christian government that the world has known the people hav lived and thought only as the churchmen dictated. And it was to remove the incubus of Christianity under which the country had suffered that a purely secular charter was adopted by the brave men who freed us from England's domination.

When this country was settled by Christian men, they at once, of course, adopted a Christian government. The theocracy of New England was alleged to be divine. Its rules were biblical; its officers were of the church, and its acts prompted by a Christian spirit. What it did is a leaf of history—the most infamous page of the whole book. Whipping, hanging, murders—cruelty almost unbounded—were the daily records of the church of that God who "meant this land to be the home of civil and religious liberty." By the church of this God chattel slavery, the worst form that human meanness can take, was established, and millions of men and women made wretched for life. There was no real liberty in the land when the Christians who settled it had their own way, "with Christian ends in view," and it was because of this fact that a secular constitution was adopted. To adopt now a Christian constitution is to go back indefinitly into the Dark Ages.

Mr. Foster's further statements that the state is a "moral being," and that good states enjoy God's favor, while bad states are held in less esteem by him, is a piece of clerical claptrap. In the first place, Mr. Foster knows nothing whatever about divinity or its favor. But if there is a divinity such as Mr. Foster asserts, it is a matter of easy proof that the nations which hav been most favored by him are the ones which hav suffered most and gone to pieces most quickly. Christianity, which Mr. Foster means by righteousness, has been an injury to every nation to just the extent to which it has controled it.

We do not know just how much progress the National Reform Association has made in influencing voters, but if it gets all the churches started in its support there is a big fight on hand for the preservation of the government and such freedom as we still enjoy. The church is the embodiment of tyranny, and when she controls the state, bigotry has her own way and liberty is an outcast.

It behooves the Liberals of the land, who are the only true Americans, to wake up, or their rights will be gone before they know it.

A VERY mean man in Massachusetts has been righteously rebuked. He was the administrator of the estate of a man who before his death had employed a barber to shave him. Fifty-two shaves were given on Sunday, and when the barber sued for his pay the administrator asked the court to rule that because the shaving was done on Sunday the plaintiff could not recover. But the supreme court decides that a man must pay for being shaved on Sunday, and that, under certain circumstances, shaving on Sunday "is essential to his health and cleanliness."

SINCE our intimation that George Macdonald and Samuel P. Putnam had gone to San Francisco to start a Freethought paper, we hav received many letters expressing regret at our loss. We assure our friends that we feel as badly as they do; but then, New York's loss is San Francisco's gain. On another page we print an account of the two adventurers' journey across the continent. They are located at 504 Kearny street, San Francisco, and the title of their paper will be Freethought. In the first number our brother promises to print the story which the cowboy insisted upon our covering up with black advertisments of the ANNUAL for 1888 and the "Story Hour." We trust no casualty will result therefrom. We assure Messrs. Putnam and Macdonald that the heartiest good wishes of all Infidel New Yorkers go with them.

WRITING of the people at the theater one night last week a reporter of the Sun put in this felicitous paragraph: "Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll sat in a box that same evening. By his side was a madonna-faced girl, in whose lustrous, modest eyes could be read the gift of intellect. On her head was a tiny little gray hat, matching the braided gray cashmere that robed the graceful person. This was the hat of Eva Ingersoll, and the roc's-egg head of her famous father made a contrast. Eva's hat was like herself, unobtrusiv, a hat that interfered with no one's vision. There may hav been a bunch of English violets lurking beneath the brim, for that odor exuded from its locality, but a little bow of heavenly blue ribbon rested like a shred of a June day on her dark hair, and a dash of it was in a bit of a knot under her chin. Colonel Ingersoll has voiced some of the prettiest thoughts, but the most poetical thing he ever fathered was that girl in the gray hat."

Letters from Friends.

MILLSVILLE, N. S., Dec. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Washington got a monument that is 592 feet in hight, and that cost $1,187,710; weight 81,000 tons. And those gentlemen that were hanged in Chicago should hav a good monument, and it is hoped that their friends will get them one with a good marble statue on the top of the monument. JOHN SILLARS ARTHUR.

CORSICANA, TEX., Dec. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5 for one new subscriber and myself. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first copy, and would like to know how many subscribers you hav that hav taken it from the first to the last. There are plenty of Liberals here, but it is hard to get them to subscribe for any Liberal paper. T. P. VAUGHAN.

NUNDA, Dec. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order, for the renewal of my subscription and the ANNUAL for 1888. Will not inflict any of my likes and dislikes as to the matter found in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER upon you, but can truly say I find much to commend, as well as to condemn; but am glad that all can be heard. It is the truth I'm after, so please continue to send my Sunday paper.

Yours for truth, J. E. BECKLEY.

TALMER, KAN., Dec. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty to inform you we hav had lectures at Talmer for four days, by O. A. Phelps, of Colorado, closing December 5th with good results. Most all the orthodox attended, and I hav good reason to believe converts were made—not by the Holy Ghost, but by the able advocate of Freethought. We think seed has been sown that cannot be easily obliterated by any church-bound sectarian creed. You may set Talmer down hereafter as a Liberal town.

Yours respectfully, GEORGE E. SMITH.

MASON, MICH., Dec. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been asked the question several times: If the people of the United States were all like R. G. Ingersoll, what would be the result? In reply I would say, We would hav a heaven on earth. County jails would go to the ground. There would be no more use for state prisons, Pinkerton's detectivs, and country justices. We would need no more. Saloons and hell-holes would be closed, and our asylums, that are filled with people that hav gone insane over the hell-fire doctrin, would be closed. I thank God, if there is one, for such a man as R. G. Ingersoll. Every fireside will become a heaven when we do our own thinking and stop paying priests to think for us, and the flames of hell will die out. H. N. WIXSON.

WEST MCHENRY, ILL., Dec. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $10 in payment for renewal of my subscription and four new subscribers. I want to see THE TRUTH SEEKER prosper, and I believe it is doing much good in the world by helping our people out of the ruts of superstition, which engenders hatred, cruelty, and tyranny. The encroachments of priestcraft upon the rights of the people every day become more and more manifest, and the activ, thinking man has no rights that the vicegerents of the omnipotent are bound to respect. I cannot but feel that the greatest danger to our political institution is in the church control of the state. There is an aggressiv, determined effort in that direction, and every year brings forth new revelations of legislativ and judicial infamy to secure this end. These facts are made manifest by recent developments in our high courts. GEO. GAGE.

OTTAWA, O., Dec. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find within my renewal of life ($5), with kindest regards to Watson Heston. Heston is a host, and is doing an immense amount of good.

My dear Editor, does it not strike you, from the many letters received at your office, that the Liberal ranks are made up from the poorer class, or they are great pessimists? Is it not humiliating to see the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER filled from week to week by letters from A to Z, informing its readers of their poverty, etc.? Would it not be better for each to bear the ills of life alone than to be eternally spreading them before a non-sympathizing world? Let our friends try it, and I am sure they will feel as well, if not better, at the end of each year. Those who achieve greatness, and merit the same, do not herald it to the world themselvs, but leave that to others. OHIO.

ARMSTRONG, IA., Dec. 20, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: I like Mr. Heston's pictures, and would not hav them left out for the price of the paper. I only regret that there are not more of them. You will see by your list that I am the only person in this place who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are several Liberals here, but they are not enthusiastic enough to suit my taste. However, if you want to send some of those sample copies, I will send you a list of names.

This summer the Methodist Episcopals started a revival in my neighborhood, and as I was school director, they came to me for the key of the school-house and invited me to come to their meetings. I thanked them for the invitation, but as time passed and no Peter or family went, they made it a point to call again, two of the black-coats, ostensibly to talk me into attending. I told them that as I looked upon the Christian religion as being one of the greatest curses that had ever befallen the human family, and as I was very conscientious in the matter, I could not accommodate them. They told me I ought to hav my conscience enlightened, whereupon I gave them to understand that that was a question of brains, quality, quantity, and "hereditaments." I quoted the Golden Rule as being a dead letter among them. One of them said if I did not believe in the Bible, I should not quote it. I told him that the Bible should hav quotation marks around that sentence, the Golden Rule, as it was taught many hundred years before the Christian era. He sat in his buggy and made no reply. Perhaps the poor fellow never knew that before. I kindly invited them to go and hear J. E. Remsburg, as we were going to hav him in the same school-house in about one week. He came. They vacated the school-house, but carried their revivals to another, which to me was proof that they never calculate to "do unto others as they would that others should do unto them." One Christian lady was induced to come out and hear Remsburg, and said "that one thing she could say for him, anyway, was that he is a gentleman and a scholar." So you see even in this benighted place the good work goes slowly on.

PETER H. BURT.

DAYTON, N. Y., Dec. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I appreciate and applaud the moral courage you exhibit and the method you use in the great battle for mental liberty—freedom of thought, speech, and press. It is a source of gratification to know that you are not to be "bulldozed" from the rational and logical stand you hav taken on the firm rock of justice and natural rights by either so-called friends or foes. So long as you advocate exact justice between man and man, in whatever station, and the right of each to think his own thought and express his honest conviction, on any and every subject, you will merit the approbation and receive the support of all who hav outgrown the pharisaical bigotry of "I am holier than thou."

It is pitiable that people who claim to be Liberals and to hav evoluted beyond the narrowness of barbarism should yet be so illiberal as to favor hanging those who are so unfortunate as to hold and express opinions differing from their own, in matters political, religious, social, or industrial. They may be mistaken in their views and methods—and some must be—but, if all of us were to be hung for our mistakes, gibbets would be in great demand.

I am sorry to learn that the "man with the badge-pin" has left THE TRUTH SEEKER office. His racy articles were very enjoyable, especially his reports of the Manhattan Liberal Club. N. HOWLAND.

SALISBURY, Mo., Jan. 1, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: I will say a few words on duty, as it suggests itself to me.

The demoralizing doctrin of hell is either true or false. The Christian claims to believe it. Therefore, he cannot warn his children too often of it. We believe it to be an infamous lie, got up in the interest of priestcraft, to frighten the people out of their earnings. Repentance and forgivness were invented to giv the priest another pull at the poor, deluded victim's pocketbook. Hence: "God will bless the cheerful giver."

The Bible says, "There were giants in those days." I believe it. They were intellectual giants, who denounced those frauds as bitterly as do the giants of to-day. One, whose name was Zimri, told Moses that he was a fraud and an impostor; that he pretended to hav authority from God to enslave the people—to destroy liberty; that if justice had her dues he (Moses) would hav long since been a victim, and better deserved punishment than any other; that he was harder on the Hebrews than were the Egyptians themselvs, as pretending to punish according to his laws; that he (Zimri) thought it right to come at truth by inquiring of many people, and not like one that livs under tyranny, to suffer the whole hope of his life to depend upon one man; that no one should find cause to rejoice who assumed to hav more authority over his actions than himself. Moses, not willing to hav his insolence further exposed before the public, or to openly contend with Zimri, lest many should imitate Zimri and his power over the ignorant masses be broken, had Zimri promptly and foully murdered by the magnanimous Phineas (Josephus, Antiq., chap. iv, sec. 11, 12).

Christians believe, or pretend to believe, the silly story that Moses smote the rock and got water, but the fact of the business is that the water was discovered by jackasses after Moses had told his people to giv up all faith in God (Tacitus, Hist. of the Jews, Book V, chap. iii).

They abstained from swine's flesh because the hogs had given them the mange during a period in which they lived in the most profligate and unclean manner, and then pretended that it was a special command of God (Ibid, chap. iv).

In like manner all the pious frauds and myths of the Jewish and Christian mythology can be exposed if space would permit. It is a shame that it is our painful duty to call attention to the truths of history, when tons and tons of truthful literature are within the reach of all.

We occasionally run across a pretended Liberal who says: "John, it won't do to deny there being a hell, for you don't know but what there is. You should not giv your children any instruction about these things; you might be wrong." Such men are real Christians, and believe the Christian dogmas just as strongly as any Christian outside the insane asylum.

Many years ago a heathen died and uttered this prayer: "O God! if there be a God, please save my soul, if I hav a soul, from hell, if there be a hell."

Such men can never be induced to giv a dollar for lectures, but can always be depended upon to discourage the efforts of those who take the lead in getting them up. Then after the apostle of liberty mounts the stage you will see the man who straddles the fence, in a reserved seat, smilingly rubbing his hands, soliloquizing, "His blood be upon your hands." If you would squeeze the pith out of a horsehair and place such a man's soul inside, you could hear it rattle. Such men hav no convictions or ideas. Honest Liberals hav no fears to denounce the dogma of hell to their children with great bitterness, as well as all else which they believe to be infamous lies. JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

SNOHOMISH CITY, WASH. TERR., Dec. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: After carefully reading much that has been written concerning the so-called "federal obscenity laws," and the abuses arising from the way they hav been enforced by Anthony Comstock and his associates, I am still under the necessity of asking why the Liberals, and others who hav suffered from his unjust way of enforcing these laws, hav not taken the necessary steps to hav such amendments made as would most effectually prevent such abuses hereafter. Although Comstock may be prejudiced, and a single judge in New York city may be severe, yet, certainly, the Congress of the United States are not of the same frame of mind. It seems to me that most of the provisions of these so-called laws are eminently just and proper, and that most of the abuses arising under their enforcement hav occurred in the United States district court sitting in New York city. Now, if amendments had only been made providing for an appeal in such cases, defining the term "obscene," and somewhat restricting the action of these laws, there would be nothing left to complain of, and nothing that could be greatly abused. Now, why is it that such amendments hav not been procured? It seems to me that no great effort need hav been made to hav secured, long ago, the proper legislation in this matter.

Yours, etc., ELDRIDGE MORSE.

MARSHFIELD, OR., Dec. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you fifty cents in stamps, for which please send us two of your ANNUAL ALMANACS. I hav not seen any letter from anyone in this county to THE TRUTH SEEKER since my last one to you, therefore I will mention a word about Liberals here. They do not seem to organize at Marshfield, and I fear Mr. Putnam will hav to come again and do his work over. One reason, I suppose, why they do not get in working order is because so few that put their names down when he was here liv in Marshfield; they are scattered over so many portions of the county that it is inconvenient for them to get together often.

Why is there so much inharmonious feeling among Liberals? Our neighbor takes the Ironclad Age, and in that and in several sample copies of Liberal sheets sent to me venomous words are used. If we are truly trying to liv to promote happiness in this world, we should do it good-naturedly. This would be showing love for the human being, and this is what I understand Freethought to be—love and good for humanity, leaving out the dogmas of Christianity.

Mr. James Oliver died last April. I believe he took the first TRUTH SEEKER that ever came to Marshfield. He educated my husband as well as many others in Freethought. We hav now of his books "A Truth Seeker Around the World," four volumes; Colonel Kelso's "Bible Analyzed" and his "Devil's Defense," Mr. Oswald's "Secret of the East," Paine's "Age of Reason," Waite's "History of the Christian Religion," and two years' numbers of the Popular Science Monthly. I do not say I hav read all of these yet. I am reading "A Truth Seeker Around the World" now. Poor Mr. Bennett—where is he now? I think I like him best of all. Very truly yours, E. A. HILBORN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. A. D. Swan having turned the light of his lamp upon the Chicago infamy and the social problem, I will reciprocate the favor by picking his wick a little. His allusion to "the land of the free and home of the brave" will hardly apply, where the people are subjected to robbery, slavery, and rapine. He appears to be ignorant of the self-evident fact that primarily, by the law of our being, the earth was a common possession of the whole human race, but private ownership has confiscated the possessions of four-fifths of the people, and subjected them to slavery for the use and benefit of others. Hence it is not confiscation, but restitution, that Mr. Swan objects to.

There are but few mechanics and laborers who can sit with their wives and little ones and feel that they hav something that they can call their own. For private ownership compels them to pay a hundred per cent more for commodities than the entire labor cost of procuring and distributing them. Hence it appears that private ownership compels us to divide our earnings with others, to support them in the idleness and extravagant luxury that Mr. Swan loves so well to see them enjoy. Does he really think that the resources of our planet are so entirely inadequate to meet the wants of its populations that no common level is possible but the lowest? If so, he is evidently not well posted on the logical import of facts.

He sees many things in religion and politics that to his mind are wrong, and believes in educating the people as fast as possible to remedy such wrongs. That is what those four men were hanged in Chicago for doing; and Mr. Swan regrets that they were not hanged in anticipation of their attempting such an "outrage." I would invite his attention to the fact that nothing but armed rebellion is regarded as treason in this country, and that is not regarded as a capital offense when waged for the perpetuation of slavery. But I should not advise force for the abolition of slavery, unless the force is of a nature that will make resistance impossible. For it seems to my view impolitic that a just cause should be baptized with human blood. None but an unjust cause should call for a sacrifice of human beings in a prolonged struggle to establish and perpetuate it. Such is private ownership of wealth. It compels every individual to look out for himself and let the devil take the hindmost. However excusable such action may be for a herd of buffaloes on a stampede with the hunters and hounds at their heels, or for a vanquished army in full retreat with a victor firing upon their rear, I think it is hardly comportable with an enlightened civilization. If it is democratic individualism, you may write me down anything but a democratic individualist. I shall prefer the individualism that will secure to every individual the right to liv and to ample means of living, with none to molest nor make afraid. People talk of a dark age as though unconscious of the evident fact that we are now living in mental darkness—in an age of insanity rather than of reason. We appear to hav acquired knowledge enough to make us crazy mad, but not enough to make us wise. We hav intelligence enough to be dangerous, but not enough to be beneficent or just. J. A. TUTTLE.

NEW YORK, Dec. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I exceedingly regret to trespass upon your valuable time and the doubtless still more valuable space in your columns. I am led to do so on this occasion, however, by reason of my desire to be placed "straight on the record" in your estimation and that of your readers in the matter of my attendance and utterances at the Labor Lyceum on the evening of Sunday, 4th inst., a report of which appeared in the morning papers of this city on the following morning.

A copy verbatim of such report as it appeared in the New York Times is reproduced in your last issue, and in order to correct the erroneous impression, which seems general, that I attended the meeting as an intruder or for the purpose of disturbing its harmony in any degree, I would state that on the preceding Friday evening notice of Mr. Searing's intended lecture was given out from the platform of the Liberal Club, and as he passed out of the door at the close of our meeting we had a brief conversation, in the course of which he invited me to hear his lecture and to take part in the discussion which was to follow, and stated that he would be pleased to hav me do so, assuring me at the same time that it was a "free platform and open to all." I thanked him, and accepted his invitation.

In his lecture he touched upon Socialism, and dwelt at some length upon Anarchism, as did the other speakers who followed him. When I reached the speaker's stand, and commenced to express my opinion in a general way concerning Socialism, the air, especially in my immediate vicinity, at once became thick with the sibilant utterances peculiar to the serpent and to the noble bird included under the generic name, Anser. This led to my quotation from "Paradise and the Peri," and the expression of my opinion as to the duty of every man toward the serpent, and had scriptural authority for my remark concerning the bruising of its head. At this point the interruptions and confusion became so marked that, with the remark that I clearly could see what kind of a chance I should hav to express my opinion from that kind of a free platform, I took my notes from the table, and departed, I trust, decently and orderly, even if not in a dignified and graceful manner, and at the door turned and wished the audience a very good night; before I reached there, however, the stream of denunciation spoken of had set in, and the bovine bellowings of the blatherskite reached my ears even in the street.

Now, regarding the charge made by the individual whose asinin attributes are too well known to need comment here, and whom Dr. McGlynn has mildly termed a "great bore," that I hav been a slave-trader, I would say that whether or no I ever hav been such is a matter which at present concerns no one but myself, and was totally foreign to the subject then under discussion, and I would remind those desirous of information upon that point that some people hav become slave-dealers for much the same reasons and from the same motivs that some other people hav become slave-stealers, and as regards the charge of haviug been a pirate, would say that it would be well for anxious inquirers to know just what does and what does not constitute piracy under our laws or those of any other country.

The opinion of Don Bombastes Furioso (Hinton) as to what honest men should do in my case is expressed in language fitting the source from which it emanated. But will he as an honest man set the example for other honest men of his own peculiar kidney to follow? His remarks call to mind that fable of Æsop of the convention of rats, whereat it was unanimously resolved that a bell should be placed about the neck of a cat which had made its appearance in the vicinity of their depredations, in order that the tintinnabulations of the bell should giv due warning of the approach of the destroyer, but when inquiry was made for ambitious rats desirous of distinguishing themselvs by performing the interesting and somewhat delicate operation of belling the cat—none was found.

Moral: This fable teaches that talk is cheap, but that it requires more nerve and less gall than is possessed by Hinton to prompt a man to place himself in such position as would secure prompt chastisement for temerity.

It would afford me infinit pleasure to test the quality of this fellow's metal, but infringing the law of the land and encountering the pains and penalties attached thereto are among the "dangers ahead" which I consider it prudent to avoid, and against which I must continually guard myself. In any of those countries, however, in which a large portion of my life has been spent, I am quite confident that he would "sing small," and that instead of flaunting the red flag of the Communist or the black flag of the Socialist, he would immediately display the white flag or the white feather of the coward and poltroon, when held responsible for his ideas of the liberty of free speech. BENJ. F. CLARK.

GOSPER CO., NEB., Dec. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly, and I could not do without it. Professor Oswald's articles are scholarly and philosophic. They alone are worth the price of the paper. I wish every Christian could read Mr. Robert Ingersoll's reply to Mr. Field. We hav been entertained with two revivals in this locality. The first was conducted by a reverend Mr. Decapus, of the missionary Baptist persuasion, hailing from Haldridge. He was assisted by the Rev. Mr. Thomas, Deacon Matthews, and others. After four evenings of earnest effort, in which he labored hard to prove that the Bible was true, he brought his meeting to a close without obtaining a single convert. He informed us that we might build a column of morality as high as heaven, but without faith in the Lord Jesus we were eternally lost.

Next came Rev. Mr. Oshaen, without any better success. He wanted to know if they were going to wait for an earthquake to bring them to Jesus. A part of the Christian's stock-in-trade out here is the old, exploded, and worn-out contemptible lies about the deathbed of Thomas Paine, Mr. Beecher flooring Ingersoll, etc.

Rev. Mr. Decapus thought that Infidelity had got too strong a hold here for him to do any good.

The fact is, hell has lost its terrors, and people are more concerned about their welfare in this world than their soul's salvation in the next.

It is surprising how religion excites the prejudices of the professed followers of him who taught to love your enemies—even so they are barely on speaking terms with their Infidel neighbors. It does not seem possible for a Christian to act in a mannerly way toward an opponent to his religion. It makes no difference how diligent a man may be in minding his own business; how upright he may be in his dealings with his fellow-man—in fact, he may be a model of perfection as far as possible—if he does not believe the rib story; that the destiny of the human race was influenced by that little incident in the garden of Eden; that God drowned the world because man was wicked; that Lot's wife was turned into salt (and his daughters ought to hav been); together with the stories about Samson and that jaw-bone, and foxes, gates, and posts, with the whole conglomeration of absurdities—if he does not believe all these to be inspired by an allwise, omnipotent being, he is looked upon with feelings akin to pity and contempt, and accused of being insincere, with the consoling information that, "You'll find out some day," as a wind-up.

Is it not a pity to see Christians with their brains locked against investigation, for fear they might discover a new truth, or find that other systems of religion hav just as valid evidence of being true as their own? We need such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I hope it may liv to hoist its flag over the last million-dollar cathedral and see the day when priests will hav to make an honest living, instead of playiug upon the fears of their fellow-beings. H. J. O.

Dec. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of November 5th you publish an article written by Ella Wheeler Wilcox upon Ingersoll, aud in the same issue you publish a severe criticism of Mrs. Wilcox's article, in which you, as it seems to me, do not show much of the spirit of toleration which recommends truth to the understanding of men. As I read and understand her article, it is a splendid tribute to that great man. The deductions she makes from the facts she states may not be warranted, but she givs the facts and makes her deductions. Others may draw entirely different conclusions from her facts. That many vicious men profess to be followers of Ingersoll is true. It is equally true that many vicious men profess to be followers of Jesus Christ. So that if Ingersoll has done much harm, so has Christ. This conclusion follows from Mrs. Wilcox's mode of reasoning. She discloses her way of reasoning, but givs the facts upon which she founds her conclusion. This is fair and is Freethought, which is certainly allowable. To my mind her article does not call for the kind of criticism in which you indulged. Take her article in its scope and effect and it is highly complimentary to Mr. Ingersoll, and is a powerful rebuke to those who condemn him because of his views on religious questions. You say, "Dr. Field made the most strenuous exertion to be courteous to Colonel Ingersoll, and in the sincerity of his Christian stupidity thought he had succeeded."

Are you still entirely satisfied with that sentence? This means that Dr. Field made all the exertion he was capable of making. Who can do more? Is there no such thiug as honest error in matters of belief or judgment? If not, the human mind must be infallible, and every difference of opinion must prove a want of sincerity. I confess to that degree of stupidity which makes me oblivious to what you choose to call the "miserable little flings" at Ingersoll which you say are contained in Mrs. Wilcox's article. She expresses her opinion, and givs the facts from which she forms that opinion. If she is doing wrong in expressing adverse opinions of Ingersoll, how are we sure she does right in expressing opinions favorable to him?

Then you suppose that you proceed as "idiotically" as Mrs. Wilcox did, and do proceed and giv some quotations from her "Poems of Passion," with very severe comments between them. Well, if she proceeded "idiotically," why do you lower the standard of your intelligence to that plane? That she proceeded illogically and erroneously, I admit, but she showed no symptoms of mental imbecility, but on the other hand shows refreshing mental vigor. Had you proceeded in your criticism as she proceeded in her article on Ingersoll, you would hav quoted "Response," "The Creed," "Progress," "Show Me the Way," "Resolve," and perhaps some other poems from the same author, and drawn from them conclusions of tenfold more force for the cause of intellectual freedom than your criticism carries. Intolerance is as hurtful to the cause of freedom and to the spread of truth when displayed by a Freethinker as when practiced by the pope—if not, in fact, more so. Mrs. Wilcox's opinion of Ingersoll and of the effects of his teachings do not tarnish his great name, nor detract one particle from the fascination of his truths or the power of his eloquence. He may be right in all things, as he is honest in all things, yet if one who looks upon him as a wonderful, great, and good man, and who looks up to him as a teacher, cannot believe all he teaches, can he not hav the liberty to say so and giv the facts upon which he grounds his dissent? I hope so.

It seems to me that such criticisms as this to which I refer breathe too much of the spirit which you attribute to Dr. Field and Mrs. Wilcox. In this I may be wrong, but am well grounded in the belief that I am right. I know it is a saying that "if you fight the devil you must use fire," but as I am not engaged in that business, and you should not be, I do not see the use of resorting to application of that element. Let us Freethinkers leave that fight to those whose belief is that they are soldiers engaged in a constant warfare with his satanic majesty, while we go on our peaceful way spreading great and wholesome truths among mankind. If we find a friend who is more than half-way right, let us lend her a helping hand to lead her farther on in the right way, instead of doing aught which may retard her steps. Let us giv to such that which each of us needs so much—charity. M.

NEWBURGH, N. Y., Dec. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In a communication published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 26th on the thirty-six Newburgh Infidels, etc., for "Eager's" History read "Ruttenber's" History—which contains the full account, occupying three full pages, with extracts, references, and commeuts. As it had been nearly ten years since reading those books, I thought I saw it in Eager's—but it was in the "History of Orange County" all the same. Yet I am extremely anxious to be accurate in such matters, so, having the History now before me, and as you may not hav it handy for reference, and some extracts from the account may be of interest to you, I will copy from pp. 164–167:

"In September, 1797, the publication of the Mirror, the second newspaper published in Newburgh, was commenced by Philip Van Home, and in 1797 passed into the hands of Joseph W. Barber. In 1798 the New Windsor Gazette was published in New Windsor by Jacob Schultz. . . . afterward removed to Newburgh and called the Orange County Gazette. This paper was subsequently sold to David Denniston, the name being changed to the Citizen. It was afterward merged in the Rights of Man, a paper established by Elias Winfield. The Mirror gave place to the Recorder of the Times, and later to the Political Index.

"These papers are named in their order to introduce the facts in the religious history of the town which led to their publication. . . . But besides these debates there were other and mightier agencies operating in the direction of skepticism. Voltaire and his friends had already begun the work of unsettling the religious faith of Europe. They shook, as it were, the very pillars of the church, and desolated France with the terrible revolution of 1789. The doctrins taught by Voltaire and Paine were accepted by many prominent and able men in the United States, but in no place did these anti-religious sentiments prevail to a greater extent than in Newburgh. The Citizen first, and then the Rights of Man, hoisted the Infidel flag. There was a regularly organized society of Infidels, and a blind man (Elihu Palmer) visited the village weekly and delivered lectures in opposition to the Bible.

"Besides the above-named newspapers, Paine's 'Age of Reason,' Tyndale's 'Christianity as Old as the Creation,' and works of similar character were republished by the society, and circulated with all diligence.

"That there was organized Infidelity (says Dr. Johnston) I hav no reason to doubt. I hav my information from one who was a member of the Druid Society, a branch of the Illuminati society at the head of which was Weishaupt, of Germany, the leading object of which was the destruction of all organized governments, civil and divine. . . . I hav a number of facts, dates, and particulars on this subject which would help posterity to know more of the sad effects of Infidelity in Newburgh.

"A clergyman informed me that after preaching here he was attacked by a fierce dog set on by several members of the Druid Society.

"I presume many hav heard it stated (and I hav never heard it contradicted) that in the afternoon or evening of the day in which the ordinance of the Lord's Supper was dispensed by our officiating clergyman a mock administration was performed at a spring by formally presenting to a little dog a cracker and a small quantity of water, using the words of our blessed redeemer when he instituted the holy supper. It ought to be known, continues Dr. Johnston, that the principal actor in this impious transaction did not long survive. On the following Sabbath evening he was found in his room with the door locked, in a fit, and died without being able to utter a word. . . . For a time it seemed as 'if these infatuated men had determined that there should not remain in Newburgh and vicinity a vestige of Christianity.'

"Dr. Johnston's account comes to us somewhat colored, perhaps, by religious prejudice, but the main facts are generally conceded to hav been as he states them. Mr. James Donnally, a member, for a short time, of the Druids, and Mr. Jacob Schultz, editor of the first anti-Infidel paper—the last living witnesses of these events—agree that the accounts given by Dr. Johnston and Abner Cunningham were exaggerated, especially in reference to the deaths of several of the members.

"Mr. Donnally stated that the Druids first organized as a debating society, then changed into an Infidel club. He regarded it as a great mistake to assert that all the members were bad men and came to violent deaths. Mr. Schultz stated that Dr. Phineas Hedges, whose sudden death Dr. Johnston refers to, 'it was always understood died in a fit brought on by nervous excitement.' The circumstauces were these: I printed an article in my Gazette in which Dr. Hedges and the Infidels were severely handled. The doctor was very much excited over it and came down to New Windsor to ask the privilege of a reply. I told him that I must see his reply before I would agree to print it, but that if it was couched in proper terms he might expect its publication. The next day I heard that the doctor had died in a fit. Some of the ardent anti-Infidels said it was the visitation of God, but this was not generally believed. The discussions of that period will always be remembered by me, and after a lapse of sixty years I hav come to regard the acts of my contemporaries in a softer light than that in which I then looked upon them.

"While these corrections are due to the memory of the dead, the files of the Rights of Man, etc., giv ample evidence of the violence of the discussions, and the efforts made to overthrow all religious worship.

"These efforts gradually subsided after the close of the century." Yours truly, H. SPENCER CLARKE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Playing School.

Two little tots on the carpet at play
Tired of their usual games one day.
Said one to the other: "Let's play stool;
I'll be teacher, and don't you fool,
But sit up nice, like a sure 'nough stolar;
You'll miss your lesson, I'll bet you a lace tollar."
Casting about for a word to spell,
Blue eyes on puss and her kitten fell;
As an object lesson they pose with grace,
The mamma washing her baby's face.
"Spell tat," the teacher grandly gives out;
"Quick, now, mind what you're about."
The "scholar" failing, with ignominy,
Is sorely shaken and dubbed a ninny;
The word repeated, again she fails,
When the scene on the rug again avails,
And the teacher relents, conscience-smitten—
"If you can't spell tat, why, just spell titten!"

Hail, and Good Speed!

[To my lifelong friend and teacher, Prof. J. H. Cook, now of Snohomish, Wash. Terr., these lines are fraternally inscribed by the writer.]

I pray you, sweet friends, wherever you be,
Or whence or whither your going,
Be kind to the friend departing from me
Sing low to him, sweet waters flowing.
Oh, strengthen his footsteps—his thin locks are gray.
Fruits, bring him the joys of your burden;
Wave preludes, O pine-trees! above his lone way;
Men, giv him humanity's guerdon.

His tender heart, lured by the wealth of its love,
Was a harp 'neath the hand of the siren.
All cheer him, ye zephyrs that dreamily rove,
And charm him with peaceful environ.
His lot has been cast 'mid the sorrows of earth,
And fortune has left him so lonely;
The serpent concealed in the cup of his mirth;
The world was his stepmother only.

Remember the friend who is lonely and gray;
Chant softly, ye bright Western waters;
Such storms hav encompassed his wearisome way!
Oh, aid him, humanity's daughters!
With true hands he planted fair Liberty's tree,
And bared to the dark storm his bosom;
Oh! build him a home by the Westerland sea,
And crown him with every sweet blossom.

Frenchtown, Neb MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Why I Am a Liberal.

When we look backward into the pages of history and see what a grand civilization preceded the dark ages into which Christianity plunged the whole of Europe by the burning of the great library at Alexandria, and by destroying all other institutions of learning throughout the Roman empire, that alone is enough to secure its condemnation by any fair-minded person. If the Christian church had simply destroyed the learning of the Roman empire, that would not hav been so bad, but, worse than that, after destroying everything that tended toward the education of humanity, they now claim to hav fostered education during what they themselvs class as the Dark Ages, which, in reality, was the lightest age for the church. This was the age when the church held absolute control over everything, whether temporal or spiritual; so that our Christian friends cannot deny the fact that Christianity was the cause of the Dark Ages. The church would plunge humanity into the same darkness to-day if it had the chance. I am a Liberal because Liberalism looks forward and continues to work for a glorious future for the human race. I am a Liberal because Liberalism teaches natural morality rather than artificial morality and immorality. I am a Liberal because Liberalism is not headed by one of those old-time gods noted for their infamy, cruelty, and tyranny, created by man to resemble the people of the nation to whom they belong, or by one of the sixteen dead saviors, all of which are represented as haters of mankind. I am a Liberal because Liberalism teaches humanitarian doctrins, while the Bible teaches that the followers of Christ should hate father, mother, brother, and sister, and all others with whom they come in contact not of their faith. I am a Liberal because Liberalism teaches harmony, while Christianity teaches discord. I am a Liberal because Liberalism advocates universal mental liberty. I am a Liberal because Liberalism does not persecute others for their opinions or for knowing more than their persecutors. Liberalism is not founded on myth, ignorance, or superstition, but on science and what is known to be fact. Liberalism never burnt a Bruno or a Servetus for thinking in advance of his time. It never laid a Galileo in the dungeon for inventing the telescope, and proving that Jupiter and earth were not round, but in the shape of a spheroid. It never owned a Luther that could say no more of Copernicus than that he was a fool. I am a Liberal because Liberalism does not sanction the twenty different vices and crimes that the Bible sanctions. I am a Liberal because Liberalism does not teach that he that believeth on the Lord Jesus shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned. Liberalism does not teach, as Christianity does, that a man or woman can commit murder and accept Christ the night before execution and swing from the gallows into heaven, while the murdered one, unprepared for death, sinks into the infernal regions. I believe in doubting the existence of a God, if it seems reasonable to do so. If there is a God, he must be a being of goodness and wisdom, and as such he must delight in reason rather than blind faith, ignorance, and superstition. Let any fair-minded person compare the fable of Genesis with the sciences geology and evolution, and I'll warrant you that the verdict will be in favor of science. I don't believe that the earth was made in a week. I am a Liberal because Liberalism is glorious. Wherever you see a Liberal he walks with the majesty of a king, while the Christian generally appears to be ashamed of himself. I am a Liberal because Liberalism advocates equal rights and impartial liberty. We hav the advantage over our Christian friends—we read both sides of the question; they read but one. They think it criminal to think outside of the channel marked out some eighteen hundred years ago; we think it is glorious to be continually advancing. Our Christian friends say that there is nothing glorious about Liberalism, but they can't say that it has done nothing for science, literature, or charity. They can't say that Bacon, Haeckel, Spencer, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Draper, Max Muller, Humboldt, Franklin, Smithson, Lick, Ingersoll, Remsburg, hav done nothing for science. They can't say that Shakspere, George Eliot, Burns, Byron, Longfellow, Bennett, Watts, Goethe, Ingersoll, Remsburg, Putnam, Draper, Walt Whitman, hav done nothing for literature. They can not say that Girard, Lick, or Ingersoll hav done nothing for charity. When we look around us and see the glory of other causes, we hav to admit that they are ahead of us in some respects. But when we think of the grandeur, beauty, and truthfulness of our principles; when we look at our glory and our platform, and see how far we are in advance of orthodoxy, it cannot help but inspire us with a lover's enthusiasm for our cause.

EDWARD O. MORSE [aged fifteen].

Snohomish, W. T.

A New Club.

It is very fashionable just now to belong to a club.

What is a club?

You will tell me it admits of two principal definitions—a heavy and large piece of wood used for fighting purposes generally, and it is, also, the name for an association of people for some common purpose—for amusement, instruction in science, politics, literature; for friendship, for benevolent ends, and, sometimes, for gambling purposes.

Some clubs hav wealth enough to build and furnish elegant establishments in which to meet, and where the members sometimes giv royal banquets to their friends.

Most societies may be reckoned as clubs, under different names.

Among the number of clubs, organized for various purposes, may be mentioned a society which originated in England, and which is called the "Speak-no-evil Society."

All will agree that the title indicates a desire to refrain from one of the most common habits in the world—that of speaking evil of people. It is not always intended as evil, but it is so, all the same. People whose resources of conversation are small are too apt to discuss their neighbors and associates, especially to relate little trivial matters concerning them, reflecting on their general conduct, their habits, what they do and what they say, construing many things in an evil way, conveying wrong meanings by insinuation, by a nod of the head or a wink of the eye. Gossips make much mischief in the world, not meaning to do so; but they want something to talk about, and nothing is easier than to discuss one's neighbors and friends. If one would remember to speak only good words of those he knows, or does not know, it would be all right; but good words and works do not claim attention as do the chances to speak evil.

Now, the Speak-no-Evil club will not permit its members to retail gossip or speak any evil until they hav asked themselvs three questions: "Is it true? Is it kind? Is it necessary?"

Sometimes it may be the greatest kindness to point out evil, but it should be done in the kindest possible spirit, and with a view to the general good.

Now, let us organize a Speak-no-evil Society, and let all the children who read this, boys and girls, and big folks, too, if they wish, consider themselvs members of this novel club. Let it be our aim, instead of speaking of all the bad or evil actions or words of an individual, to try to find the good, that which is noble and pleasing; and, if we can find nothing of that kind, let us say nothing at all.

The beginning of the new year is a good time to organize such a club, although any time is good for that purpose.

Everyone desirous of belonging to the S. N. E. club will please send their names to the editor of the Children's Corner, who will act as recording secretary pro tem., and she will place their names in a book which will be used for that purpose.

Remember, the rule is to speak no evil of anyone until after asking the three questions above stated.

If we are placing too much confidence in an evil-minded, bad person, it would be necessary, of course, to know it, and kind to inform us of it.

For speaking evil without a just cause there should be some forfeit; and, if no one objects, we will make the penalty ten cents, which shall be forwarded to the treasurer of the society, and, when the sum is large enough, it shall be applied as a subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be sent to some person not able to pay for it, but who is desirous of receiving the paper.

It will be in order for you to select names for a president, secretary, and treasurer, who will attend to their respectiv duties.

Some one seems to say, "How are you going to know when we speak evil and when we don't?" The whole matter will be left entirely with your conscience, and it is believed that the principles that hav been inculcated in this Corner will make each member of the S. N. E. club feel morally responsible for all he says or does, and, also, if he does wrong, to frankly acknowledge it.

Let us see how many members we shall hav to append their names to the following:

We, the undersigned, hereby declare that we will speak no evil of anyone until we hav first asked ourselvs these three questions: Is it true? Is it kind? Is it necessary?

In place of evil, we will substitute all the good we can, and, as conduct is the greatest test of character, we will endeavor to make our own conduct exemplary at all times and upon all occasions.

ED. C. C.

Little Edith.

Edith is quite sensible for one of her age—nearly four years. She went to her grandma's one baking-day, and was given permission to make a pie in a very little tin plate. She made it and baked it. The next day she called again. "Well, grandma," said she, "how did the pie go—was it good?"

"I hav not eaten it yet, but it is splendid," said the grandma.

"Did grandpa eat any of it?"

"No, but it is a very good pie, just the same."

"How do you know that?" inquired Edith sternly, "when you hav not tasted it? I thought grown-up folks knew better than to tell stories," and she walked indignantly out of the room.

Edith goes to Sunday-school occasionally.

"What do you learn in Sunday-school?" she was asked one day.

"Oh, not much; it isn't much account anyway," was her reply.

"But what do they talk about there?"

"Oh, they talked about a fellow named Jesus. He wanted to be president, and they killed him instead of 'lecting him. I guess he was kinder crazy. They sing, an' they read, an' strut 'round, an' make all the chillens giv a penny, and then say good-bye and go home. I don't think, for my part, it 'mounts to much, and I take more comfort, 'nough sight, at home."

LITTLE Jack had a tremendous fall from a high fence-post, but escaped without other injury than a little hurt to his pride. "Well, you lost your balance, didn't you?" said a neighbor, patronizingly. "No, I didn't. I didn't lose my balance at all. I didn't lose nuffin'," and he turned his pockets inside out to prove it.

Correspondence.

BENNINGTON, VT., Dec. 21. 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to you. I enjoy reading the Corner very much, and, as we hav the Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav two Corners each week. We hav all of your books, and like them very much, especially "Apples of Gold." I am at present reading about sponges in "Life and Her Children." I hav attended school all the fall until now, but do not intend to go any until spring. The snow is quite deep, and it is splendid sleighing, but not very cold. I think I hav written enough for this time, so wishing you and the children of the Corner a merry Christmas and happy New Year, I remain, Yours sincerely, MABEL R. LYON.

MOODY, TEX., Dec. 23, 1887.

MISS WIXON: I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 17th a letter from Laura Price Stewart, telling what kind of books she had to pass away the long winter evenings, and you said you wished more boys and girls would write to tell what kind of books they had to read. I thought I would tell how I came to be interested in reading about four years ago. Ma, in paying for a new year's subscription of THE TRUTH SEEKER, sent for several pamphlets, of which "Orthodoxy," a lecture by Mr. Ingersoll, was one, and "What Must We Do to be Saved?" three of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS, and several others, which I read, and became interested in reading. After that I sent for "Moses Before the Court," in which it is shown that Moses was not the author of the books ascribed to him, and that he had been dead long before they were written, and that they were written by priests and monks who wished to fill the world with ignorance. I hav been for two years a subscriber to the Independent Pulpit, which furnishes reading second to none. Mr. Shaw's work, "The Bible—What Is it?" is a good one. It shows the Bible to be full of ignorance and fraud. Mr. Shaw's sermon, "The Divinity of Christ," is the best one of the kind I ever read. I hav Paine's "Age of Reason," which is so much talked about by the clergy. It is as good a book as I hav—his sound reasoning showing that Christ could not be a savior of the world without dying five or six times. I hav seven volumes of D. M. Bennett's works—"A Truth Seeker in Europe;" "Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism;" "The Semitic God and the Bible;" "The Teed-Bennett Discussion;" "The Bennett-Mair Discussion: What Objections to Christianity?" "Christianity and Infidelity: The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion;" "Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, and Essays." All by D. M. Bennett, the man who was put in jail for teaching a religion of humanity, for trying to make the world better, and for expressing his honest thoughts. They imprisoned him for the same purpose that the priests of Salem banished Roger Williams, for teaching that no man, or body of men, has the right to control the religious belief of man.

I hav heard bishops of the churches say that they had read secular papers till they became so interested that they would nearly forget the Lord. They would think of their souls; they would throw away the secular paper, and go read the Bible and forget all worldly thoughts. I prefer to read something that teaches the son and daughter to love father and mother, rather than worship a God who says: Take no thought for to-morrow. Forsake father, mother, sister, and brother for the sake of Jesus. Think not that I came to send peace, but rather a sword. A man's foes shall be they of his own household.

I would rather like being called an Infidel than advocate a doctrin that teaches that ninety-nine of the human family are going to be doomed to a hell of fire and brimstone that burneth for ever and ever. I rather prefer being called an Infidel, and being with an honest devil, who is the first school-teacher of man. All invention is said to be the product of the devil. I would rather be in hell with those who sought to liv for their fellow-men than to be in a heaven that has golden streets and is filled with such men as Joshua—stopping the sun to wage bloody war against his fellow-men; when any school-boy knows that if he did stop the sun that didn't stop the earth from revolving on its axis, which is the cause of night and day, and to stop the sun would not make the day any longer. Christians say if you fail to believe in such nonsense as this, you shall be cast into hell, burning with fire and brimstone. How will an honest Christian feel when in heaven should he look over to hell and see a sister in the flame that ascendeth up forever and ever? How would he feel if he should happen to see a mother in perdition who was all his love and care for life, and who would die herself rather than part from a child? She shall be cast into hell because she fails to believe that there were two days and nights before there was any sun to make light. I will close, for fear I tire your patience.

Yours truly, JOHN M. SIMMONS.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by Hell Played Out.

AN OLD BUT TRUE POEM.

Orthodoxy's getting shaky;
Hell is loosing half its charms;
Beecher stole the devil's brimstone;
Churches are now in alarms.

Hell was once a lake infernal,
Past description, past all name,
Where the damned must roast eternal,
In that lurid brimstone flame.

Hell of late, though, 's getting shorter;
Cooling off, too—beats the deuce.
Likewise brimstone, once so plenty,
Now is nearly out of use.

Hell of yore once swarmed with infants,
Damned to burn by God's decree,
Just because old Eve ate apples
Off the devil's knowledge tree.

Later, though, divines went searching
Hell all through with anxious care,
Gave the hunt up quite discouraged—
Not the first damned infant there.

Hell is now a grand old humbug;
Poor old Satan's most played out;
Orthodoxy's out of brimstone;
Hell's fast going up the spout.

Obituary.

MRS. DELIA BURGE.

Five miles from Gouverneur, St. Lawrence county, in the state of New York, resides Mr. Marcelus W. Bacon, a large farmer, and a most worthy man and stanch Freethinker, and who is and has been for many years a subscriber and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And not only himself, but his admirable wife and intelligent children, are also independent thinkers. The subject of this notice, Mrs. Delia Burge, is Mr. and Mrs. Bacon's oldest daughter, and the wife of Mr. Martin V. Burge. She was stricken down with consumption some three years ago, and has since then been slowly wasting away, and on the 20th day of December passed away. Mrs. Burge was a most exemplary woman, and highly esteemed by all who knew her on account of her intelligence, amiable disposition, and benevolence, which was recognized in whatever society she moved. Notwithstanding that she knew her end was surely approaching, she never murmured or complained, but bore her affliction with more than "Christian courage." Hers was the courage of a brave woman and a philosopher. She had no fear of death. She realized that, if there was no future existence, she was only to pass into a painless, unconscious sleep; and, if there was a life beyond the grave, she was prepared for it, never having intentionally wronged anyone, and always having tried to do all the good she could while here on earth. As death approached, she met it as her friend and not an enemy—a friend that had come to release her from her long years of physical suffering. She made all the arrangements for her funeral, even to the most minute particulars, and everything was carried out as she had requested.

Some time before her death the writer was invited to attend and deliver a short address at her funeral. And after her death, it having been announced that the writer was to speak, the word went out that an Infidel was to deliver the funeral "sermon," which announcement, with the well-known reputation of the deceased and her worthy parents, drew together a very large concourse of people. And it certainly was the most pleasant occasion of the kind we ever attended. It had more of the appearance of a friendly social gathering than of a funeral as we usually, with our early orthodox education, think of these meetings, or, more properly, partings, of the living and the dead. There was nothing of that sad, despondent expression of countenance that we see at funerals conducted in the old orthodox style, where the preacher and everybody present try to make each other feel as uncomfortable as possible.

The subject of our discourse was "The Religion of Humanity." We spoke for nearly an hour to the most attentiv, and, to all appearance, the most interested audience that we ever addressed. We could perceive that our ideas were new and somewhat startling to many present. But one Liberal speaker had ever spoken in the town before. George Chainey lectured there a few years before.

After referring briefly to the beautiful character of the deceased, we tried to show the superiority of the religion of humanity to all other religions. We stated that the adherents of every religion in the world, and of every sect, claimed that their special religion was the only safe passport to happiness. We claimed the same for the religion that we here presented; that it was the only religion that would save anyone in this world, or any other, and that all who were members of the church of humanity were sure of salvation, and no others; that this religion was the same that Jesus taught in the parable of the Good Samaritan; that members of this church were to be found in all the religions and in all the sects, and outside of them all; that whoever lived up to his or her highest light and was doing all the good they could, was in full fellowship in this church. It required no special belief. In this church creeds, professions, and what were known as religious ceremonies, amounted to nothing; that if we desired to ascertain whether a person belong to this church or not, we need not examin any church-member rolls, but we must inquire of the members of his own family, of his neighbors, and of those who were the best acquainted with his every-day transactions in the business world; that we were sure from what we had learned that the deceased was an activ member during her lifetime of this great humanitarian church, and we, therefore, knew that no evil could reach her; that such a person created a heaven in whatever locality they might be located, and it would be impossible for any power to send such a person to a hell; that this church of humanity was the only church that insured our salvation in this world or any other. And we called upon all present to unite themselvs with this church of humanity, not by making a great profession, or long prayers, or by putting on a solemn visage, and persuading themselvs that they were better than other people, but by going out among their fellow-men and laboring to make this world a better home for the denizens of earth. This was our creed.

After the services, the people present were all invited into the large dining-room, where refreshments were served to all who would partake, and for an hour a most interesting social meeting was enjoyed. We were glad to take by the hand many of the Freethinkers of the northern part of the state that we had seldom or never met before. It was a gathering long to be remembered by all who were present. —o—

We hav on hand a large number of the following of COLONEL INGERSOLL'S pamphlets, which will be disposed of at cost, as follows:

Ingersoll Catechised:

His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the Editor of the "San Franciscan;" singly, 3 cents; per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $2.00.

ORTHODOXY.

A lecture, fifty-four closely printed large 12mo pages, 10 cents; fifteen, $1; and $6 per hundred.

Civil Rights Speech.

Including the address of Frederick Douglas, fifty-three-large octavo pages, singly, 10 cents; fifteen for $1; and $6 per hundred.

The Truth of History.

This is a comment by Colonel Ingersoll upon the religious lies that hav been told about himself, and first made its appearance in these columns. Price 3 cents; 30 cents per dozen; $2 per hundred.

BIBLE IDOLATRY.

A letter Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the editor of the London "Secular Review." Price 3 cents; 30 cents per doz., or $2 per hundred.

INGERSOLL ON McGLYNN.

Being the comments and opinions of Mr. Ingersoll upon the fight in the Catholic church between the late pastor of St. Stephen's and his employer, the pope. Price 3 cents; 30 cents per doz., or $2 per hundred.

We suggest that these be purchased in quantities, and given away to Christians, and it is with that not unreasonable expectation that the prices hav been placed so low.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

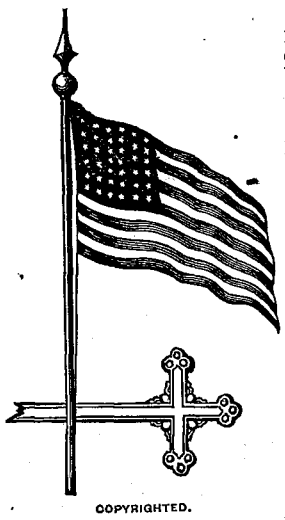
REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.



THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 40 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

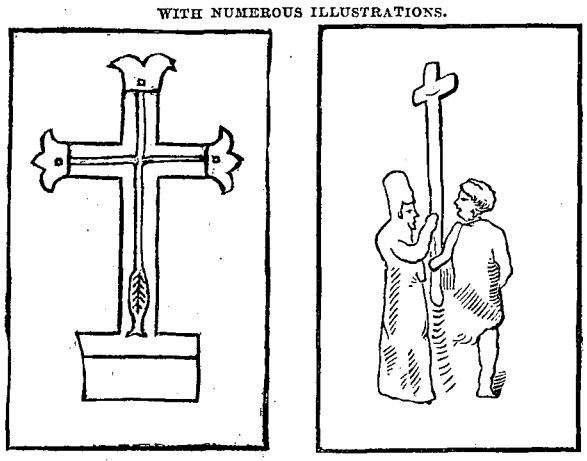
BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

News of the Week.

MR. POWDERLY is dangerously ill.

THE pope received 2,000 Spanish pilgrims on the 8th.

THE first satisfactory observation through the Lick telescope was made on the 7th at 9 P.M.

TRUCKER, Cal., recently celebrated the second anniversary of the expulsion of the Chinese from the place.

KNIGHTS of Labor claim that the reports of the disintegration of their order are false, and that it is prosperous and numbers 500,000 members.

IT is believed in Canada that Cardinal Taschereau is about to reissue the sentence of condemnation that he pronounced against the Knights of Labor, and afterward suspended.

STATISTICS contrasting the industrial conditions of the South under slave and under free labor show great progress. South Carolina's manufactures hav increased 91 per cent in seven years.

FRANK MCGUIRE, of Erie, Pa., who was made insane two years ago by the ex-priest James Maloney, the alleged miracle-worker, in an outbreak of violence on the 6th endeavored to kill Maloney.

FIVE men and three women, convicted of Nihilism, were hanged at St. Petersburg on the 2d. There had been discovered in their home boxes of dynamite and copies of the revolutionary paper, The People's Will.

REV. MR. PENTECOST, who had to leave his pastorate for championing the cause of the poor, has established congregations of his own views in Newark, Brooklyn, and New York, and intends starting open meetings for the study of political economy.

WITHIN a month four trains on the New York city elevated railroad hav left the track, and by the merest chance escaped falling to the street. The millionaire managers are criminally reckless, and with money and influence resist all attempts at reform.

ON the 6th the pope opened to public exhibition his jubilee presents, and entered the hall and ascended his throne with grand ceremonies, attended by forty-eight cardinals, the full pontifical court, and diplomats from nearly every European power.

THE National Divorce Reform League has closed its eighth annual meeting at Boston, making acknowledgment of "the work for social purity done by the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and also of the educational work on the family relations done by the Catholic church."

THE Rev. Heber Newton desires America and England to agree to submit all future differences that may arise between them to arbitration. He hopes that this may be a first step leading toward the establishment of a universal court of international arbitration, and the abolition of war.

"YOU'RE indicted for exhibiting monkeys on Sunday," was the announcement made by Clerk Hall in the general sessions court, New York, on the 6th, when Nathan Morris, one of the Bowery dime museum keepers, came to the bar. "I am not guilty," said Morris. Then he walked out of the court on bail.

WM. SHELBY, of Rutland, Vt., an enthusiastic member of the Salvation Army, the other day suddenly became insane, stabbed his seven-year-old daughter in the back with a jackknife, had a hard tussle with his ten-year-old boy, whom he tramped on and hurt severely, and then rushed into the street and began singing and praying.

THE equipment of soldiers demanded by the new military bill in the German parliament will require a vote of $20,000,000. Herr Bebel, the Socialist leader, continues to denounce all war measures, claiming that they mean more oppression to the people within the empire, and spoliation of the people of other countries, for the benefit solely of the military and bureaucratic classes.

THE third annual report of the national bureau of labor statistics is expected with interest. It will treat of the strikes and lockouts from 1881 to 1886, and will present figures, collected with great care, showing the number of these that hav occurred, the number of employees concerned, the amount lost to the employees and to the employers, and the number of men taken on in consequence of strikes.

Odds and Ends.

"DEATH'S door" is opened with a skeleton key?

MR. WALDO (at a dinner party): "May I pass you the cheese, Miss Breezy?" Miss Breezy (daintily): "Thanks, a small hunk, please."

"Is a double wedding unlucky?" asks a Western exchange. "Well, we should say that it is, especially if wife No. 1 finds ont where wife No. 2 livs."

A CORRESPONDENT suggests that Mr. Comstock arrested Mr. Knoedler because he was informed that the picture-dealer pronounced his name Nude-ler.

"PAPA, why do they always call a railroad train 'she?'" "Because it takes three or four men to manage her, my son," replied Mr. Dawdle, glaring toward his wife.

WIFE: "I see that the poet Whittier, in his eightieth year, mourns that he never got married." Husband: "Yes, some people never do know when they are well off."

MRS. MULCIBER (reading a newspaper): "George, what is this Reading strike?" Mr. Mulciber (who seldom reads a paper): "Oh, I guess they are boycotting some author."

A PERSON of our acquaintance asked another how old he thought Mrs. R——, of Harlem, was. "I do not know her age exactly," he replied; "she varies from seventeen to thirty-five."

TEMPERANCE lecturer (lowering his voice impressivly): "Go into our American gin-palaces, and what do you find?" Husky voice (promptly): "Somebody willing to drink with you."

MISS ETHEL: "And so you are really engaged to Mr. Sampson, Clara?" Miss Clara (blushing): "Yes, it all happened last evening, Ethel." Miss Ethel: "What a blessing leap year is, dear!"

"WHAT did the ladies do for you this year?" asked a churchman of Parson Surplus Eel. The parson, who had been a stock speculator before he was converted, replied, "I am long on slippers and bookmarks, but rather short on suspenders."

SUSAN B. ANTHONY says that "if a young man spends two hours with a young lady every night and her 'old folks' don't make any fuss about it, and his 'old folks' don't make any fuss about it, the two young folks may be said to be engaged." Clearly.

AN Eastern editor says that a man in New York got himself into trouble by marrying two wives. A Western editor replies by assuring his contemporary that a good many men in that section hav done the same thing by marrying one. A Northern editor retorts that quite a number of his acquaintances found trouble enough by barely proposing to marry, without going any further. A Southern editor says that a friend of his was bothered enough when simply found in company with another man's wife.

ENGLISHMAN: "The only question in England now is the Irish problem." American: "Same way here." Englishman: "Here? You are not trying to get the Irish down, are you?" American: "No, they've got us down and we're trying to get up."

A FRENCHMAN claims to be able to prove that fish can hear a man talking in an ordinary voice half a mile away. How far a pickerel can hear the tones of a man who has bobbed from some old wharf for half a day without a nibble, this Frenchman doesn't figure on, and is not asked to.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "People who think that Christmas is a season of 'peace on earth and good-will toward men' probably never saw a man skirmishing around at five o'clock on Christmas eve with a perturbed mind and a five-dollar bill buying presents for a wife and nine dearly beloved children."

COUNTRYMAN (in a Bowery picture gallery): "The cows is all right, an' the trees look kinder natural, but the river there behind 'em is painted mighty poor." Dealer: "If you are up in art at all, my friend, you will know it is impossible to make water and oil mix well." Countryman is convinced and buys the picture.

"ALL is over between us, Mr. Sampson," she said, coldly. "The presents you hav given me will be returned to-morrow." He stood there proudly, but his face was ashen. "Everything shall be returned," she went on, with a queenly sweep of her rounded arm, "with the exception, of course, of the caramels and ice cream." And thus they parted.

A GOOD story of old days in Massachusetts has recently been published. In one of the churches in the eastern part of the state a bass viol was procured to help the choir. One summer Sunday, while the parson was in the middle of the sermon, a big bull got out of his pasture and came swaggering down the road, growling as he came. The minister heard the low bellow, and looking up toward the singers' seats with a grave face, he said: "I would thank the musicians not to tune during service time; it annoys me very much." The choir was surprised, but nothing was said. Pretty soon the bull gave another grumble, and then the parson was mad. He stopped short, and, looking directly at the bass-viol player, said: "I now particularly request Mr. L—— that he will not tune his instrument while I am preaching." This was more than the fiddler could stand. Popping up in his seat he snapped out, "It isn't me, parson, it isn't me. It's that d—d—darned old town bull!"

Gems of Thought.

I MADE up my mind to two things, first, that "the game is not worth the candle," or, in other words, that the saving of souls from the virgin and giving them to the son, or taking them from Mohammed and giving them to Jesus, costs more than it comes to. Second, that this people and this country are suffering more for other things than for Christianity. They need a good government, to know how to make good roads, build good plows, make carts, till the land better, erect good houses, and to learn to lead pleasant, useful lives.—D. M. Bennett.

IT is popularly supposed that belief in a personal deity givs a certain exaltation, serenity, fortitude, hope, and even joy in hours of darkness and calamity, and holds us to high aims; and that, under any cosmic theory, society would sink into barbarism and bestiality. The claim, in my judgment, cannot be maintained. At all events, the sentiment of the legend of Abou Ben Adhem is truer. "The gracious motivs of the soul are purely socia products, are born of communion with actual and idealized human beings, and not with superhuman; and they will flourish and decay, as respect for human rights increases and declines." As well fear that the denial of the old conception of light as a separate entity will involve the world in darkness, and the assertion that heat is only molecular motion will bring an Arctic climate, or at least make the comforts of the fireside forever impossible to the denier of caloric and phlogiston.—E. D. Stark.

A SOLDIER dying in the hospital was asked by a superserviceable agent of the Christian commission if he had found the Lord Jesus. "Oh, I did not know that Jesus was lost," was the reply—innocent or sarcastic we need not inquire. But what the dying soldier did not know is the most patent fact of Christian history. Nothing is surer than that Jesus has been lost for more than eighteen centuries. The myth of his transfiguration is the type of his historical transformation. It says, "There came a cloud and overshadowed him." There did indeed; a cloud of legend and myth, and fancy and exaggeration; of speculativ mist, of ecclesiastical smoke, the breath of incense; but on this account no more transparent. It says, "He feared when he entered the cloud.' He might well hav done so, if he had known how it would falsify his human nature till men should say, "It is a god, it is a god."—Chadwick's Man Jesus.

IT has been frequently stated or implied that Secularists wish to destroy morality. But this is a most absurd slander. No sane man ever dreams of such a policy. Destroying virtues—real, useful virtues—from among mankind in order to make men happier, would, indeed, be the maddest of follies; though a folly, by the way, of which Christianity is far from being guiltless, as witness its systematic repression of intellect and self-reliance, and its fundamental advocacy of the passiv virtues, or rather vices ("other-worldliness," covetous prayerfulness, reckless improvidence, submission to wrong, and tyranny, and so forth), as contrasted with its condemnation or neglect of courageous, thoughtful, prudent, activ virtues, so highly valued among the hardy and enterprising gentile races. . . . The word Christianity is often thoughtlessly used as a synonym for moral excellence. Men teach moral goodness and call it Christianity, when it is nothing of the kind. Their moral judgment shapes their Christianity, more than Christianity shapes their moral judgment.—Religion in Schools.

OH, that a man might know
The end of this day's business ere it come;
But it sufficeth that the day will end,
And the end is known. —Shakspere.

THE moral maxims of the New Testament hav become in many instances obsolete, and the development of society is evolving new rules of conduct. Another table of commandments is in preparation, and will be given by men to God as truly as were the first. They will very likely find utterance in the "resolutions" of a convention, composed of the wisest and best men of the world. Perhaps the new table will embrace such laws as these: 1. Thou shalt giv women equal rights with men. 2. Thou shalt giv a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, and the laborer shall share with the capitalist in the profits of their enterprises. 3. Thou shalt not protect one industry at the expense of another, and thou shalt not refuse free trade with other nations. 4. Thou shalt tax all property alike, religious or secular. 5. Thou shalt not giv religious instruction in public schools, nor force any to pay for the support of religious practices which they do not approve. 6. Thou shalt not advance the price of merchandise by "corners." 7. Thou shalt lay up treasure upon earth, but thou shalt use it for the benefit of man.—Robert C. Adams. [NOTE.—And all the people shall say: Lord, hav mercy upon us, and write all these laws—but especially the fourth—in our hearts, we beseech thee.—Hylax.]

THE Materialist subjects the Bible to the same canons of evidence, and judges as to its historical authenticity and its value by the same rules of criticism, that he employs when he reads Tacitus or Livy, Thucydides or Xenophon. He accepts as probable what seems natural and reasonable, while he rejects without fear or hesitation everything miraculous or plainly fabulous. "It is an absolute rule of criticism," says Renan, "to exclude from history every event of a miraculous character."—Underwood's Materialism and Christianity.

MEAN though I am, not wholly so,
Since quicken'd by thy breath;
O lead me, wheresoe'er I go,
Through this day's life or death.

This day be bread and peace my lot;
All else beneath the sun
Thou know'st if best bestow'd or not,
And let thy will be done.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Herald-Times, the leading Republican paper of Gouverneur, N. Y., in commenting upon the assertion of a speaker before the Evangelical Alliance that our public school system and the press are dangerous agencies for promoting social vice, takes the occasion to remark: "The men who, under the impulsion of religious duty, oppose our public school system are reinforced by others from less commendable motivs. Many are actuated by their interest in the various sectarian theological schools. Then it is only natural that the clergy should regard with suspicion any power which they hav been led to believe is responsible for the waning influence of the pulpit. The press and popular education are closely associated with the live thought of the day. They are identified with our civilization. If they must be overpowered and suppressed as a condition to the revival of pulpit influence, the prospect of that revival is not encouraging. The wheels of progress will roll on. Those who would not be left behind, clergy or laity, must wake up. The truth is that the pulpit needs life. Its voice does not reach more than a third of the American population. Much of the world has moved away from it. Half of the clergy are practically dead. They belong to another age. They can not comprehend the conditions of to-day and the certainties of the future."

THE Philadelphia North American says that the United States senators stay in the lobby while the $900 chaplain offers prayer, giving as an excuse that they don't need to be prayed for. The probability, however, is that they regard the chaplain as a perfunctory nuisance and his prayer as wasted wind. The chaplain should go. The United States government has no business teaching religion.

FOR some weeks past an unusually large quantity of potatoes has been exported from Irish ports for America. At present the potatoes are being rapidly bought up in the north of Ireland for that purpose. From Belfast potatoes are being extensivly forwarded to various ports for shipments.

THE weekly pay-roll of the Singer Sewing Machine Company at Elizabeth, N. J., amounts to $35,000, and that at Glasgow, where one-third more people are employed, to $18,000. While the employees of Elizabeth earn nearly $13 a week, the Glasgow employee earns $5 for the same labor.

IN Breslau, Germany, a chimney fifty-four feet in hight has been constructed entirely of solid blocks of paper firmly compressed together, the blocks being placed carefully one on the top of the other and joined together with a special cement. The chimney is non-inflammable, and by the nature of the material quite secure from lightning. Experiments are being made to prepare paper in such form as to supersede many metals.

COL. ZEB WARD, of Little Rock, Ark., thinks that he was the last man to pay for a negro slave in this country. A negro woman, who had been in his possession for several years while a suit regarding her ownership was pending, afterward brought suit against him for services, and gained a verdict. When Colonel Ward made out a check, he worded it: "To pay for the last negro that will ever be paid for in this country."

A MAN named Percell, recently arrested for perjury in his divorce suit in Kansas City, blames his attorney for his trouble, and says that the lawyer fixed up the schedule of questions and answers, and that he followed his directions in swearing. His reasons for getting a divorce were that he and his wife could not liv pleasantly together, and that when they went to church they could not keep step with each other.

AN OFFERING OF THE BLOOD OF THE SPOTLESS LAMB FOR THE RELIEF OF SOULS IN PURGATORY.

THE watch without hands which has recently been brought before the public is simply a watch with ordinary wheelwork, in which the intermediate teeth are wanting, and which gear every minute and hour only. The contrivance, though admitted to possess some inconveniences, is, on the other hand, claimed to present some genuin preferences over the ordinary make. Thus, the construction not only allows the reading to be accurate, but also admits of estimating the time that separates each passing minute. There is not only an optical signal given, but also an acoustic one, since at every change of figure the ear perceives a slight sound, and consequently it becomes useless for one to examin his watch in order to measure a given interval of time—a feature of special value to engineers, physicians, officers, travelers, and observers. The experimenter is thus enabled to tell exactly when a minute begins and ends.

SOME interesting particulars are given in the "Catholic Directory" for 1888, just published by Messrs. Burns & Oates, regarding the progress of Catholicism in England. While the number of bishops remains the same, that of priests has been increased by 49, and reaches a total of 2,648. The number of churches and chapels is 1,631, showing an increase of 21 during the year just closed. Of the secular clergy ordained priests for England and Wales during the past twelve months the number was 47. The "Directory" contains much information concerning Catholicism in the British empire, within which there are now 25 archiepiscopal and 96 episcopal sees, 19 vicariates apostolic, and 10 prefectures apostolic—in all 150 sees, seven of which are vacant. The Catholic population of England is estimated at 1,354,000; of Scotland at 326,000; of Ireland at 3,961,000: total, 5,641,000. In the colonies there are 175,000; in Asia. 980,000; in America, 2,183,000; in Australasia, 568,000 Catholic British subjects. As queen and empress her majesty reigns over 9,682,000 Catholics. They are represented in the imperial Parliament by 32 peers, and by 5 English and 75 Irish members. There are 9 Catholics in the privy council, and there are 40 Catholic peers, 51 baronets, and 20 lords with courtesy titles.

DR. HURST writes to Harper's Magazine that there are six hundred nativ newspapers in India, all of which, with the exception of about half-a-dozen, are bitterly opposed to Christianity. Societies are now being organized for the dissemination of the skeptical writings of England and America. An important one is in operation from Labore, as a center, while another has its headquarters in Benares. The picture of the gods best known in the Hindoo pantheon are even lithographed in Germany and England and sold in Calcutta. Nativ rajahs interest themselvs in circulating Hindoo tracts, and hav adopted shrewd methods to carry on their work. One rajah is printing just now, at his own expense, 200,000 Hindoo tracts, and intends to distribute them at the large fairs of north India.

The Distribution of Wealth.

It would be impossible for omnipotence to conceive a happier method of existence than that by which action should be made essential to the maintenance of existence, and rest should intervene periodically for the restoration of the power exhausted by action. Only in this way can man enjoy the duplicate happiness derived from the antipodal sources of action and rest. If a man could enjoy ceaselessly the pleasures of action, the pleasures of rest, contemplation and reflection, which are action in another form, would be unknown to him. So if he could enjoy inaction ceaselessly, he would miss the pleasures of action, correspondence of day and night with action and rest. On this thread constitutionally all our beads are strung. Our lives, that we may really liv, must alternate between action and rest. To do so there must be motivs for both, as the pendulum of a clock finds in its spring its motiv to action and in gravity its motiv to rest. So the soul finds in the daily need of nutriment, shelter, and clothing its motiv for action, and in its need of recuperation from the exhaustion induced by action its motiv for rest, reflection, and thought. Hence man's soul swings like a pendulum, with want as its gravity and wealth as its spring, by the law, written in all his members, arteries, and nerves, that action shall produce both exhaustion in those members and supplies of nutrition for them, and that rest shall intervene action, in order that leisure, intellect, and reflection may exist, and the pleasure of life may be doubled. No man can quarrel, therefore, with that fundamental article in the constitution of man, that he shall liv by alternations of action and rest, and if he fails in the action or fails in the rest he shall die. The action essential to liv we call production. If he who carries it on does so at his own cost, i. e., furnishes his own implements, capital, and means of subsistence, he is a producer. If he has to hav the capital and means of subsistence furnished to him, and, like a horse or steam engin, has to be set to work by the exterior force of an employer, whether the inducement be force or wages, he is a mere worker, on a level with a horse or steam engin for the time being, while his employer and not he is the producer, because his employer produces his work. When labor is defined or conceived as the act of working for wages without capital, it cannot be said to be a producer of anything but its own wages. Suppose John Smith to be the worker and the product to be ten yards of carpeting daily. He says: "I produce these ten yards daily. If I stop work, they will stop coming." He stops; but lo! the ten yards daily do not cease coming. Why? Because the same force, want and wages, whereby the employer caused him to produce them, now cause Richard Roe to produce them. Hence all that Smith produced was the diversion of his weekly wages from others to himself. Wage-work is not a producer of any other wealth than that which the wage-worker saves. It is not an independent productiv agent at all. It is like a loom, a plow, or an anvil—a mere implement that has to be set to work, and fed, clothed, and housed while working. Both employer and employee work with want before them, but the employer is laboring to relieve his own wants by serving his customers, the employee by serving his employers.

When the fabric is woven, the loom cannot say, I wove it; neither can the loom-tender. The only producer is he who combined the capital, labor, and raw materials, risking his own means on the chance that the price of the fabric would exceed its cost and taking the difference as his profit. Hence the enterpriser and profit-maker is the moving producer. The wage-worker produces nothing but his wages. In the work of production he figures merely as an implement, or as raw material which has to be bought and paid for at its market value, like pig iron, or coal, or horse-power. In his capacity as a man he is entitled to be treated as a man, but in his capacity as vendor of a commodity he is entitled only to the competitiv value of that commodity, precisely the same as his employer is with the product of his labor. When the Socialists get together, therefore, and resolve that labor, meaning thereby the helpless laborer that works for wages, produces all wealth, they start with a self-evident error of fact, as it is wealth, and the wealth of others, too, that produces this kind of labor. Employed labor cannot be a first cause of anything, since it implies an employer who is its own cause.

Production, therefore, and not mere labor, causes wealth, and, by means of wealth, supports mankind. Production consists either in bringing into existence something which mankind will enjoy, or in forwarding that which already exists to the use, place, and person most in need of it, either by change in its form, change in its place, or change in its ownership.

Economic law causes the production of wealth to go on under the operation of two forces, viz., decline in value and rise in value. Decline in value is due to the fact that every man's power of consumption is extremely limited compared with his capacity, either singly or in association with others, to produce wealth. Advance in value is due to the fact that whatever we produce above what we consume, gains value only as we get it into the hands of those who need it and do not produce it.

For instance, the grower of wheat can himself consume but six bushels of wheat per year, but he can produce, say 1,000 bushels; the other 994 bushels hav no intrinsic value to him. Their highest value will be found only in dividing them among 165 persons and getting their return services. To one man and in one place they are worthless; to another in another place they are priceless. The wheat needs two changes of form, viz.: first into flour, and then into bread; twenty changes of ownership, and 1,000 to 4,000 miles of change of place, to bring it to the point where it is most needed for consumption. At each stage of these needed changes, the wheat undergoes a rise of price slightly exceeding the cost of making the change. This excess of rise in price over cost of making the change is the profit, which is the moving-spring in causing every change the wheat passes through between Dakota and Boston, because the profit is proportionate to the demand, and the demand is the measure of the want.

The profit does not come as a necessity, or as a compensation for service rendered, but the service is rendered because the profit is foreseen; for if the profit-maker calculates unwisely, he may make a loss. He may so grind the wheat that it will net him less in flour than it was worth as wheat, or less in bread than it was worth as flour, or it may be worth less in Boston than it was worth in New York, and so the last change of place may be made at a loss. Hence the profit-maker is the grand steerer of this whole system of exchange which feeds mankind daily by its standing miracle. He makes profits when he steers industry from where it is less needed to where it is more needed and gathers up as wrecks the losses of those who try to steer industry where there is no sailing room.

This law of advancing value as the commodity approaches the point, form, and person, in greatest need, and declining value on all surplus not so forwarded, affects also every person with whom the wheat-producer exchanges, the producer of other foods, clothing, metals, ornament, shelter, amusement, education, worship, ostentation, association, and social position. The preacher's sermon declines peremptorily and sharply in value if he can get no congregation of sinners still in their sins. The lawyer's plea shrivels into worthless words unless he can find some just client unjustly charged. The doctor's pill loses its financial potency to fill his purse except as invalids wait to be lifted by it down into Siloam's healing pool.

So the law of declining value attacks like moths last year's clothing, last month's books, the house growing old, and even the labor that machinery supersedes, while the law of advancing values goes before mankind a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, now guiding them to California or Dakota, to-day sending corn up and wheat down, to-morrow adding half a cent to Lackawanna stock or taking off two points more from Wabash, but ever controling the investment of all the capital of mankind and directing it by the single motiv of profit, as in vegetation the growth of every leaf and twig is guided by the single motiv, light.

Obviously, in a humane point of view it is to the supreme interest of all mankind that those forms of wealth capable of being enjoyed and consumed should be distributed among all men as equally as possible, so that all shall enjoy as nearly alike as their capacities for enjoyment admit, while those forms of wealth which cannot be enjoyed by anybody, but merely used in forwarding the means of enjoyment to those who need them, such as railroads, ships, banks, land, buildings, machinery, should be so owned that mankind shall get their use of them at the lowest cost. The two kinds of wealth, consumable and reproductiv, sustain toward each other the same relation as water or gas pipes in a city sustain to the people. The pipes may be owned by a private monopoly, or by the city, or each man may own so much of them as are on his own premises, or all these three plans may be combined, the question, Who owns the pipes? being subordinate to the question, By which mode of ownership will they bring the water supply most certainly, cheaply, and cleanly to all?

So the question, Who owns the land, mines, furnaces, factories, railroads, indeed, all roads and all the machinery of industry, is subordinate to the question, Under what mode of ownership, whether in common and equal or massed into large fortunes in private hands, do we find that men and women attain to the most general, abundant, and equal enjoyment of consumable values?

Now, the cheapest mode, in the first instance, in which society can get the benefits arising from their use is for society at large not to invest anything in or risk anything upon their construction whatever, but to let those who hav saved means or made profits out of previous undertakings create and build them wholly at their own risk and cost for the profit they can make out of them. This is exactly what society at large does. It gets all its mines opened without risking anything on the question whether they are worth opening; all its railroads built without risking a dollar on the question whether they will get traffic enough to run them; all its stores built and filled with goods without any public risk; and finally even gets all labor employed by private capital without the acknowledgment of any droit du travail or right to be employed on the part of the laborer as against the state. Inasmuch as the aggregate society gets all this in the first instance for absolutely nothing, neither paying a dollar nor risking a dollar for any forward step in the march of enterprise and industry, but allowing private capitalists to go to rack and ruin by thousands in the task, it would seem that at least in the first instance society gets its industries set in motion at the lowest possible cost and on the most economical terms, for that which costs us nothing, but is worth everything, is ordinarily accounted cheap.

If, therefore, society loses at any point by the mode in which its reproductiv wealth, its mines, factories, ships, banks, lands, buildings, and railways are held, it must be through the economic law which masses their ownership into the hands of the profit-makers in large blocks, one profit-maker obtaining the ownership and control of a disproportionately and unprofitably large quantity of reproductiv wealth.

Here, however, we find ourselvs met by another economic law as peremptory as that which limits consumption; prevents a man wearing more than one, two, or three coats at a time, or eating more than three meals a day, or sleeping in more than one room at the same time—viz., that the larger the accumulation of reproductiv capital in a single hand, the lower the charge per cent it exacts from the community for its service.

The newsboy, with $1 of capital, buys 100 papers for one cent each, and sells them for two, making 100 per cent in half a day. With $6, he will hire five boys to sell for him at the halves, and make $2.50 on their earnings, thus increasing his actual earnings to $3.50, but reducing his rate per cent to 50 per cent per day. With $100 capital he sets up a news-stand, and is happy if he makes $5, or 5 per cent a day. With $1,000 he falls to 100 per cent a year. With $10,000 he is content to rise to an income of $3,000 a year, though his rate per cent sinks from 100 to 30. With $100,000 he makes, perhaps, $10,000 net, and on a cool million he is glad to net 4 per cent, his income now rising to $40,000. With the increase in his principal he gets a continual absolute increase of yearly income, but the community get the service rendered to it by his capital at a continually lessening rate of compensation.

This holds as to all modes of investment in reproductiv wealth. Hence, no fact can be plainer than that the social aggregate makes a great economic saving, by concentrating the ownership of its reproductiv wealth in the hands of a few large capitalists, over what it could make by dispersing its ownership among many small ones. Even the concentration of land estates under the English land system makes rents cheap, for the larger the landlord the lower and more liberally he rents his land. Though the aggregate wealth of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is one-sixth greater than the wealth of France, yet the total value of land in England is to that of land in France only as 9 to 14, thus showing that the system of small owners practiced in France makes land dear, while the English system of large owners makes it cheap. Rents of like property are a third cheaper in England than in America, and both in England and America are cheaper at the hands of the large than of the small landlords. So the large capitals carry cheaper on railways than the small, manufacture cheaper, mine cheaper, raise wheat cheaper in Dakota, and cattle cheaper in New Mexico. Everywhere, in short, the community, considered as consumers of the products of reproductiv capital, get those products cheaper by reason of the large capitals, and pay a lower rate per cent of compensation to the large capitalist than to the small. If the same law holds in all cases—and only time is needed to show that it does—this proves that neither in the first instance, nor in the long run, do the aggregate of society make anything but a gain by the concentration into few hands of the capitals invested in reproductiv industry.

Much, if not all, of the difference between barbarism and slavery as they exist in Africa, on the Congo, and in the Soudan, and civilization as it exists in Europe and America, consists in differences of conduct which grow out of the presence of capital in civilization and its absence on the Congo. In civilization all industry and labor are organized into an industrial army that moves harmoniously to its common work, through the inducements of profit to the officers or captains, and wages to the privates or workmen, from among whom the officers are being continually chosen. On the Congo, Niger, and Soudan force is the sole organizer of labor, and slavery reigns. In London and New York, under the influence of motivs of profit, thousands of bankers are daily cashing the drafts of men they never saw for sums that in Africa would buy a kingdom.

On the Congo, Stanley found that strangers, who never saw him before, burnt with a sudden passion to kill and eat him. Yet the savage on the Congo eats a stranger from precisely the same motiv as the banker on the Thames cashes his certified draft, viz., to better his own condition. The difference consists wholly in the existence in England of an organization of industry through capital, and in Africa of its absence.

You know that if even 50,000 men come together, as on the Potomac in 1861, to coöperate toward a common purpose, so long as they are equals and no one man has authority over another they are a useless, disorganized mob, a terror to their friends and a scorn to their enemies. In what does their organization consist? Simply in recognizing or creating inequalities of rank and grade among them, placing the sergeant over the private; the lieutenants over the sergeants; the captains over the lieutenants; the majors over the captains, and so on up through adjutants, lieutenant colonels, colonels, brigadiers, major-generals, and generals to the commander-in-chief; and in differentiating them into squads, companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, divisions, corps, and armies, and assigning some to artillery, cavalry, infantry, skirmishing, scouting, sappers and miners, commissary, quartermaster, surgeons, and care of prisoners. So long as all men in the army were equals, the army was a useless mob. When it is brought to its highest stage of organization and efficiency and has fought twenty battles, no two men in it are quite equal, but each always knows when to giv way to the other. This subordination, from intelligent motivs, constitutes military effectivness. It is not arbitrary. The colonels average a higher efficiency than the privates as a rule, and the generals are apt to be more efficient than the colonels.

In civilization, this organization of workers is effected through capital. Every capitalist is limited in the number of workers he can command only by his possession of the means to keep them productivly employed and the sagacity to so employ them with reference to the demand of society for their product that such product shall always sell for enough more than it costs him to produce it to keep his waste of capital renewed, and to leave a constant increase to its volume. If he does not do this, he loses his capital and returns to the wage-workers. As a man may become a great soldier without being great in any other respect, and as he generally is without eloquence, or poetic genius, or fine artistic sense, so a man may be a great accumulator of wealth without being an able man in any other way. A great commander must, however, hav strong fighting sense —i. e., marked capacity to know how one force of men can be overcome by another. So a great capitalist must hav the value sense—i. e., must keenly feel every waste, perceive every economy, and know every time what will sell for more to-morrow than it is worth to-day. For, as we hav already proved that the interests of society require that reproductiv wealth shall be concentrated, just as power in an army is concentrated upon its officers, yet that those officers shall hav the qualities that constitute the fighting sense—viz., courage, coolness, indomitable will, sagacity to see the enemy's weak point, and untiring vigilance—so must the capitalist hav the value sense. When Stephen Girard was going through a market and saw a poor man buying some chickens for breeding, he stopped. "Not the right bargain for you," said he; "too many roosters there for the pullets." On another occasion, when a broker was trying to insure some ships for him and he was holding the broker off at arm's length waiting for news, he discovered that what the broker really meant was to find out that the vessels were safe before he insured them. Girard got the news first that the vessels were lost, and sent the following word to the broker: "If the policies are not yet issued, don't send them. I hav heard from all the ships." The broker replied: "I greatly regret, but the policies were all issued yesterday, and the bearer will call on you for the premium." So Girard paid the premium, and shortly after collected the insurance. Girard thus made a handsome profit out of the dishonesty that was trying to cheat him.

The Age of Man on the Earth.

It is seen that the problem presented to modern research is this: Laying side by side the lists of kings given by Herodotus; the lists of kings given by Manetho; the lists of kings given by Erastosthenes, and afterward carried out and completed by Apollodorus; the lists of kings given in what is known as the Turin papyrus (of a period somewhere between 1000 and 1500 B.C.); the lists of kings as deciphered from the existing monuments of Egypt—to determin by comparison and equation of dates the true chronology for the period.

One chief difficulty is this—whether any, or a few, or many of the kings belonging to the dynasties commencing with Menes and ending with the subjugation of Egypt by the Persians were contemporaneous—that is, reigning in different parts of the country at the same time; or whether all the dynasties were consecutiv—that is, succeeding each other in chronological order from first to last. A comparison of one list with another always shows discrepancies and absurdities, and some archeologists and historians hav decided the question in one way and some in another.

Another insuperable difficulty is the want of evidence before dynasty 18 from which those lists can be verified. Some hav proposed, where there are blanks in the evidence, to construct chronologies on the genealogical method, while others maintain that "if this method of computing by genealogies fails where we hav a genealogical list, obviously it cannot be applied to dynastic lists which we do not know to be genealogical. The average length of reigns is usually different from, and less than, that of generations, and we cannot tell the average length of reigns without knowing the law of succession of the country and its political conditions in the period under consideration. It is, therefore, especially hazardous thus to measure the Egyptian chronology before dynasty 18, at which time ascending genealogical evidence fails us."

Such is the difficult and fabulous aspect of the question. No wonder Durviage says, "The accounts which ancient writers giv of the early history of Egypt are so contradictory and improbable that it is needless to allude to them in a work which professes to deal with matters of fact."

Therefore, it may be assumed that approximativ chronology of Egypt begins with the epoch of dynasty 18, about 1591 B.C. From that time forward the lists of kings given by ancient writers can be verified by architectural monuments and fragmentary remains; and a more definit chronology begins with the synchronism of Egyptian and Hebrew history at the accession of dynasty 22, about 980 B.C.

It is, indeed, surprising that anyone will attempt to resist the Mosaic records, by impugning their veracity, when the evidence by which their falsity is to be proven are chronologies constructed from lists contradictory and impossible, and which cannot be verified by either monumental evidence or genealogical lists prior to the accession of the 18th dynasty; their verification during the long blank periods, when there were no monuments, being the result of conjecture and hypothesis.

Now I will take up the question of the antiquity of the Chinese and briefly examin it. First, we are given this quotation from Meadows, taken from the duke of Argyll's "Primitiv Man," as follows: "There is another civilization which appears to be almost as ancient as that of Egypt and which has been far more enduring. The authentic records of the Chinese empire are said to begin 2400 B.C., three hundred years before Abraham. They begin, too, apparently, with a kingdom already established, with a capital city and with a settled government."

The professor forgot to giv any part of the duke's argument upon this question, but next asserted that, "according to Bunsen, another great authority, it took five thousand years to form the Chinese language, which was begun about 20,000 B.C."

As to the first. According to the Encyclopedia Britannica, also a very great authority, the "Chinese history begins by describing the nucleus of the nation as a little horde of wanderers roving among the forests of Shan-se, without houses, without clothing, without fire to cook their victuals, and subsisting on the spoils of the chase, eked out with roots and insects."

As to the origin of the Chinese race, "investigation has proved beyond a doubt that these wanderers were no indigenous sons of the soil, but were strangers and pilgrims from other lands, and that they established small colonies on the fertil soil of the modern province of Shan-se. Though these immigrants were for the moment wanderers, and notwithstanding the apparent evidence in favor of their having been originally a nomadic rather than an agricultural people, it becomes abundantly evident, from the earliest records they possess, that, at all events, immediately on their arrival in China, they settled down as agriculturists. They cultivated grain for their sustenance, and flax, which they wove into garments. They knew the value of silk-worms and planted the mulberry-tree; they developed trade and established fairs at certain centers of their districts. Neither were they destitute of the elements of intellectual culture, and in all probability they brought with them an acquaintanceship with hieroglyphic writing."

Johnson's Universal Cyclopedia, another work of great authority, says that "the historical period, according to most authorities, begins with the year 2207 B.C., though some dates previous to that time are given with tolerable certainty. Bunsen, however, states that systematic Chinese history hardly goes farther back than 1991 B.C., the date of the accession of the great emperor Yu, the Charlemagne of the East who extended the sway of the Shan-se dynasty to southern China." Then we may assume with a reasonable degree of certainty, allowing the professor about two hundred years of traditional history, that the Chinese empire was founded about 2400 B.C. Then, according to his own figures, the Chinese empire was founded more than seven hundred years after the Septuagint date for the deluge, a period of sufficient length for immigrants to settle the country and found a great empire.

In the next place, Professor Moss's quotation, in respect to the Chinese language, is manifestly an absurdity. The fact is this, it is the leading member of the group of monosyllabic languages which are found in southeastern Asia, and is described as monosyllabic. This monosyllabism is not a state to which it has been reduced by a process of phonetic decay, but manifestly a primitiv condition. It is a language in its most ancient form, and represents a stage out of which all other languages hav passed, from which they hav all been formed or developed.

Chinese words are hardly parts of speech in the sense in which we use the term, being to a great extent in the root state. They are altogether destitute of inflection, or even agglutination. The substantivs are indeclinable, and the verbs cannot be conjugated.

The language is destitute of an alphabet, and is expressed on paper in thousands of distinct symbols. Therefore it is a language of monosyllabic roots, every root a word, and every word a root, which as regards its written character has been arrested in its development, and crystallized in its most ancient form, by the early occurrence of a period of great literary activity. (See Encyclopedia Britannica and Johnson's Cyclopedia on Chinese Language.)

It is, therefore, manifestly plain, that the single assertion that "it took 5,000 years to form the Chinese language," when, in fact, it never was formed, or developed beyond the root stage, is an utter absurdity; then, with all these indisputable facts before us, substantiated as they are by a large majority of the most eminent authorities, we are forced to the conclusion that this entire quotation from Bunsen is a gross misstatement of historical evidence.

I would suggest to the professor that he turn his attention to some other fields, for thus far we find the scripture records fully vindicated.

As this article is longer than it ought to be, I will answer his geological speculations in the next.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

Literally a kingdom of air and emptiness. The poor man's only inheritance. We cannot liv very well without it, but unfortunately we cannot liv upon it. Jesus frankly told his disciples that it was not meat and drink, yet advises them to giv up all that represented meat and drink for the sake of enjoying it. No wonder the rich young man declined the exchange, although he felt sorry to do so. Perhaps he had learned by experience that it is impossible to fill an empty stomach with the "bare imagination of a feast." Most inheritors of the kingdom of heaven would gladly barter their birthright for a few acres of solid land, or even, like Esau, for a bowl of porridge. When we are young and enthusiastic we sometimes fancy we hav secured the inheritance without complying with the conditions. We enter into our kingdom of air and begin to build castles in it. Youth, wealth, and high spirits are favorable conditions under which to "follow Jesus," but then they do not last. And even whilst they do last, these qualifications produce wants and desires the gratification of which is incompatible with a life of celibacy and poverty. The union of true youthful saints is a hopeless affair unless one of them turns out to be a devil in disguise. And then we find that whilst the saint is luxuriating in the possession of a fanciful kingdom, it is the fire of the devil's kindling that keeps the pot boiling.

We cannot get on without the devil anyhow. Even Jesus, who may be supposed to be a good judge of character, chose one devil among the twelve, who was appointed treasurer and general business manager. A kingdom without an exchequer cannot stand, even if it be the kingdom of heaven. And thus we find to the present day that the churches of Christ are always requiring funds, and they employ devils to collect them. A minister can no more get on without a devil than can a printer. Even John the Baptist, who invented the kingdom of heaven, who ministered in the open air, had no pew rents to collect, and apparently lived without eating and drinking, was said to hav a devil, who found him in locusts and wild honey. Jesus made no pretense to asceticism, and was not even a total abstainer, but he undoubtedly had a devil, who kept him at one time for forty days without food, and tauntingly asked him if he could make bread out of stones. And when the devil was tired of teasing Jesus, he went and got him something to eat. It is said that angels ministered to him. Our estimation of good and evil, of angels and devils, is greatly influenced by the state of the stomach. We are obliged to come down from our fanciful kingdom when the dinner hour is long overdue. And when we are very sharp set, we do not too curiously inquire who is the caterer or who the cook.

The disciples of Jesus soon found out the unsubstantial nature of their inheritance as far as this world is concerned, and contrived to convert it into an imaginary post-obit. We shall enter into heaven, they say, when we die. But do we? The dying person, whether saint or sinner, does not evaporate into thin air, but remains where he is; and the holiest person that ever lived will stink and become a nuisance if not decently interred. Even if we believe the outrageous fiction that Jesus was seen walking about after the crucifixion with a hole in his side big enough to thrust a man's hand into, how do we account for the fact that such a phenomenon is unique? And where is the heaven located into which he was said to ascend? Those who go up in a balloon say the higher you ascend the colder it becomes, and the less habitable the air; and there is nothing to eat except what you carry up from below. Of the two habitations, I should prefer the Christian hell. It is at least warm there, and we may as well burn as freeze. As to burning forever and ever, that is about as reasonable as to liv forever and ever on air.

Chicago Correspondence.

The first lecture of the new year and the last lecture of the old, at the Chicago Secular Union, were memorable occasions. Christmas night, Mrs. Freeman was, as usual, put on the list as a house-drawing attraction, on account of the festiv season. And in this respect our anticipations were fully realized; besides, in her handling of her subject, "Orthodox Problems," she seemed to surpass all previous efforts. The Biblical conundrums she hurled at its professed believers will take them several ages to solve, and she showed up Noah's ark's architectural absurdities in a manner that brought forth peals of laughter and rounds of applause. That her expected tour will be one of triumph, that she will go on from conquering but to conquer the bigotry and superstition of our time, and that she will receive the recognition and encouragement that her talents so richly deserve, is the heartfelt wish of every member of the Chicago society and all others.

The New Year's chimes, "Ring out the Old, Ring in the New," were well performed by Prof. W. S. Bell, who gave his first lecture before our society on the first day of the year, appropriately choosing as his subject those fundamental bases of human society, "Liberty and Morality"—a good topic for a New Year's discourse. Mr. Bell's lecture was a profound presentation of the philosophy of the individualistic school, interspersed with sufficient facetious allusions to retain the attention of the average audience while placing before them abstractions of philosophy. Those who in the discussion disagreed with Mr. Bell acknowledged the ability with which he had presented his theory of "Liberty and Morality." The telling points were frequently applauded, and Mr. Bell feels that he scored a success before as critical an audience as assembles between Chicago and New York. It was my intention to send you a synopsis of his lecture, but, having lost my notes, I must prepare, like the Battle Creek Adventists, for the End—for which your readers will doubtless be duly grateful.

Rev. Bird Wilkins, for twelve years pastor of the Bethesda Methodist church, has for months past been unable to harmonize the promptings of his reason with the requirements of the theology of his denomination, and, being an advanced thinker and a cultured gentleman, has refrained from doing violence to his conscience by compromising his convictions. His sermons or lectures hav for some time back been quite undenominational; in fact, the flavor of orthodoxy was conspicuous by its absence. These were relished by the intelligent portion of his colored congregation, among whom are many persons of education and means.

In September or October, Mr. Wilkins gave a radical discourse on the condemned Anarchists, comparing the agitation of these social reformers to the work which Christ attempted to inaugurate. The preacher conclusivly proved the Communistic character of Christ's teachings. It was a remarkable discourse, being copied largely into the daily press, and creating quite a sensation. That sermon seems to hav been the culminating point, and shortly after Mr. Wilkins resigned his pastorate, cut adrift from orthodox moorings, and avowed himself a Freethinker, taking the influential portion of his flock with him.

The ex-reverend, during December, paid a visit to the Chicago Secular Union the night of Professor Orchardson's stinging sarcasm on the "Immorality of Christian Teachers," and, being invited to criticise, informed the audience that he was neither shocked nor surprised, and had been giving expression to similar sentiments. This astounded his auditors, and they gave the new apostle of mental freedom a hearty welcome.

A few days later Mr. Wilkins called on the writer in exuberant spirits and exhibited a paper sent him by several gentleman admirers who subscribed $100 each for the erection of a Liberal Temple for an anti-slavery-of-the-mind society among his race.

Mr. Wilkins had been holding independent meetings, where portions of Ingersoll's works were read and discussed by his audience, in a hall hired for that purpose at 2,906 State street. He has received numerous threatening letters, warning him to discontinue his unorthodox ministrations, or dire consequences would follow, to which, however, he paid no attention. Last Sunday evening, while conducting services at the above number, he was informed that his house was on fire, and on arriving at his residence, 2,910 Dearborn street, he found his home practically ruined and his furniture destroyed. Surmising that it might be the work of enemies, but having no proofs, Mr. Wilkins said nothing, but on Thursday he was the recipient of the following letter:

CITY, Jan. 5, 1888.

MR. WILKINS: We hav warned you that you cannot preach against orthodox religion. We believe you are teaching a religion from the devil, and we set your house afire in three places, but it burnt in only one. We will kill you before you shall hurt us with your new religion. Our white orthodox churches tell us to run you out of this town, and you hav got to go. If you stay you will do so at the risk of your life. We tell you in time. This is our last warning. We don't want to hurt you, but you must leave this place. Now get out as quick as you can. AN ORTHODOX.

Mr. Wilkins proposes to hold the fort, and if the police and fire department cannot protect him, he will furnish his orthodox fire-fiends with a foretaste of the place they hav prepared for the devil and his angels.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

GALENA, KAN., Dec. 21st, 22d, 23d.—This was my first entrance into bleeding Kansas, and looking over Galena, with its little derricks, and innumerable holes from two to ten feet wide and from eight inches to several hundred feet deep, one is convinced she certainly had wounds enough, had been bled enough. No wonder she has now gone dry!

Galena is a thriving lead and zinc mining town. Hard workers are the miners, and profitable customers to the town of Joplin, Mo. (Joplin is not local option). The requirements of the miners to establish their independence, and keep a supply of what a fanatical law denies them, results in two jug-trains a day from Joplin to Galena.

Here I found a warm welcome from that young and enthusiastic worker for human progress, Will. E. Gault, the noble son of a right noble sire—Elias H. Gault, of Kalamazoo, Mich. Willie when only a youth evinced an investigativ spirit, and insisted on answers to his, Why? He obtained a copy of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." His parents—then most devout Methodists—were much horrified to find him in possession of such a "dreadful wicked book," but he coaxed his mother to read a little of it, and she in turn coaxed her husband to listen to her reading of it, and the result was the Methodist church lost two of its best and most highly esteemed members.

Under the enthusiasm of W. E. Gault and that sturdy son of Vulcan, H. I. Forgey, the Liberal friends rallied and arrangements were completed for me to deliver three lectures. The first evening's attendance was only very moderate; the second, the hall was filled, and very great interest was awakened; the third evening the house was packed—standing-room even was at a premium. I sold large quantities of Liberal literature and obtained a number of subscribers to periodicals. There was a general desire to hav me lecture again on Christmas day, but I needed a rest, and had long counted on spending the holiday with Mr. Gault and his wife; and then, too, I was doubtful of the extra jug-train—feared the additional exhilaration might make the attendance more demonstrativ than attentiv. My fears did injustice to the miners of Galena. I did not see a drunken person in the audience either evening. It was not possible to hav better order and attention, and on Christmas day and night, despite the abundance of jugs and beer-kegs imported from Joplin, I saw no signs of any drunkenness, except in the case of a rabid fanatic named Wood, the old 'bus-driver, who was full of spirits of some kind. I was advertised for Liberal, Monday evening, so on Sunday night I accompanied Mr. Gault to the express stables, and found the old imbecil who claims to run the concern. He promised to call for me and my baggage and hav all over to the depot in the morning in good season; he never came near. Monday morning I waited and waited until a quarter of an hour of train time, then I seized my grip, weighing about one hundred and twenty pounds, left word to forward my trunk, and rushed frantically across lots, in hope to reach the depot in time—to rush across holes of all sizes and uncertain depths, with little heaps, large heaps, and young mountains of loose refuse, sand, and rock in every direction, with rivulets of muddy water running between, forming ditches of from six inches to four feet wide. To jump, skip, stumble, scramble along, gasping for breath, the grip seeming to double in weight at every ten rods—to hear the shrill whistle of the locomotiv—to make one more desperate, frenzied spurt, only to find yourself rapidly descending a big mound of debris, and suddenly and unwillingly sit down in a shallow mud puddle, with a very impressiv but irregular bottom, composed of jagged pieces of rock—to find your plug hat flying into a ditch in pursuit of a drink, and your grip suddenly disappear, gone prospecting down an abandoned shaft—then at this moment to see the train dash up to the depot, one hundred yards ahead of you, and ere you can regain your perpendicular or regain your voice, to see the train move off, and know there is no other train till the next day—I may be rash in jumping to conclusions, but I really think this fills the sum of human misery in "getting left." I certainly was badly left, and I felt it sorely, very sorely, especially when, later on, I attempted to sit down. On reaching the depot I met the old idiot Wood, on his 'bus returning; he had maliciously and wilfully left me. That the poor, miserable wretch still lives, speaks volumes for the restraining grace and magnanimity that Liberalism inculcates. I telegraphed friends at Liberal I would arrive next day.

LIBERAL, Mo., Dec. 27th.—A bitter cold rain-storm, and the disappointment of night before, resulted in only small attendance at the lecture, but all who did attend seemed to enjoy it hugely.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Yale, Mr. and Mrs. P. J. Umbrite, and good old friend Fritz of the hotel.

I failed to meet G. H. Walser. Mr. Walser has from the first been most generous, alike in donating land, money, and time to the Freethought University. When nearly all else were indifferent or opposed, Mr. Walser strove in every way, despite his own private troubles and financial embarrassments, to hold up the hands of Professor Leahy in establishing the University.

Mr. Walser is an impulsiv, generous-hearted man, intense in his likes and dislikes, prone to yield to the influence of those he thinks, at the moment, are his friends. He has large credulity, and is easily deceived—believing all who flatter him are what they seem. Passionate of nature, he is quick to resent, and very fierce in his denunciation of anything that jars on his sense of right, and is apt to be rashly severe and vindictiv to those who oppose or in any way offend him, although he never wearies of doing favors for those who please him. That his heart is in the work of human progress, and that he is ever desirous to advance the interests of Liberal, his whole life bears testimony; yet, beyond question, if he would absent himself from Liberal for a few years he would be better appreciated; the citizens would become more self-reliant, and on his return he would be surprised and delighted at the progress the town had made.

There is great need of a new hotel—the old building is unsuitable. A really able, live hotel-keeper, who would erect and run a really first-class hotel, would be sure of grand success.

There is a good opening for a competent barber. The gentleman who now officiates as tonsorial artist is not a success. He handles the heads of his customers as gently as an express baggage-man slings a refractory trunk. As trainer for John Sullivan, as a cannon-ball performer, or as a blacksmith's helper he would find more congenial exercise for his energy and surplus muscle.

A coöperativ general store, the stock owned by the Liberals of Liberal, would be of immense advantage and secure the profits of the trade of the town and the surrounding country, which is now mainly monopolized by Christians.

W. S. Allison, the partner and associate editor with Professor Leahy, of the American Idea, is a young man of modesty, great ability, and sturdy independence, yet having a tender, sympathetic, loving nature. He has a very clear and full sense of the high and ennobling principles of Liberalism, and well deserves the support of all lovers of the cause. Let all who can afford to do so send $1, subscription price for one year, to the American Idea, the organ of the Freethought University, and thus help themselvs and also a self-sacrificing worker, and aid to establish a really excellent and needed paper.

If the people of Liberal will earnestly unite in the establishing of some manufacturing industry, nothing can now prevent the rapid growth and permanent prosperity of this town. But without mechanical industry, without employment for the working classes, they will hav a long and dreary, if not hopeless, struggle.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

THE English religious paper called the Rock reports that "at the Baptist chapel, Salcombe, a free tea was given recently to old people, irrespectiv of their religious belief. Among the number were Episcopalians, Plymouth Brethren, Wesleyans, Baptists, and Infidels." No comments.

Our London Letter.

A retrospect of the year, now at its close, is anything but discouraging to the Freethought party, which must not be judged solely by the numbers added to this or that society. The principles themselvs hav, to my own knowledge, been practically adopted by many who hav no intention of attaching themselvs to any particular association. There is still sufficient bigotry in existence to favor persecution wherever it can be applied, and even in the present days of comparativ enlightenment, it is not always safe to openly avow heterodox opinions. If perfect freedom in this respect were permitted, it would greatly astonish many of the clergy to find how many of the congregations had no faith whatever in the religious nostrums supplied to them.

The dissensions in the Christian sects are fast hastening the dissolution of supernaturali m. It is not only the distinct sects that quarrel with one another, but the members of each sect are at loggerheads. There is scarcely one of them in which there is not decided difference of opinion leading to acrimonious disputes and consequent divisions. The whole thing is rotten to the core, with simply the shell standing, and the end must inevitably come, no one can say how soon.

Christianity has had splendid opportunities, but unfortunately for itself it has terribly abused them, perhaps more so than any other historic religion. Had it adopted the humanitarian side of the doctrin attributed to its putativ founder, it might hav so deeply rooted itself into the hearts of mankind as to hav been deemed eternal, but the continual greed for tangible wealth and power has caused the revulsion of feeling among the more thoughtful, that only in these latter days can be so openly expressed.

It will perhaps be better for the majority that Christianity does not expire too rapidly; there are as yet comparativly few who are able to adopt Secularism pure and simple, and it will take a long course of education and some few generations must run their course and pass away before the many are ready to receive what we consider to be the truth, and divest themselvs of the ideas so long current as to the why and wherefore of human life. It is not flattering to our vanity to think we are but links in nature's chain, and of no more importance than any other organism. Arrogance was the basis of the doctrin of immortality, and the humility engendered by scientific knowledge has shown the fallacy of any such belief.

London, Dec. 31, 1887.

Review of the Year in England.

Charles Bradlaugh in National Reformer.

The long-drawn out oath struggle has had this year some new phases. The bill for giving the option of affirmation in all cases and under all circumstances where an oath is, or may be, lawfully required was reintroduced on the first day of the session, and has only been prevented from passing the House of Commons by persistent blocking on the part of some half-dozen obstructivs. It has, however, in two important divisions at the close of an all-night sitting, secured the support of a very substantial majority of the House, so that even Mr. Hubbard withdrew his opposition to the second reading, and the bill has ceased to be treated as a pure party question, the Conservativ solicitor-general having spoken and voted in favor of the measure, and a considerable section of the Conservativs being now pledged to support it, including Lord Randolph Churchill, who has publicly declared this in writing.

In the high court of justice the judges hav declined to allow persons without religious belief to affirm as jurors. Some of the judges hav treated the Freethinking juror as if his unbelief were a crime, and, while refusing his affirmation, hav compelled him to remain in idle attendance in court to the close of the sittings. Other judges hav more courteously and considerately excused the juror who was ready to perform duty, but was disabled by law from either taking the oath or affirming.

In the coroners' courts, county courts, magistrates' courts, there has been the most curious blundering as to the law on affirmation, and the most extraordinary confusion as to the practice.

Some magistrates, coroners, and county court judges hav illegally refused to take the affirmation of non-Christian witnesses. In all such cases, immediate action has been taken either by question in the House of Commons or otherwise, with useful results in getting the law accurately explained and upheld.

Many coroners—courteously enough, but quite illegally—hav this year allowed persons without religious belief to affirm as jurors, and in some sessions cases the same practice has been followed without legal authority.

Now that the heat of the Parliamentary phase of the oath question has abated, less interest has been manifested by the general public, and the energy of the Freethought party itself has not been so marked in petitioning Parliament for change in the law. A considerable number of very useful resolutions in favor of the Oaths bill were, however, passed by branches of the National Secular Society, workmen's clubs, and Liberal and Radical associations.

I regret to record that the Liberal Federation at Nottingham took no action and expressed no opinion on the matter. The National Reform Union, Manchester, gave considerable aid in urging the question on its branches and their Parliamentary representativs.

The Guild of St. Matthew, of which the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam and Mr. Verinder are the activ and earnest representativs, has given very efficient help in pressing for support to the Oaths bill.

If the Affirmation bill is to be carried in the coming session, as I trust it will at least be through the House of Commons, the most activ coöperation of outside friends will be necessary. Every branch of the National Secular Society should send up a resolution in favor of the bill to its local M.P. and to the leader of the House of Commons. Workmen's clubs and Liberal and Radical associations should be earnestly pressed to pass similar resolutions. All such resolutions should be at once reported to me, and should be sent for insertion to the local press. Every Freethinker summoned as a witness, or as a juror, can, and ought to, obtain printed instructions for his guidance in court by sending to me, or to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter street, E.C., a stamped and directed envelope. Every person summoned as a juror should at once carefully report to me what transpires in court, so that I may use each instance in the House of Commons.

The movement for the repeal of the Blasphemy laws has made but little progress during the past year. The bill for abolition of prosecutions for expression of opinions on matters of religion, introduced by Mr. Courtney Kenny, did not even come on for debate on its second reading, in consequence of the whole time of the house being taken by the government. Unfortunately, the introduction—practically from the Indian penal code—of a clause deemed objectionable by the Unitarians, by many Protestants, and by a majority of the Freethought party, checked any enthusiasm in favor of Mr. Kenny's really well-meant measure. Petitions for the repeal of the Blasphemy laws were fewer than for many years. It is worthy note that several religious bodies petitioned against Mr. Kenny's bill on the ground that it was likely to limit free discussion. The need for the repeal and abrogation of the disabling statute and common law has been specially marked in a case recently pending in the vice-chancellor's court of the county palatinate of Lancaster.

This year a well-attended and thoroughly successful International Conference of Freethinkers was held in London, convened under the auspices of the National Secular Society by the authority of the general council of the International Federation of Freethinkers.

Limits of Organization, and Urgent Facts.

The number of branches well included in a definitly defined organization may depend on its peculiarities. Considerations on this point are now forced before believers in radical labor for the sustaining of our nation. It is clearly shown by open assertions, as well as despotic aspects and executions, that fast rising tyrannies must be stayed by countervailing action, or hierarchies, uniting with other financial monopolies, will soon command the remnant of individual and state liberties. What shall the action be? what denominated? who will advance it, and how many sustain its incipiency? are first questions. Be it remembered that present unions, seeking relief from extortions, are methods to modify special effects, and reach not to causes continually depleting and controling the main population. A union pruning the root of the universal infection is requisit to vivify the people to the ability for secularization, as their firm spirit and reasoning voice must become paramount to party craft. The National Secular Union long ago resolved, and now repeats, that it can only labor for its Demands in the line of general lectures, and admits the necessity of other labor by other organizations. I hav argued that labor to remold and empower the wide population was a need from the first Secular formula; am glad an admission is publicly called out, and hope suggestions by many will be published. And respectful criticism should be no offense, while Freethinkers are weighing the value of local clubs (or lyceums) on the condition of the scattered people against the value of eloquent annual conventions of a few hundred stylish people. In the past twenty years Secular labor has simply reached advancing adults, who hav in small degree influenced surrounding adults; has extended auxiliaries to a few hundred which partially support the National; has employed a few itinerant speakers who enlist rational thought, and held annual Congresses which aimed to be grandly popular. The Nine Demands are unanswered, and the basis of each one has been reinvaded by a trebly strengthened grasp, while legislation and administration has become so corrupt that justice is not expected of them. Popularity has long been the voice of oppressiv compacts—a lure to be scorned by justice seekers. Persons and societies yielding to it giv their power to the compacts, and become slaves; for, if claiming another standard, they are helpless to uphold it. Large numbers, acting under its guise, sell their characters, their country, and with them the brave who strive for the liberation of all. These facts are so recklessly ignored that very few Secularists assume independent attitudes. Since alarm at legal usurpation appeared, despotic adventure has tested its skill on the weakness of our government, and cruel persecutions are revolting results.

Scientific journals, clubs, reforms, and discussions hav mended opinions of readers and thinkers, while luxury and excess hav nullified the improvement in many of them, and no measures but the common school, which is mostly spurious, hav been in operation to inform, encourage, and raise to self-protection uncultivated classes, ignorant acceptors of sordid delusions and stale prejudice, of vitiating stimulants, nostrums, and countless depraving articles, making them crushed minions of enticing powers; nor to round to poise and patriotism the large numbers of clever, unconscious traitors who cheer the good principles of Ingersoll and Remsburg, but contribute to the new village church and buy an annual pew in the old one, just to appease the social and business boycott, seeming not to see that they are empowering emperors and popes, building cathedrals for cardinals and kings, and huts, cells, and scaffolds for their own children. Such compliance in our land is ample to support a movement to transform the stupidity to self-sufficiency, to banish sloth, poverty, ignorance, and cowardice from these convulsed states. This leaving the human fields to the culture of skilled craft and callous treachery, both of the petty and the mighty, must now be seen a vast omission, a sore neglect, by able men. Women hav apologies in civil and social limits; are mainly reckless in sacrificing what they might acquire to the insidious Moloch ton, a fit probation for degrees in old and new Jerusalems. But they know better, and, I believe, are not so dead as to tamely assent to the fastening of statute bondage on their abject sons and daughters, but will revive and coöperate with men for general safety when given opportunity. Whatever extent dangers may reach, it is evident that counteraction should check, ameliorate, and finally supersede forceful wrongs. Such action bespeaks another union with measures amid present acting causes, and points to habits and customs that train the child, youth, and adult in policies and precedents selfishly guiding leaders hav established. A mere glance sees these customs unnatural, these policies betraying, the characters they mold dwarfed from the start, and the warping accelerated by mothers physically deformed, systematically deranged, fancifully vain, and piously frail. Hence, rectifying methods are to be laid in natural laws for life's best uses—in education, in a knowledge of these laws and their application to physical soundness, and through that to mental strength and all functional powers, passional, ethical, and esthetical. Integral Culture College is an appropriate title for such effort, but appears too pretentious for these times; and I suggest that of Sanitary Union or Sanitary Lyceum, which has a quiet sound, invites no suspicion, and includes branches beyond mere hygiene; science, industry, sociology, commerce, and, justly enough, government come within its scope.

There is abundance of wealth outside the tyrannous schemers, and its wise sharers should feel that portions are better used in justice's cause than in erecting more prisons, asylums, monasteries, and Protestant dens for traduced victims. People from childhood to old age should come into the culture, each for self and for all, and those who now hav it for all who hav it not. Are the humane men evolved to see this, the saving work of the crisis, and inaugurate it? If so, it is "what can be done." The many barbarisms running through the usages must fall out as right is practiced. The various unions would doubtless fraternize and welcome this. "Education, beginning at the physical basis," is becoming a general phrase with thoughtful Liberals. Professor Oswald, who knows the forces that hav nursed and ushered our dilemmas, believes such education the means for dispelling the demoralizations, for giving wholesome prosperity and a secular state.

But there must be conferring, deciding, and beginning. All knowledge will avail nothing if not made practicable by patient, conscientious action. In this century the maxim, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," has been oft repeated, but has been worse than a dead letter—is responsible for knowing its duty, while allowing invasions of living bondage. Must Vigilance longer doze in life's breezy poppy bowers, and hear the riot charge on innocence, the dungeon keys ring torture for the truth, the martyr's last farewells throttled, while the millions moan under cruel wrongs; or will the people be educated in the knowledge of the truth till they hav bodies, souls, and voices potent to command themselvs? Are any awake to call sleepers from out the moony dews?

Bible Myths and Evolution.

We hav seen how completely antagonistic are the teachings of the Bible to the demonstrated facts of modern science; and many of the ancient stories concerning the origin of man and of his supposed early history are no less opposed to common sense and the well-attested evidence which is open to every student of science and ancient history.

Indeed, by the study of comparativ religions and "folk lore" in connection with early races of mankind, we are able to trace many of the absurd stories in the Bible to a much more ancient and, in some cases, original source.

Most Christians believe the story of the "fall of man," as narrated in the second chapter, as literally true. And they are perfectly consistent in so doing; for, if the story of the "fall" be merely a myth, upon what ground can they rest their belief in the atonement? If Adam did not sin, why should Christ die?

But the Christian who believes that Adam and Eve were tempted in the garden of Eden about six thousand years ago can hav heard very little about similar stories to be found in Persian, Greek, or Chinese literature, or must be so obtuse of understanding as to imagin that the later productions of the Hebrews contained the true statement of affairs, while earlier books were merely copies.

Take the Persian myth as given by Kalisch. It runs thus: "The first couple, Meshia and Meshiana, lived originally in purity and innocence. Perpetual happiness was promised to them by Ormuzd, the creator of every good gift, if they persevered in their virtue. But an evil demon (Dev) was sent to them by Ahriman, the representativ of everything noxious and sinful. He appeared unexpectedly in the form of a serpent, and gave them the fruit of a wonderful tree, Hom, which imparted immortality, and had the power of restoring the dead to life. Thus evil inclinations entered their hearts; all their moral excellence was destroyed. Ahriman himself appeared under the form of the same reptil and completed the work of seduction. They acknowledged him instead of Ormuzd as the creator of everything good, and the consequence was that they forfeited forever the internal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts and clothed themselvs in their skins; they built houses, but paid not the debt of gratitude to the deity. The evil demons thus obtained still more perfect power over their minds, and called forth envy, hatred, discord, and rebellion, which raged in the bosom of the families" (Zenda vesta, Klenker's edition, ii, 217, 286; iii, 62. 84, 85).

Edward Clodd tells us in his admirable work entitled, "The Childhood of Religions" (page 45), that, "The Tibetans and Mongolians believe that the first human beings were as gods, but desiring a certain sweet herb, they ate of it, and lower feelings were thus aroused within them; their wings dropped off; their beauty faded; and the years of their life were made few and filled with bitterness. Passing by any full account of the Hindoo story of a tree of life on a mountain, ever bathed in sunshine, where no sin could enter, and where dreadful dragons kept the way to the heavenly plants and fruits, and also of the Greek belief that far away there were the islands of the blessed, with a garden full of golden apples, guarded by an unsleeping serpent, we hav the Greek myth, which tells us that the first men were happy and without work, but with a desire to assert their power and withal defy or mock the gods. Then Prometheus shaped a human form out of clay, and stole forbidden fire from heaven wherewith to giv it life. This made Zeus angry, and he laid a plan by which the evils that mankind dreaded, and which were sealed within a box, guarded by Epimetheus, the brother of Prometheus, should be let loose. He ordered the lord of fire to fashion the first woman, who by her charms should bring misery to man.

"Then the gods enriched her with beauty, cunning, and fair speech, naming her Pandora, or all-gifted, and Zeus took her to Epimetheus, who, contrary to the advice of his brother to accept nothing from the gods, made her his wife, so smitten was he with her beautiful face and so beguiled by her smooth words. She had not been long with him before she opened the box, from whence came forth strife, and sickness, and all other ills that afflict mankind, and then hastily closing it, she shut up hope within, so that no comfort was given to men."

Go farther, we see that other religions can boast of their stories of the "fall of man," and each accounts for the entrance of original sin into the world in the same childish and irrational fashion. In the pages of the Bible there is a great deal of the mythical mixed up with the semi-historical, as well as the purely fabulous. The stories of the flood and the confusion of tongues, however, do not fall in this category. The writers of these stories believed in their ignorance that they were recording historical truths. They did not know that all the water in all the oceans, seas, rivers, and lakes would hav been insufficient to cover the earth to the hight of the mountain of Ararat. They were quite ignorant of the fact that other nations of the earth had their stories of floods, and that in point of fact each nation that was visited by an inundation regarded it in the light of a universal deluge.

In respect to the confusion of tongues, the writer was so supremely ignorant and stupid that he did not perceive that men speaking a new language for the first time would not only not be able to understand each other, but that each would not be able to understand himself. They did not know that language was only to be acquired by experience—that it is a growth. No sensible person would hav expected them to know these things, if it had not been claimed for them that they were divinely inspired. But they ought to hav known a myth from a true story, just as modern writers know their fictions are not facts. It would require a man to a very practiced liar before he could induce himself to believe in his own lies. It is possible to come across such a person occasionally, but surely deity would not be likely to select such a one as amanuensis. But to return to the Bible myths. The story of Samson slaying the Philistines is decidedly mythical. Samson is a sun god. With his great strength he overcomes the evil monsters of darkness and cruelty.

The story of Jonah's interesting visit to Nineveh and his three nights' lodging in a whale's interior is also a tale built upon a sun myth—a myth describing the phenomena of night devouring the sun. There are numerous other myths in the Bible, and many of them hav an interesting story cleverly interwoven with them.

It may be observed, however, that the mythical period, the age when such stories had their beauty and utility, has long passed; it was, indeed, a very remote period in the world's history—in fact, the "babyhood of the world."

Then everything bore a mythical aspect. The sun was regarded as a living being; so was the moon, and the stars were considered to be the children of the sun, which he only allowed to be seen at night.

Many of the nursery stories of to-day hav their origin in ancient myths; and at Christmas time, when our children are being amused at the theater in witnessing that which is ever welcome to the child-mind, viz., a pantomime, they little know that their favorit stories of "Jack the Giant-Killer," "Cinderella and the Glass Slipper," "Little Red Riding Hood," upon which the burlesque part of the pantomime is built, are but old Aryan, Chinese, and Greek myths, which hav been clothed in manifold forms in the various nations of the earth.

And just as in youth we outgrow these simple, childish stories and in manhood require something more real—more true to nature, even in the world of fiction—so in the world of religion and in the world of fact mature mind rejects the puerilities which satisfied it in earlier days and requires more substantial food, which can only be found by a diligent study of nature. And experience has shown that the application of such knowledge has built up a world more wonderful and beautiful than was ever depicted even in the myths and fables of old.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Lewis Masquerier.

Lewis Masquerier died Saturday morning, January 7th, in his home at 99 Java street, Greenpoint. He was eighty-five years and nine months old. He was buried at 2 P.M. on Monday alongside of the curious monument in Cypress Hills cemetery that he himself dedicated on June 5th. He was one of the oldest inhabitants of Greenpoint. When he went there, nearly fifty years ago, his house was one of but very few. Previous to moving there he had for years a printing office in this city on the site of the present Tribune building. He established the Greenpoint Gazette, in the columns of which, from the first, he promulgated his peculiar views. He became the center of a group of land reformers, and in 1845 he was the Land Reform candidate for governor of New York. He amassed considerable money, chiefly from increase of land values in Greenpoint, where he owned property, and for many years he has lived upon his income, devoting all his time to the furtherance of his plans for the reconstruction of society. His idea of land reform was to divide the earth into equal parts, allotting a part to each family. He carried his scheme to such minute analysis that the divisions of the plots or homesteads, the site of each building upon them, and the plan of the house was established. This plan of the ideal homestead he had engraved on his tombstone, together with schemes of other reforms, including a phonetic alphabet.

About twenty-five friends gathered at the funeral, and two or three made brief addresses. There were no religious ceremonies either at the house or at the grave. Mr. Masquerier's religious opinions were similar to those of D. M. Bennett, and he believed in immortality, though rejecting Christianity. Of the seven survivors of a band of twenty-five co-workers who were photographed in a group together with Mr. Masquerier, in 1872, five were present—Col. Henry Beeney, F. N. Smith, Charles Guimand, A.W. Day, and David Kilmer. Colonel Beeney said:

For forty-five years I hav worked with him for the good of mankind. In my whole life I never knew him to commit an act to call a blush to his cheek. His whole soul was for the advancement of humanity and the realization of the principles of Christ.

Dr. C. S. Weeks said:

He seemed to think there was so much for him to do in this life that he had not time to consider what might come after. He devoted his whole thought to the good of his fellow-men.

Mr. John Nason, who had charge of the funeral, read a short sketch of Mr. Masquerier's life. The body was then taken to the cemetery. Shortly before his death, Mr. Masquerier dictated to a friend the following notes of his life:

Mr. Masquerier, in his eighty-sixth year, last of his name, and of Huguenot descent on his father's side, and on his mother's of a hero of the war of Independence, who commanded a company and fought through the whole of it up to the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. Speaker Carlisle is a grandson of his great-uncle George Carlisle, of Woodford county, Kentucky, brother to his grandmother. Thomas Hicklin, his grandfather, was a noble hero. He received two wounds in the war of Independence, and at the close he declined pay or pension, saying that he did not fight for wages, but for liberty and independence. His father's brother, John James Masquerier, made a colossal sketch of Napoleon and his army during a grand review at Paris in 1799, in which the commanding form of the great general was majestically draped in a military cloak, which appeared on all portraits of Napoleon by artists of distinction in after years. This picture was exhibited in London and Paris, and brought in to the painter over £5,000.

In 1877, Mr. Masquerier published at this office a volume of miscellanies, containing essays setting forth his views on various reforms, sketches of fellow-workers, a number of short poems, and the beginning of a long poem entitled, "The Sataniad." It is incribed to Mrs. E. D. Slenker and Robert G. Ingersoll. It was to hav been in six books, but only the first book and about a dozen lines of the second appear in this volume. The preface says: "Satan has been represented by Milton as rebelling in heaven, instead of Jehovah, who usurped its entire government, and then sent his armies to war against him." The argument to Book I. is as follows:

How that Jehovah, his son Jesus Christ, and his grandson the Holy Ghost, bribed and corrupted two-thirds of the angels in favor of a monarchical government of a single trinity of Gods, instead of the aristocratic government of all the Gods reigning in triads. How that Jehovah and his son Jesus conspired against his father Jupiter, his grandfather Orus, and brothers Ormuzd and Brahma, his uncle Neptune, his great-uncle Osiris, his nephews Mithra, Chrishna, and Vishnu, and his cousin Satan.

The book closes with the building of a new heaven by Satan and one-third of the angels, and the sending by Jehovah of Michael and his angels to war upon them. The poem is written in rhymed couplets.

It has been understood that Mr. Masquerier would leave his property to be used for propagating his doctrins. Mr. John Nason said recently that the will had not yet been opened, but that Mr. Masquerier's property, amounting to about $4,000, had been bequeathed to him, with the understanding that it was to be applied to the promulgation of Mr. Masquerier's social theories.

California Letter.

MR. EDITOR AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I write simply to wish you all a thrice happy New Year, and wish I could present you all a bouquet of beautiful flowers from this sunlit land where our flowers never sleep—they only languish a brief period to come forth with renewed vigor and matchless splendor.

I am only too glad to be at home in the Garden City once more and to note the progress of various great improvements which promise to make our San José the gem and brightest of them all.

He laughs best who laughs last—of course, people laugh well when they reach Los Angeles after battling with ice and snow; but they laugh better, and much more of it, if they defer the purchase of real estate until they hav feasted their eyes on the rich and beautiful valley of Santa Clara, the banner county of the Golden State.

Of course, I am full of the good things which the new year has brought, and of visiting friends and trying to catch on where I left off last spring, making my head fairly swim.

But, after a little rest, I hope to favor our friends with a brief resumé of our Eastern trip and journey toward the setting sun.

Suffice it to say at this writing, that my long-felt desire to see my early home and to enjoy the friendly greetings of Liberals in the East has been most fully realized. I hav done my level best to see and be seen. I hav no regrets to bring home; and with many thanks to all who deserve thanks, I am quite happy enough for one man in the opening of this new year.

And, while I wish you all a happy new year of peace and prosperity, I may also hope that each and all who claim the high name of Liberal will do what they can to advance the cause of truth. One subscriber secured by each present subscriber to our papers will double the present working force of reason against superstition and bigotry, and more than that, it will gladden the hearts of our standard-bearers and brace up to renewed life and zeal in our noble cause. And I hope and trust that THE TRUTH

SEEKER, Boston Investigator, Ironclad Age, and H. L. Green's Magazine may double their circulation during the present year, and to this end, I will do what I can.

Our cause is not dead, but on the move; and whatever may come of feeble and faulty organizations of Secularism or Liberalism, our cause cannot be materially effected by their ups and downs, as it livs in the hearts of the people and is not dependent upon any prescribed method or organization for success, and only needs the personal effort of those who love truth. Each in his own town or neighborhood must take papers, and when read don't pile them away, but send them out on their true mission to spread the truth.

To my friends in the West, who hav so kindly helped me to do my work in the past years of my labors among you, let me say, I hav not forgotten you, and hope to visit again all of the prominent points in California and our great Northwest, and with your help to kindle anew the fires of Freethought and natural religion upon the altars of your hearts.

Our fellow-worker C. B. Reynolds will soon pay us a visit, and I hav no need to say that your latchstrings are out, and that he is sure to receive a welcome and the hospitality for which our free, wide West is celebrated.

Our fields are ripe to the harvest and wide enough, in the West, for every good speaker in the field; and should Brother Reynolds come the southern route, he will find not a speaker in his way, and his vigorous work duly appreciated as it deserves. I trust I shall meet him at some point in his Western tour.

Our line of duty and engagement for the next four months is at Salt Lake, and we will take this occasion to say to the Liberals of Utah: Get yourselvs ready, with oil in your lamps, for the winter campaign of Utah, beginning at Walker's Opera House, Salt Lake, on January 22d, and on the 29th a Paine celebration, to which all are invited. Come up to the feast, and bring your friends, and thus carry your lighted torches to the outside towns of your benighted territory.

There is no cure for Mormonism, and, like Romanism, it needs killing. And the only antidote for this mental disease is Secular thought, red-hot and well laid on.

Our Sunday nights during the winter will be devoted to Salt Lake, and we will speak week nights at any points contiguous to Salt Lake where the Liberals will open the door. DR. J. L. YORK.

The Episcopal Cathedral.

H. M. T. in Real Estate Record and Guide.

I hav read with much interest the remarks of "Agnostic" in a recent number of your paper with reference to the proposed cathedral near Morningside park.

It is undoubtedly true, as he intimated, that Protestantism has no distinctiv architecture, and that the cathedral (if built) will quite likely be a "jumble of the Greek, Byzantine and Gothic." It is also true, as he further suggests, that there is more need of a "Temple of Humanity," a building "devoted to science and art" and "where deeds, not creeds," should be taught; and less need of perpetuating dogmatic theology, orthodoxy, ecclesiasticism, or, to quote again from your correspondent, "of keeping up the traditions of a religion which is vanishing."

This undoubtedly expresses the thought of the day. It is "in the air." It is manifest in the newspapers, in the magazines, and in the general literature of the times in which we liv. As the Rev. James B. Wasson, in the North American Review for this month, says, "The old sanctions of ecclesiasticism are losing their force with thinking people."

The popular rector of the Anthon Memorial church tells us that "the growth of knowledge has intensified the decay of ecclesiasticism." The Rev. Dr. Rylance says: "The spirit and methods of medievalism are gone—a fact which our church rulers should appreciate. Ecclesiasticism is of much less consequence in the thought and work of the world than it once was."

Dr. McGlynn says: "Religion is losing its hold on men." Froude says: "Along the whole line the defending forces of orthodoxy are falling back, not knowing where to make a stand."

John Fiske says: "Religion is now called upon to show why it should any longer claim our allegiance."

Rev. John W. Chadwick says: "I hav not the least idea that our popular Christianity is going to be the religion of the future."

With this tendency of modern thought with regard to religion, is not the contemplated expenditure of ten millions of dollars to perpetuate the ideas of past centuries—to imitate what was symbolized in the Middle Ages—most inappropriate at this time? Is not the erection of a structure that is monarchic and autocratic in its significance and association—Un-American? "Cathedral," the dictionary informs us. "is so called from possessing the Episcopal throne." This is an age in which the "throne" is being laid aside (like the stage-coach) for the more "modern improvements," and it is certainly very much out of place under a democratic government. And therefore it is, so much the more, a noticeable fact that, while both Protestantism and Romanism hav ceased building cathedrals in Europe, we hav just begun their construction in this country.

In the conception of this grand cathedral, was not there something of the mental condition known as "Anglomania," which is becoming so alarmingly prevalent among portions of our community?

The cathedrals of England, as well as those of the Continent of Europe—Protestant as well as Catholic—were the product of the very ignorant, superstitious thought of the age prior to the seventeenth century, when the dictum of the king or bishop, especially the latter, was undisputed law. But, be it remembered that this is the age of philosophic, scientific, and rational thought, that this is the closing part of the nineteenth century, and that ours is a government founded on law framed by the will of the people themselvs.

There is one phase of this matter that has probably occured to but very few. It is that under our present system of exempting from taxation—not temples of humanity, of art, of science, of ethics, but—structures where theology is dispensed, the state will derive no revenue from this cathedral property—which it would do were the same amount expended for buildings for other purposes. Every piece of property exempt from taxation becomes a burden, to the extent of such exemption, upon those who are required to pay taxes. In this way taxpayers are compelled by law to contribute to the support of institutions where certain creeds are taught, whether said taxpayers are believers in such creeds or not. And when so colossal an ecclesiastical institution as that of the proposed cathedral thus calls upon the people at large (perhaps not five per cent of whom hold to its tenets) to support it, this matter assumes a most serious aspect and its rank injustice becomes the more strikingly apparent.

Are the citizens of New York aware that, by the system of exemption alluded to. they will be required to contribute at least $200,000 annually toward the maintenance of this cathedral, when completed?

Personnel of the Lick Observatory Staff.

From the San Francisco Call.

Edward Singleton Holden, a nativ of Missouri, passed his youth in St. Louis, where his unusual gifts of character and intelligence attracted the notice of Chauvenet, who was by general consent the first of American mathematicians, with perhaps a single exception. He entered Washington University, of which his distinguished teacher was then chancellor, and in 1866 graduated from its scientific department as B.S., with the highest distinction. During the period of some five or more years that he passed in study at this institution. he also did an important portion of the work in the classical course. His unusual powers and attainments in mathematics at this early period—he was only eighteen when he graduated—gave bright promis of the success that he has since achieved. With the purpose of making a mathematical career, he secured an appointment as cadet in the United States Military Academy. Here he graduated in the foremost rank in 1870. The exceptional extent of his preparation for the West Point course enabled him to devote an unusual amount of time outside of his class routine to the private study of mathematics. Upon graduating from the Point he was gazetted second lieutenant of the Fourth Artillery, and in 1872 he was transferred to a second lieutenancy in the United States Corps of Engineers. His reputation as a scholar was already so firmly established that he was not called upon to serve either with his regiment or his corps, but was detailed shortly after graduation as assistant professor of natural and experimental philosophy at West Point. and held this position until 1872, when he was made instructor in practical military engineering. In 1873 he resigned from the army to accept a commission as professor of mathematics in the United States navy, and was at once appointed astronomer of the Naval Observatory at Washington. While there he had charge of the twenty-six-inch equatorial, and his abilities as an astronomer and the value of his work soon became recognized in all quarters of the scientific world. His investigations upon comets and their constitution are regarded as having exceptional value, and among other astronomical researches in which he has been engaged with noticeable success, are the distribution of the stars and the rectification.

In the former of the last two mentioned he has carried on laborious observations and reductions in correction or reversal of the long-accepted hypothesis of the elder Herschel, that star distribution, taking the celestial regions as a whole, is quite uniform. Professor Holden's results tend, on the contrary, to show the decided non-uniformity of the general distribution. In 1883 he conducted the government expedition to Caroline Island, in the Southern Pacific, to observe the transit of Venus. The work and results of this expedition are regarded as of the highest character. A similar quality is recognized in those of the government party, also in his charge, sent to Colorado in 1878, to observe the total eclipse of the sun, with a view particularly to ascertain the nature of the corona. Professor Holden in 1881 resigned his naval commission to accept the dual position of professor of astronomy in the University of Wisconsin and director of the Washington observatory at Madison in that state. These positions he held until 1886, fulfilling the duties with marked ability, adding alike to his own reputation and to the honor of the institutions he served. On June 30th of the year last mentioned Mr. Holden was inaugurated president of the University of California, a position which he accepted with express stipulation that he should be allowed to resign the presidency as soon as the Lick Observatory was ready for his occupancy as director. Of all the available astronomers in the United States he had been selected as the proper man to direct the operations of the observatory; and now, after his very successful administration of the university affairs, he is still eager to replace the presidential gown with the jacket of the astronomer. It is his chosen field of work, and if preparation, former success, and keen ambition count for anything, it is safe to prophesy that during his administration of the observatory Professor Holden will add many leaves to the laurels he has already gathered.

S. W. Burnham, a New Englander, and a graduate of old Dartmouth, is the most famous observer of double stars that ever lived. Leaving his nativ state, Mr. Burnham determined to make his home in Chicago, and subsequently became official reporter of the United States Circuit Court in that city. In 1865, while holding the above position, he first became interested in astronomy. This interest soon developed into the absorbing object of his life, and as genius was fortunately married to liking, the result was the production of an astronomer whose name is now a household word wherever that science is studied. In 1870 he bought from Clark an excellent six-inch telescope, and with that little instrument devoted the greater part of his attention to the discovery of double stars. His successful refutation of certain long-established theories need not be dwelt upon here. The wonderful fact must be told, however, that between the years 1870 and 1880 Professor Burnham discovered something over one thousand double stars—and made all those discoveries with his six-inch glass; subsequently substantiating them through the telescopes at Dartmouth and Washington. In 1880 he went to the Washburn Observatory as assistant to Professor Holden, and while there did excellent work. He seems to be a man of infinit ingenuity, and capable of doing anything well that requires delicacy of touch and sight. Taking up photography, he soon became a master of the art, and last year, when the National Association of Photographers met in Chicago, his work was awarded the gold medal. In securing the services of Professor Burnham, the Lick Observatory has been fortunate.

Prof. J. M. Schaeberle began life in Michigan as an apprentice in a machine-shop, and had learned his trade thoroughly before he matriculated in the freshman class at Ann Arbor. Graduating with distinction in 1874, he was at once appointed assistant professor of astronomy in that university and assistant astronomer at Ann Arbor Observatory. Since then he has discovered a number of comets and proved himself an adept in all the branches of practical astronomy. At the Lick Observatory Professor Schaeberle will be placed in charge of the meridian circle.

Prof. J. C. Keeler is a graduate of the John Hopkins University, and was an assistant to Professor Holden upon the eclipse expedition in 1878. He graduated in 1879, and in 1881 served as an assistant to Langley on the Mount Wintney expedition. He then went to Europe and studied for some time under Helmholtz in Berlin and Bunsen in Heidelberg. Returning to this country, he was appointed assistant astronomer in the Alleghany City Observatory, and since then has helped Professer Langley in all his more delicate operations. Mr. Keeler has made a name as a spectroscopist and physicist, and has lately designed what is acknowledged to be the finest spectroscope in the world. This instrument he will himself handle at our observatory.

Prof. E. S. Barnard made his start as a photographer's apprentice in Nashville, Tenn. As a lad he developed a taste for astronomy, but lacked means to gratify it. After years of work and economy, he scraped enough coin together to purchase a small telescope, and with that instrument discovered no less than ten comets. He also succeeded in acquiring a general education, and finally graduated with honors from the Nashville University. Immediately thereafter he was appointed instructor of astronomy.

Mr. C. B. Hill, who will be secretary and librarian of the observatory, is a graduate of the San Francisco high school. and for some time past has been an assistant to Professor Davidson and one of the observers at the Chabot Observatory in Oakland. Mr. Hill is anxious to become a master astronomer, and he will materially assist in the minor observations from Mt. Hamilton.

THE picture we print on the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER this week is not drawn by the skeptical Mr. Heston as a caricature or burlesque on the theological scheme by which the "blood of the l amb" is supposed to "wash away the sins of the world," but it is an exact reproduction from a Roman Catholic paper, St. Mary's Messenger, published by ecclesiastical authority in the diocese of Trenton, N. J., and largely for the financial interest of St. Mary's Catholic Orphan Asylum, New Brunswick. It is printed by Stephen Mearns, a Catholic printer, at 73 Barclay street, this city. Mr. Mearns also "prints and keeps in stock a large variety of devotional leaflets, especially of the Sacred Heart, Blessed Virgin, and St. Joseph." This "offering of the blood of the spotless lamb for the relief of souls in purgatory" is in strict accord with the theology of Rome, whose dupes are taught by such pictures to understand the plan of their salvation. Protestants will call this picture materialistic blasphemy; but we beg to remind them that it is designed, printed, and circulated by the mother of their church, and not by Infidels, to whom it is horribly repugnant and shocking. As the plain, matter-of-fact expression of Roman Catholic ideas it is instructiv; but one must be very devout, and familiar with "holy" things, to look at it without the shudder that involuntarily creeps over one who has been compelled to visit a butcher's slaughter-house. Literally and metaphorically, it is beastly.

The McGlynn Revolt.

All New York is talking about Dr. McGlynn's lecture on the Pope in Politics. The hands of the orthodox Catholics are in the air with horror; the Protestants exclaim, A second Luther! and the Freethinkers say, I told you so! Dr. McGlynn's chance of being restored to the priesthood is entirely gone. He has burnt all his bridges, and henceforth must remain a hopeless reformer. The only man in the city who cannot see in the speech a determined defiance, not only of ecclesiastical authority in secular matters but to the pope as a church officer, is Henry George, who regards it as a vindication of Catholic faith which will be read with especial pleasure by Catholics. But such sentiments as these surely never came from the lips of a real Catholic:

"'We are bound to take our religion from Peter.' Yes, properly understood and only with very great reservations. What does theology say? That the pope simply is the representativ, the successor, of Peter in defining the faith, the dogmas, most of which must be pretty well defined after these nineteen centuries, so that surely there can remain but little more to be defined. And it must be something that is already commonly accepted, and as good as defined, and taught in the general deposit or teaching of the church, or it would not be capable of definition at all. With that exception, we are told in our theology that the pope is as fallible as anybody else. We are perfectly free as Catholics to believe—we know by painful experience—that he is capable of the most egregious blunders and crimes. We know that one pope will criticise and deplore the improvidences, the imperfections, the crimes, of his predecessors, by which whole nations hav been lost to the Catholic faith.

"'The pope has a right to rule the flock of Christ.' How much? In what way? In things that common sense would suggest to be his business. But these flatterers of the pope, these adulators, these men ignorant of theology, who flatter the human vanity of the pope, the natural love of power in the pope, just as natural and as great as in any other man, these men are making of the pope a kind of divinity, are making of the pope such a power as the world must simply reject with loathing and with unspeakable indignation. 'All you subjects of the pope are bound to obey him.' Are we? In what? In things that belong to his office, surely, and nothing else. Has he a right to send a telegram to one of us, saying, 'Come over here to Rome; I want to talk to you about something? I shall not exactly tell you what, nor say how long I shall keep you here.' And in the good old times he might hav stuck you into jail and kept you there for life by virtue of his kingly power as the temporal as well as the spiritual ruler of Rome. Has he a right to do that? I say, No. This power is necessarily limited by the very nature of the case that every man's conscience is the final arbiter for him how far he is bound to obey the pope or anyone else."

This doctrin of individual judgment, we say, never came from a true Catholic. The subjects of the pope are not to question why, whether they understand the theology of Rome or not; neither are they to accept her teachings with reservations. It is the doctrin of the church, plainly stated scores of times, that she has the right, as keeper of morality, to advise her subjects as to their conduct in civil affairs, and even to direct how they shall vote. There is not a Catholic theologian in the world who does not know better than to say "that every man's conscience is the final arbiter for him how far he is bound to obey the pope." When a man follows that course logically and completely it lands him in Infidelity.

Further, Dr. McGlynn's political utterances were as heretical as his doctrinal expositions. We quote, as before, from the official report of his speech:

"'The beneficence of the pope's influence in politics!' It is the curse of nearly every nation. It has been the curse of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, England, Ireland. God forbid! God forbid that the hated thing should hav an ill-omened revival. There is a sort of revival just now, but I am glad to believe—in fact, I think I know—that it is a sort of opera bouffe revival. One of the greatest humorists of the age, Prince Bismarck, thought he might as well amuse himself by capturing a few rocks away out in the Pacific ocean, a portion of the Caroline islands upon which some German settler had built a shanty, and Bismarck thought he might as well take those islands. The Spanish hidalgos got their blood up about this, and Bismarck, the humorist, thought it too huge a joke to hav a war with Spain over such a trifle; and, only too glad to get any kind of half-way decent way of backing out of such a comic opera situation, sent somebody to Rome to ask his holiness, the pope, to kindly consent to be arbitrator in this very unpleasant controversy that had arisen between Germany and Spain.

"We here are just beginning to get a taste of it in the alliances of corrupt political factions with the ecclesiastical machine. We hav had a taste of it here in the recent election. We had a taste of it seventeen years ago in the not very secret alliance, offensiv and defensiv, between the Tweed Tammany ring and a clique of Catholic priests, ratified by a clandestin meeting one Sunday evening in the back room of the episcopal residence in Mulberry street between Peter B. Sweeney and Archbishop McCloskey. And the object of that alliance between that infamously corrupt political faction and this ecclesiastical machine was to rob the public treasury; it was by clandestin arts, not by open persuasion, but by the clandestin arts of Peter B. Sweeney, by inserting clauses in the acts of the legislature that the legislators themselvs would not understand, to secure public money for Catholic schools.

"And one chief reason of this alliance to-day between these two corrupt machines is that the corrupt Democratic machine expects to get and does get Catholic votes through the influence of the confessional, and the pulpit, and all the arts of which the ecclesiastical machine is master. And the object of the ecclesiastical machine is, by the aid of that corrupt political faction, to retain the enormous appropriations that are given every year, not by new legislation, but by old legislation, at the rate of a hundred dollars and sometimes a hundred and ten dollars a head for every person committed to these Catholic institutions. So that out of your treasury to-day that ecclesiastical machine is practically receiving well on to a million dollars yearly, though it may be a surprise to most of you to hear it to-night from this platform for the first time.

"And one of these institutions, the so-called Catholic Protectory, not satisfied with the between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year that it must be receiving from your treasury, has been a perfect nuisance at the doors of the legislature at Albany, constantly begging for additional appropriations, and bedeviling the politics of our city with its promises and its threats, with the implied promis that politicians good to that institution would not be forgotten at the polls, and that the politicians who should refuse would not be forgotten either.

"This infallible pope, who can never say anything wrong or do anything unwise—this infallible, impeccable pope, whom it would seem as if it were the duty of everybody to consider impeccable—has time and again bedeviled the politics of nations as to-day he does the politics of Italy.

"The pope in politics! Infallible! Most fallible of men. He can scarcely take a step but what he is sure to make a blunder worse than a crime, because he has no business in politics. It is his business to preach the gospel to everyone, and every man should stick to his own trade, and the ecclesiastical cobbler, like every other cobbler, should stick to his last."

The Philosophical Manuals of the Catholic church teach that the constitution of the Catholic church is that of an absolute monarchy; that temporal power, being material and less than spiritual, is subordinate to ecclesiastical; and this teaching has been emphasized and made plain by the practice of the church in all ages. Victims of the Inquisition were turned over to the civil power as a murderer is handed to the hangman by the judge. A republic, electing its rulers instead of receiving them by divine right, is denounced by the Roman church. The pope considers himself superior to all earthly rulers, even to emperors, as he is, beside being a temporal sovereign, the vicar of God. It is absurd for Dr. McGlynn to cling to Catholicism, and deny the right of the pope to enter politics and to control his subjects. It is one of the basic principles of the Roman religion that liberty of conscience, considered in itself, is absolutely impious; and this applies to politics as well as to religion.

These inconsistencies of the good McGlynn are apparent to all; and we point them out not to detract from the splendid work he is doing by his revolt, but that the uninitiated may not for a moment imagin that the Catholic theology has anything good about it. Catholicism is an unmitigated evil. It cannot be reformed; it must be destroyed, or it will destroy this country.

The Decline of the Clergy.

A writer in the Independent givs the following list of reasons why the prestige of the ministry is declining, and why young men are not entering it:

1. The prevalent disposition to resent the assertion of authority in matters of belief.

2. Greater mental acquirements necessary to maintain former relativ position. Average intelligence of congregation greater.

3. Because the fact of being a clergyman is no longer ipso facto an assurance of recognition by the highest society. Social rank lower. Plutocracy gaining ascendency.

4. The deference formerly paid to opinions of clergymen in all matters, whether temporal or eternal, now wanting.

5. Small and inadequate salaries.

6. Materialistic tendencies of the age.

7. All educational institutions are no longer centers of religious life and power. The "American college" is compelled to compete with a non-sectarian, non-religious "state university."

8. False standards as to qualifications for the calling exist.

9. Concessions too often made by ministers in the presentation and enforcement of revealed truth.

10. The multiplying and magnifying of lay agencies and activities, to the depreciation of the clergy.

11. Sensationalism. "Every pulpit buffoon is a fearful incubus."

These reasons, it seems to us, are good ones, but what a confession they are! When a man thinks for himself, when he refuses to accept the guesswork of other men, it is bad for the minister. Good. When the pews know as much as the pulpit, that also is bad for the religion! What a confession! Again, the people hav found out that a minister is not always a gentleman, that he possesses no supernatural knowledge, and truckles to the rich, that he is only a man, with small and mean ambitions, and they repudiate him. It speaks well for the people, for in former times a minister was a little deity, and independence of the flock was unknown. When Sir Oracle spoke no dog dared bark. To-day, when a clergyman opens his mouth, he usually puts his foot in it, and the ungodly laugh.

Naturally following the first four reasons, is the fifth. When the world did not know how false were the pretensions of the clergy, they were paid more than they were worth. Now they get salaries based on merit, just as the price of theater-tickets is governed by the attraction on the stage. Commerce, not the ignorance of the congregation, fixes the price of the preacher. This is, of course, owing to the materialistic spirit of the times, and a most hopeful sign it is.

But what do the clergy desire to do with unsectarian colleges, "false standards," and "concessions?" Shall we hav laws that colleges must be religious? Shall the state set up a ministerial standard? Shall the preachers be prohibited from conceding that science has overturned Genesis, and rectified the blunders of the past? We doubt if that can be done in this country now. It was once; but the people are wiser.

Mr. Talmage should enter a libel suit against the Independent for printing that "every pulpit buffoon is a fearful incubus."

Presbyterianism.

The Presbyterians propose to celebrate this year as the centennial of their church in this country. Presbyterianism was first organized here in 1705–6, though isolated churches existed as early as 1619. In 1717 the synod of Philadelphia was established, which in 1788 embraced New York, New Jersey, Virginia, and the Carolinas. The first general assembly was held in 1789. The distinguishing feature of the centennial will be the raising of a fund of one million dollars for the care and maintenance of superannuated preachers.

We heartily commend this scheme, but suggest that the fund be greatly enlarged. There are in this country something under nine thousand Presbyterian ministers, and if any more of them engage in debates with Colonel Ingersoll they will all be on the town for support, for the result of the Rev. Henry M. Field's discussion with that gentleman is that but little real Presbyterianism is left us. The Westminster Confession is being extensivly repudiated, and the Presbyterians are turning Unitarians in sentiment, though clinging to the forms of Calvinism.

The fund should be multiplied at least one thousand times, and if another should be raised to rehabilitate the superannuated creed, it would require about all the money in the world.

Parochial Schools In New England.

The question of the future of the public schools, considered in connection with the energy of the Catholic church in establishing parochial schools, is becoming one of great importance in New England. In Massachusetts the matter is being discussed quite generally, finding a place not only in the public press but in the governor's message to the assembling legislature. Commenting on the probable outcome so far as legislation in that state is concerned, a correspondent of the Springfield Republican offers as a possible remedy the improvement of the public school. He says: "It is believed that it would be most unwise to attempt to meet the evil directly by compulsory laws, but that the true way is to make the most of the natural helps which are at hand. The Roman Catholic parishioners are not by any means united in favor of the parochial schools, and many of them, even those who are high in rank, are favorable to the public school system. Now it is proposed to solve the problem by making the public schools as good as possible. That will emphasize the difference between them and the parochial schools, and will tend to bring more and more of the Roman Catholic children into the public schools."

The writer of that knows very little about the Roman Catholic church if he thinks she cares much for the quality of the secular instruction given the children. A poor parochial school, with Catholicism taught by nuns, suits her a thousand times better than the best public schools of the country. The church wants converts; she wants the children of Roman Catholics educated as Catholics, and she also wants all the children of Protestant parents taught Catholicism. Parochial schools are with her a weapon both of defense and of offense. She places religion above education, and between a child's knowledge of the catechism and his arithmetic she would choose the catechism. The church policy of parochial schools will be carried out if every public school in the land is made a model of educational facility. And wherever the church controls a sufficient number of votes in a town she will discontinue the public schools and leave Protestant parents no choice but to maintain private schools or send their offspring to the priest's institution.

The state has no right to say to a Catholic parent that he shall not patronize the parochial school, but the state has the right, and it is its duty, to maintain good public schools, if there is only one child to take advantage of them.

Senatorial Chaplains.

The foolishness of employing chaplains in legislativ bodies was heavily emphasized in the senate of this state at the organization of that body. The salary of a senate chaplain is five hundred dollars. To obtain this prize, there was a race between a Saratoga preacher and an Albany pulpit-pounder. Both were, of course, Republicans, as the senate is Republican; both were admitted to hav equal influence with God, and each a happy way of directing omnipotence as to the course he should pursue. The only difference between them lay in the fact that one was a Prohibitionist and the other a high license advocate.

The race was fast and furious, and if report does no injustice to the reverend gentlemen their log-rolling for the position would do credit to accomplished and wicked lobbyists. In saying mean things of each other they excelled the politicians scrambling for secular offices; in fact, they so disgusted the senators that neither obtained the job, and the senate gets its prayers by the piece—five dollars each pray. Before the senate adjourns, it will probably hav thrown a few dollars' worth of patronage to all the pulpits in the neighborhood of Albany.

Leaving out of consideration for the moment the fact that legislativ employment of chaplains is a barefaced steal and imposition upon the taxpayers, the unseemly conduct of the men of God is sufficient reason why they should be pitched neck and heels down the Capitol steps. They are public nuisances.

Mr. Grabill's Authorities.

In this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Grabill finishes the first part of his rejoinder to a reply by Mr. A. B. Moss to some previous statements of his own. It is now Mr. Moss's turn to be heard from. While we are disposed to leave Mr. Grabill exclusivly in the hands of Mr. Moss, we cannot forbear remarking that unless Mr. Grabill deserts his present authorities—the Britannica and Johnson cyclopedias—he will get himself into controversial difficulties. In the latter work the writer of the article Man quotes approvingly from the preface to the Oxford Chronological Table, which says "that the scriptures were written for nobler and more exalted purposes than the mere transmission of dates or the gratification of antiquarian curiosity; and hence we must not be surprised if, on topics connected with chronology, we fail to meet with the information we desire," which is a Christian way of letting the Bible down easy. The Speaker's Commentary is also referred to as affording "conclusiv evidence" that the best scholars of the Church of England fully recognize the difficulty of determining the age of man from the Hebrew scriptures. Investigations, says Mr. Grabill's loved authority, hav led a large majority of scientific men to conclude that geological evidence points to a much higher antiquity for man than has been commonly assumed.

Mr. Grabill's other authority, the Britannica cyclopedia, is even yet more emphatic in denying the truth of Mr. Grabill's somewhat awkwardly stated proposition that "the length of the human period as given by Moses in the ancient Hebrew scriptures and science are reconcilable." It is no longer necessary, says this eminent authority, to discuss these chronologies (Usher's and others), "inasmuch as new evidence has so changed the aspect of the subject that the quasi-historical schemes of the last century would now be hardly maintained by any competent authority of any school. Geology, notwithstanding the imperfections of its results, has made it manifest that our earth must hav been the seat of vegetable and animal life for an immense period of time; while the first appearance of man, though comparativly recent, is positivly so remote that an estimate between twenty and a hundred thousand years may fairly be taken as a minimum."

The same authority further states that the evidence is now generally accepted by geologists which carries back the age of man to the Quaternary or Post-glacial Drift period, tens of thousands of years ago. This hypothesis is supported by numberless facts, and the time between this period and the period of historical antiquity is bridged by relics of various civilizations, found in Switzerland, Germany, Italy, and other countries. And "chronicles and documentary records, taken in connection with archeological relics of the historical period, carry back into distant ages the starting-point of actual history, beyond which lies the evidently vast period only known by inferences from the relations of languages and the stage of development of civilization." Egypt, Babylon, and China are quoted as affording a basis for computations of great antiquity, for the evident fact that the civilization of the world has been gradually developed from an original Stone-age culture necessitates adding to the four or five thousand years, to which the civilization of those places dates back, a probably much greater length of time, during which the knowledge, arts, and institutions of those countries attained to their remarkably high level. Comparativ philology corroborates this judgment, and the farthest date to which documentary record extends is now generally regarded by anthropologists as but the earliest distinctly visible point of the historic period, beyond which stretches back a vast, indefinit series of prehistoric ages.

So much for Mr. Grabill's authorities. He evidently studies with one eye closed, and the other open to only that which he desires to see. We are amply content, however, to leave him to the mercy of Mr. Moss, who has truth on his side and will not find it necessary to make the strongest part of his argument assertions that hav now been known to be false for about twenty-five years. Indeed, we had imagined that this straw had been so completely threshed that to pound it again would be waste of energy.

Editorial Notes.

MONCURE D. CONWAY'S old church, the South Place Religious Society, has changed its name to South Place Ethical Society. Only two members voted against the motion.

THE Christian Leader, talking of Plymouth church, says: "Those who worshiped Beecher will never drop down to anything so commonplace as the worship of God." A little harmless sarcasm is good for the brethren. It sharpens their wit.

MR. NEWTON WHITEHEAD, of this city, is entitled to the choicest blessings of those who enjoy THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures for a donation of $4.50 toward the expense of the same. Mr. Whitehead's nature partakes of the color described by the first half of his last name.

FOR the information of Mr. W. E. Farr, we state that the hatred of the Christians for their rival sect, the Mormons, was the inspiring cause of the passage of the law by Congress that no church shall hold in the territories more than fifty thousand dollars' worth of property, and it is under this law that the confiscation of the Mormon property is going on.

"MIRACLES and Miracle Workers," by John Peck, is another one of a series of essays which ran through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER last winter, and has now been reprinted in a neat pamphlet. The title explains the work, but conveys little idea of the essay, which must be read "to be appreciated." Mr. Peck never penned a dull sentence, and "Miracles and Miracle Workers" abounds in logic, wit, and unanswerable argument. As a missionary document it is invaluable, and that Liberals may scatter it widely, we hav placed the price at ten cents each, and seventy-five cents per dozen.

MR. HENRY KLEINMAN is informed that there are somewhere between six and eight millions of Roman Catholics in the United States; but as that sect's methods of computation are open to suspicion, the exact number is uncertain. Friend Kleinman is also informed that the King James translation of the Bible and the Douay version are essentially different, as the Douay version includes as canonical the books of the Apocrypha, which the Protestants reject. Further, Mr. Kleinman will find in studying the history of the Bible that in ancient days the early Christians had a bewildering multiplicity of sacred books, and that it took centuries of sifting God's writing to get the manuscripts which form our present Bible. The rejected manuscripts were of equal authority with the accepted manuscripts, and the councils rendered their decisions on no ground but their own will. If Mr. Kleinman will peruse Bronson Keeler's "Short History of the Bible" (which he can purchase at this office for fifty cents), he will find the titles of scores of books which some Christians once regarded as inspired, but which their numerically stronger brethren pronounced to be the work of men alone. The lotteries of Trent and Westminster decided the two present canons.

FRIENDSHIP Liberal League, of Philadelphia, will commemorate the 151st anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, afternoon and evening, on Sunday, January 29, 1888. Good speakers and good music to interest the audiences hav been secured. The Liberal public are cordially invited. Admission free.

Letters from Friends.

WOODSTOCK, Jan. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $10, to be invested as follows—two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, two ALMANACS, Ingersoll's speech to the jury in the suit against the telegraph company, and $3 for the benefit of Watson Heston and his pictures. These pictures must be kept a-going anyway. I take one copy of the paper to bind into a book; the other, to send out where I think it will do the most good.

JOHN D. POWERS.

WHEELING, W. VA., Dec. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Would it were our fate to hav association with and the friendship of such minds as Ingersoll, and the authors of such books as "Men, Women, and Gods" and thousands that you hav! Then "life would be all happiness and misery but a name." We hav plenty of thinkers here in our city, and you would be surprised to know the number of good, solid people who think just as we do, but hav but little chance to express themselvs.

Respectfully, T. A. MORRIS & Co.

ORCHARD, IA., Dec. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to renew my subscription for the best weekly journal printed in the United States or anywhere else, THE TRUTH SEEKER. It comes regularly every week, and is a very welcome visitor. We could not think of doing without it at any price. Some of the pictures are splendid. I hope Heston will keep on doing his level best. I would like to get some new subscribers, but it is hard times here for that. By the way, don't forget I hav a dime at your office waiting for Ingersoll's address to those fools in defense of C. B. Reynolds. C. B. DOUGLAS.

CORDOVA, ILL., Dec. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please discontinue sending THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address until you receive further notice. I hav no fault to find with the conduct of the paper, except the illustrations. They are to me so repugnant that I want no more of them. They may tickle the fancy of iconoclasts, but they certainly do not help to educate the ignorant out of the slough of superstition in which centuries of wrong teaching hav involved them. They inspire hate in that class of persons, which frame of mind is not well suited to receive lessons of common-sense teaching. This is how it appears to me. I may be wrong, however; but, if I am, I cannot help it. Yours truly, J. HOKE.

HANNIBAL, MO., Dec. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As secretary of the Society of Agnostic Moralists of Hannibal, Mo., I hav received letters asking for our views in regard to the Secular Union. We are in full sympathy with the movement. All we ask of our members is to be moral men and women of the highest type, free from superstition, free love, Spiritualism, Anarchy, and so forth. Our society is growing rapidly. Eighty names hav been enrolled from twenty-two states and territories, some of the most prominent leaders of the cause among that number, in six weeks. On receipt of five cents in postage stamps the constitution will be sent to any address in the United States or Canada. F. H. RAU, Secretary.

LAGONA, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your excellent paper but a short time, but I must say that it is the best I hav ever seen, and I hav read a great many papers of Freethought and reform.

This is a hotbed of religious fanatics, and there are but a few persons in this place that hav mind enough of their own—a mind that is not swayed by the religious cranks who are roaming about in this section "seeking whom they may devour"—to think and read on this great and glorious subject of reform.

What few there are of us are going to start a Liberal Union. We are growing daily, and we think that by a little exertion on our part we can swell our ranks to a legion.

May you ever prosper in your great and glorious work, is the wish of your friend and fellow-worker,

GEO. SKINNER.

POMEROY, W. T., Dec. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We must be excused for not being more faithful, but, as you know, we farmers in the far West hav been driven into the muzzle of a steel-loaded cannon, and we had to be patient and wait to get blown out, and that with just life enough to feel that we only had the bare threads of life, for we hav had no markets for our produce this fall.

We are highly delighted with Mr. Heston's pictures. And Mr. Ingersoll's Reply lately to Rev. so forth was beautiful. The world cannot refute it.

We wish you all merry Christmas and merry New Year, and hope that our bands of seekers of love and truth shall treble our strength this coming year. We hav a dark stream to cross here, but we hav bulwarks sufficient to stand the storms of superstition.

We also want Mr. Putnam to giv us a call the first opportunity, and we will make him happy and well satisfied, and I think he will do a great deal of good to our cause.

HENRY HINDER.

PLAINVILLE, KAN., Dec. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, which will insure me and a new subscriber THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I hav been the only subscriber to your valuable paper at this place for several years, perhaps always, but now you will hav another, who, I think, will be a permanent one from this time on. I got this new subscriber by circulating Ingersoll's reply to Field's letter. I hav kept it going until it has unearthed a number of Freethinkers. This is a church-going and priest-ridden community, composed of Catholics and Protestants alike.

The time is coming, and not far distant, when we will be able to get some able speakers to come to our town to giv us a few lectures on Freethought, for we expect to hav the cars running to our town inside of a year. Last July myself, wife, and son went fifteen miles to hear J. E. Remsburg speak on "False Claims" and "Thomas Paine." We were well paid, for there was a goodly number of us.

Yours truly, S. I. CLEAVELAND.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., Dec. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Happy New Year to the Truth Seeker Company! I venture to say THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper printed in the world.

I am unable to write with my poor pen the love which I hav for the United States and her Constitution. I say, giv the people of every country liberty and freedom of thought.

I can well judge the superiority of our freedom here to the condition of things in Russia and other Eastern countries, where I lost my best youth under tyranny and soldiers' disciplin. There I had to obey like a slave negro, wear a lock on my mouth, and say Yes or No. Here a man can say, "I am a free man!" without any fear of being arrested and sent off.

It will take centuries to bring Russia, cursed with its priesthood and czarhood, up to the level of North America. We are hoping for the time of civilization, and, with the help of other nations, will fight for liberty and truth to the last drop of blood. Then we can say that we are white men!

I am sorry that the weather will prevent my paper's coming in time. E. S. GLICK.

NORTH PARMA, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your circular received. I think you hav arrived at a sensible conclusion, i. e., to publish your paper only on a cash basis. As I am not in arrears for THE TRUTH SEEKER, you may stop sending it to me. I am heartily tired of the sympathetic tendency shown in its columns, both editorially and by contributors, toward Anarchists, misrule, and free whisky. I love my country and its welfare too much to giv any countenance or support to those who would tear down and subvert all that has been built up with untold blood, tears, and treasure.

You sneer at everything that is being done for the suppression of the sale of alcoholic drinks. I am willing to join hands with any and every one who is intelligently striving to wipe out the damnable traffic. You seem to carry the idea that there are none outside of the church who are Prohibitionists. But for the efforts of an out-and-out Infidel the sale of whisky in this town would not hav been stopped. Nearly every Freethinker and Infidel in this vicinity is a temperance man or woman. If Liberalism and Infidelity are to prosper, they must array themselvs upon the side of good government, the cause of temperance, and whatever else has a tendency toward the upbuilding and sustaining of law and order and the good of society.

Kindly yours, JOHN TOMPKINS.

ATLANTA, GA., Dec. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I happened to notice the picture, "Coming Events Cast their Shadows Before," while in a book-store in this city. The picture attracted my attention at once. At a glance I conceived the character of the paper. I took it from the counter and read: "THE TRUTH SEEKER." "That's exactly what I took it for," thought I; then paid for the paper and took it home. Since then I hav been getting THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly. I love to read this paper, although I find nothing new in it for myself; but therefore many of my friends and acquaintances like to borrow it from me, and then they come and tell me, "It is very good—splendid—delightful," etc. This givs me all the satisfaction I can expect in this city. But, as far as I know Atlanta, it seems to me that a few good speeches of a good Liberal orator would cause the organization of a Liberal club. And, in a city such as Atlanta is, Liberalism is more apt to develop rapidly than in a large Northern city. Atlanta is a peculiar city; nothing new passes unnoticed, as the case is very often in a large city North. I do not doubt that Freethought will be much opposed, but I am also confident that there will be a good many sympathizers with it, as a good many Atlantians are well prepared for Freethought and reform. I know that a good many Atlantians are tired of being sent to hell every Sunday.

May your noble work of seeking the truth be crowned with success, and may the rays of truth penetrate into the darkness of every thinking person's heart, that he may reject superstition as a thing of no use, and adopt truth and enlightenment as the only guide in his life. AFAR.

HILLSBORO, D. T., Dec. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Although I am not a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav read it for two years, and I can safely say it is the most truthful journal I hav read. I had a talk with a fellow the other day, and when our conversation drifted in on the subject of religion I asked him, "Why did God create man when he knew before that he could not stand the proof in paradise?" He said that God could not reward man with any higher glory before he had gone through a proof. "But if God never had created man, there would be none to reward, or did God create man especially to be rewarded?" I asked. "God created man to an image of himself," he answered. Says I, "That proves that God was enamored of himself. He thought he was such a great, good God, that he had to hav something to be able to see his own features. But I don't see any use in creating a man to be able to hav a look at himself. God, you say, is all-wise. He saw that fifty or sixty centuries ahead looking-glasses, mirrors, etc., would be manufactured; why did he not make some and save himself all the trouble of creating man, angels, devils, and a place of everlasting torment?" He said he did not know, and that is not for us to know; all we hav to do is to believe. Blindly believe, without reason or mind, as every Christian seems to do.

Some of our great Liberal champions ought to take a lecture trip through the Red river valley. There is a vast field of work to be done, and much good for the cause of liberty could be accomplished here.

Hoping you will continue to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a shining star in the darkness of superstition, I remain,

Cordially yours, JOHN E. WELIN.

OLYMPIA, W. T., Dec. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In reading the many "Letters from Friends," the writer fails to see any from this place. There are a few stanch Liberals here, also six "monuments of superstition." Though a young man born and reared amid the surroundings of the church, without ever an opportunity for learning Freethought principles, after reading Thalheimer's "General History of the World," I said, when I read how ignorant and superstitious people hav been, it is no wonder that they believe in inspiration and talking with God, and rejected the idea that a just God would punish an innocent being for a guilty one. During the past five years the writer has been an outspoken Freethinker and talked with many Christians, also listened to many sermons and lectures in various states, but can say I hav never heard a single argument that would stand the test of reason. They always misrepresent history and refer us to the ruin and bloodshed of the French Revolution as the result of Infidelity, but never teach their people of the Inquisition, the persecution of witches, and also of the religious wars and wholesale slaughter of innocent people. On these they are as silent as the grave. They argue that because all savage and low people hav religion there must be a true principle of divinity; but does not this very fact prove that it is a relic of barbarism? Allow me to ask anyone, Where were our souls when this earth was a molten mass?

I regard Christianity as a mythical bubble that floats in the atmosphere of superstition and fades at the first touch of reason. I agree with Colonel Ingersoll when he said, "When we see the nations that hav passed away, the things that hav died in an hour, the religions that are dust, we should at least hav the modesty of mortality." BENJ. TROYER.

BARRE, MASS., Nov. 27, 287.

MR. EDITOR: To "The Age of Miracles—Has It Passed Away?" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 27th, I should answer—No age of miracles ever existed.

However, I was deeply interested in "Ononon's" proposition under this heading, and will venture to make two or three suggestions.

Would it not be an improvement on "Ononon's" proposition, instead of having the test confined to five hundred or one thousand praying Christians, to engage all Christians all over the globe to unitedly put up their petitions for one month; and, instead of a rock weighing five tons being moved across the Alleghany river, stipulate that there be two days with no night between, or thirty-six or forty-eight hours of uninterrupted daylight, which is equivalent to the sun and moon standing still (see Josh. x, 12-18) or the sun going back on the dial (see Isaiah xxxviii, 7, 8)?

This lengthened day would be cognizable to the whole world, and its miraculous cause; and would it not be a far stronger proof of the efficacy of prayer and miracle-working than a rock inclosed in a building as a reminder of the stupendous fact?

I fancy, however, that even with "Ononon's" prospectiv one million of dollars promised, the whole Christian world will not undertake the job either of us propose, plainly proving that they hav no confidence in the promises in God's word, since, as there stated, mountains can be and were removed by faith and prayer, as in the case when the sun went back ten degrees on the dial, and not only one rock weighing five tons moved the distance across the Alleghany river, but all the rocks on the globe, and the globe, also, moved a far greater distance, in obedience to a miracle wrought by Isaiah, as a sign to King Hezekiah that his life should be lengthened fifteen years.

"He that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16).

ELLA E. GIBSON.

DENVER, IA., Jan. 1, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Another happy new year to you, and here's $5 to help to make it such, and to carry my subscription to 1890. I hav been a subscriber to this paper ever since D. M. Bennett started it in Illinois, and hav approved in main its management from that day to this. I indorse fully the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which, when carried out, will giv to all religious freedom and equality; yet I must say that he who has no other principles, and no feelings of sympathy for the oppressed and downtrodden toiling millions, whatever may be his profession, is a fit subject for Edwards's heaven, where "the joys of the blessed are increased by witnessing the torments of the damned in hell." He that stoppeth his ears at the cries of the poor ought to cry himself and not be heard. If this sentiment is in the Bible, neither the clergy nor other aristocrats giv any heed to it.

I make this remark in consequence of the condemnation you hav received from some professed Liberals for the just and manly position you took in regard to the so-called Anarchists in Chicago. The time is coming when, if they liv long enough and acquire sense enough, they will feel heartily ashamed of such condemnation.

The time once was when a slaveholding aristocracy—and a slaveholding aristocracy is ever the sworn enemy of human liberty—required the death of any man who preached the gospel of freedom and deliverance to the slaves. $5,000 was offered for the head of William Lloyd Garrison; and John Brown fell a martyr to this bloody requirement. Yet John Brown went "marching on" till every chattel slave was free.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty;" and while freedom slumbered, a moneyed and monopolistic aristocracy, with governmental aid, fastened its manacles upon many millions more, with the same bloody requirement, death to any who should preach the gospel of freedom and deliverence to them. Yet brave and heroic men stood up boldly in defense of human rights and human liberty, till, through judicial murder, they fell martyrs, like John Brown and the fabled Jesus Christ; and, while eleven millions cried for mercy, an oppressiv aristocracy and a tyrannic priesthood shouted, "Crucify them! crucify them!" But the blood of martyrs is the seed of reformation or revolution; and they too will go "marching on," until "the right comes uppermost," and liberty and justice are triumphant

Where'er the sun
Does his successiv courses run.

Yours for the right, M. FARRINGTON.

STONE BLUFFS, IND., Dec. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 24th that the "restless Jesuits" and St. Cleveland hav had a matinee. We wish to say that we heartily commend every word of THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to the aforesaid white-chokered parasites. We hav been watching the sly, slimy movements of this particular set of religious rascals ever since two hundred of them visited General Grant in June, 1862. Thanks to General Grant, the sacred two hundred departed with cold comfort. If there is anything we Spiritualists and Freethinkers in this old county of Fountain pride ourselvs on, it is that we hav been, and always are, ready to air through our county press, and otherwise, these same "restless Jesuits." The consequence is they are mighty scarce hereabouts. We write to our Congressmen, and send petition after petition up to headquarters whenever our newspapers so suggest.

We watch the ministers of the gospel here, and hav corrected about two for God-in-the-Constitution gabble. Let every Freethinking man, woman, and child watch the white-livered sky-pilots, who, with all their Falstafflan boasting of being ever ready to defend Christ, are never ready to defend their claims. Truth was, and is, too strong for these liars and lying claims, so they propose bolstering their superstition constitutionally, which means "national support," and that means support out of the United States treasury, to spread the kind of sense that thought slavery was a "divine institution," until nearly four hundred thousand Union lives and three billions of money were sacrificed, to rid ourselvs of one grand Christian lie, upheld by Christian liars and Christian thieves. "Oh," they say, "they are not Christians." We answer, "If they are not, why don't you kick them out of your churches and thus purify your church?" Christians are so used to reasoning from a false basis that every time their mouth is opened they are knocked down with their own boomerang. Heston's cartoon where the chief noise-maker fell, and ran his head into his drum, is exactly the picture for cowardly Christian ministers. So let the inimitable Heston giv St. Cleveland and the shivering, white-livered rascals another send-off.

We wish to say it is impossible to even hint at all the good things in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am showing them to everybody that comes to our house, and will get some subscribers before I die. W. E. CRANE.

CONCORD, N. C., Dec. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Concord at this time is afflicted with a polished religious tramp, religiously known as an evangelist. I learn that he preaches to full houses of sinners and galvanized Christians of both sexes and colors. Man by nature seeks excitement and takes to it as a duck does to water. It is his element, and he is not at home unless he has something to excite him. Again, man is said to be an animal endowed with reason. How he can bury reason and be converted to such doctrins as are taught by these preachers—taught from the Bible—is more than any sane man can comprehend. If Mr. Scratch would come to my house offering a United States map for $10 and I should find several gross errors in it, such as the Mississippi river separating Alabama and Georgia, I would be an idiot to buy his map. There is just about as much reason in my buying Mr. Scratch's map and paying him $10 as there is in my believing the teachings of this evangelistic tramp, as taught from the Bible; yet he gets his $250 per week and free board in the best of families, the upper tens. He never looks for a poor man's boarding-house when out chasing the devil from the doors of the churches. This follower of the meek and lowly Jesus travels to and from the post-office in a fine two-horse turn-out—in King Solomon or Queen Victoria style—while those who bow the knee to him plod through the mud on foot.

One of the evangelist high privates interviewed me, and was very anxious to know the reason why I did not attend church. A short dialog was the result, which ran thus: H. P.: "Why do you not go to hear Rev. M., evangelist?" Sinner: "Because I take no stock in such a racket." H. P.: "No racket, but it may be the saving of your soul." S.: "Why is it that you and your church are so anxious about the salvation of my soul, when you and your religious friends three years ago did all you could to prevent me from getting an office so I could support myself and family, but piled your votes high on a man who had held a lucrativ office six years, and could count his dollars by the thousands?" H. P.: "I know you were treated badly, but Mr. ——— was the nominee of the party, and I always vote with my party." S.: "I do the same. I stick to my faith, and would be doing violence to my conscience were I to go to hear a man preach a doctrin I believe to be untrue." H. P.: "Do you not believe the Bible, Old and New Testament, to be of divine origin and written by divine inspiration?" S.: "I do not." I then quoted to him the views of Senator Cowan, of Pennsylvania, than which I do believe man never uttered a more sublime sentence.

Let me here tell my views of heaven and hell. Heaven is prosperity; hell is adversity. The reverend evangelist is in heaven, with a throng of angels (human angels) ministering unto him. Hell being adversity, all poor people will hav these same angels administering unto them kicks and blows. These Christians must practice what they preach and teach, and in doing so, they delight in such consoling texts as found in Mark iv, 23. This has been my experience with them. J. W. MEHAFFEY.

ONEIDA, KAN., Dec. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There seem to be at least five forces, or parasites, as it were, preying upon the vitality of this government.

The first one is the increase in population by miscegenation in the Southern states, the colored population having increased from 4,000,000 to about 8,000,000 since the liberation of slaves, producing a grade of intelligence not by any means conduciv to the building up of the present generation either morally or intellectually.

Then the liquor traffic, which costs this nation for domestic liquors, beer, etc., $980.000,000, and by adding enough to that amount for imported liquors, wines, beer, etc., you hav the cost to this country for intoxicants that go down the throats of the people of this nation. That is a thousand times worse than wasted, for what is received in return? Devastation, destruction, poverty, death, misery, ignorance, rags, and crime almost inconceivable.

Then the concentration of capital, resulting in making the rich richer and the poor poorer, which is an evil fed by the poorer classes of all nations.

Then Mormonism, which is the most complete system for proselytizing the ignorant of the land that ever was inaugurated on this continent. Out of a population of less than 200,000, all told, in Utah, Montana, Idaho, and Arizona, and with headquarters at Salt Lake City, they hav 28,840 bishops, Latter Day Saints, scattered all over this country as well as Europe, gathering up all the ignorant, superstitious creatures and shipping them to this country—not by any means an element compatible with good morals or government. The leaders are in deadly opposition to this nation.

We notice some of our leading newspapers are becoming exercised over the probability of the territory of Utah being admitted as a state under the existing circumstances out there, which would giv us what we never had before, a state ecclesiastical hierarchy, which, under the Constitution, this government could not prevent. Hence, it would be found that a matter that has been so difficult to deal with in a territory would be most difficult of solution in a state.

But why so concerned about Mormonism to the almost entire neglect of an element so formidable comparativly which has been clamoring for ecclesiastical despotism almost ever since this has become a nation? We allude to Ultramontanism, or, speaking so as to be more plainly understood, Romanism and Jesuitism, which are gaining so rapidly in this country.

The church of Rome is gaining ground very rapidly here, and is to-day the most potent political power or "machine" in the United States. Everyone knows about all of our cities of any importance are municipally ruled by Romanism. Lafayette said—and he a Roman Catholic at the time—"that if ever this government is destroyed, it will be by Romish priests."

The sorriest sight is to see Protestants aiding in building Catholic cathedrals, churches, parochial schools, monasteries, convents, and nunneries, on the one hand, while on the other erecting bronze statues to the memory and celebrating the birthday of Martin Luther. Of course, that propaganda university at Washington will be built largely by Protestants, who will be drawn upon in every conceivable manner or device. There certainly is a want of consistency in the matter. Remember, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

We notice that Cleveland has presented Papa Leo with a copy of our American Constitution, and papa is seemingly well pleased with the document. It seems to be ringing in our ears that Pope Gregory XVI. said about half a century ago, "Out of the Roman States there is no country where I am pope except the United States." Perhaps Papa Leo has been keeping an eye Americanward for some time, and no doubt would think a cross on top of the dome of the White House would be very ornamental. The old man is liable to be attacked with almost any kind of a hallucination, it seems. AMERICA.

COALTON, KY., Dec. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Since I hav discarded the Bible and hav read somewhat of the evolution theories, they appear to my mind the most reasonable account, or rather supposition, of the creation of this world, as well as all others. There is no living thing, from the most minute blade of grass, flower, herb, or tree; from the most minute animalcule to the most wonderful mastodon that has in the knowledge of man been born into the world, that has been born in the fulness of its size and stature at the first peep of its existence. All materials, and all life, whether vegetable or animal, seem to be the productions of time. Especially does the animal life seem to owe its existence entirely to other materials, vegetable life, and time.

Just how far such absurdities as the belief in the instantaneous creation of the world and all forms of life hav taken possession of the minds of men cannot be ascertained by the number of pretended followers.

If Jesus Christ had been born into this world in some large city and then and there begun to preach his gospel of "peace on earth and good-will to men," saying: "This is the day of my birth on earth. There shall be no more famin, and hunger shall nevermore gnaw at the vitals of innocent babes, neither of women, nor of men. And no more pestilence, no more wars, shall lay waste and devastate the habitations of men. The earth shall yield tenfold the amount of grain that it has yielded to the same amount of labor from this date and forever. The flowers shall bloom more beautiful, neither shall their odors contain any poisonous exhalations. The birds shall possess a more beautiful plumage, and shall sing more joyously than ever before, and no flower shall be cut down by an untimely frost. And no flower, beast, bird, or man shall be born into this world in a deformed appearance, blind, halt, deaf, imbecil, or weak. Neither shall there arise from the earth any poisonous malarious breezes. Both man and beast shall enjoy life and be at peace forever. I am your redeemer from all evil and danger. After this date there shall be no fears of death among the children of men, for if death visit mankind, it shall be without pain. It shall be a falling to sleep, and a transportation to the heaven of rest"—if, after all those sayings, the truth of his assertions had been verified by the changes throughout all nature, then there would hav been just and reasonable ground for believing him to be the son of a God, for it would hav been equally as consistent to cause the changes throughout all of nature as to cause the change of its laws in a single instance, as claimed by miracle-believers. But, instead of those changes and teachings, which would hav brought such great blessings to mankind, and to the animal kingdom as well, what are his teachings, and the teachings of this book called the Bible, the word of God?

This son of God—as claimed to be by the churches to-day—if he ever lived, might hav had the best of wishes for mankind in general, but he exhibited in many instances an angry temper like other men. When he spoke of God's chosen people, in one instance he called them a generation of vipers. I hav no doubt that he was like the gospel racket men of to-day, who believe that every man that does not believe as they do is vile, base, and having the temper aud poison of a viper. I asked a sky-pilot the other day by whose authority the angels proclaimed "peace on earth and good-will to men" on the morning of Christ's birth. "Why," said he, "by God's authority, of course." I asked again, "Then by whose did Jesus Christ say (Matt. x, 34,35), 'Think not that I come to send peace on earth; I come not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, aud the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law?'"

The Christian presents his Bible, with its gross absurdities and foolish tales, and says it is the word of God, and he is absurd enough to think that we are in duty bound to believe it, and even though we be ever so honest in our disbelief G-a-u-d will not hav any respect for our honesty, but will damn us eternally. This is glad tidings of great joy.

I am often asked by Christians what we Infidels would do if we could succeed in the destruction of faith in the Bible and God. I answer, We would giv you more wholesome civil laws. They say, Would not mankind become reckless, having no faith, and no God to fear? I say, He is now reckless, malicious, murderous, deceitful, and dishonest, and it is not the restraining influences of the Bible and faith in God that govern in the kingdom of men, but laws made by man, the abolition of which human laws would prove a greater disaster to men than the imagination can picture. On the other hand, if your Bible and your faith in God were abolished, our laws would prove as efficient as they now do.

Again, we think that if the erroneous beliefs of Gods and Bibles were abolished, mankind would find more time to study the arts and sciences, and the laws that govern health, by which he could avoid disease. I hav thought it not impossible for science to discover the very elements of life and to be able by that knowledge to substitute health for disease, and strength for weakness, and I think that the science of physics has, as it were, only begun to make discoveries that will lead us to the knowledge of minerals and herbs that may supply the very fountains of life to such an extent that life may be prolonged for hundreds of years.

The teachings of the Bible hav no doubt been a great stumbling-block to science on every hand, for superstition and science can never go hand in hand. But generation after generation the minds of the human family are evoluting in to a better knowledge of this world and its affairs, and it seems that man will eventually release himself from popes, priests, and superstitions. The great masses in this country are now studying more thoughtfully than ever before their social and economic affairs, and the evolution of thought will eventually bring about a panacea for all social inequalities. Man has discovered to some extent the laws of evolution and applied them to his benefit in the vegetable and animal kingdom, but he is compelled to walk by steps, and his thinking faculty does not seem to be much faster in some directions.

WHAT THEY SING IN SALT LAKE.

Here is the sort of stuff juvenil Mormons sing at their Sunday-schools. It is, however, only one degree worse than some of the hymns sung in Sunday-schools all over the land:

I'll be a little Mormon,
And seek to know the ways
That God has taught his people
In these latter days.
Though I am young and little,
I, too, may learn forthwith
To love the precious gospel
Revealed to Joseph Smith.

With Jesus for the standard,
A sure and perfect guide,
And Joseph's wise example,
What can I need beside?
I'll strive from every evil
To keep my heart and tongue;
I'll be a little Mormon,
And follow Brigham Young.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

My Dog.

This dog of mine, his name is Guy;
Two friends we are, my dog and I;
He finds no fault with aught I do;
Where'er I go he goeth too;
Whate'er my wish, whate'er my whim,
'Tis law and gospel all to him;
Our tastes are similar, you see,
So I love him, and he loves me.

We both are fond of half-day jaunts
In quail resorts and partridge haunts;
We know the woods in every nook,
We know the course of every brook;
Going or coming, still we say
We both prefer the longer way;
Our tastes are similar, you see,
So I love him, and he loves me.

We are not lazy, he or I,
Yet well enjoy full length to lie
Where mosses kind a couch hav spread,
And leaves are lisping overhead;
Not lazy, no, but, like the rest,
We like to do what suits us best;
Our tastes are similar, you see,
So I love him, and he loves me.

Good company is Guy; it seems
He knows the worth of thoughts and dreams;
Though all so dumb and absent I,
He ne'er complains or asks me why,
Nor counts it in the least absurd
To walk a mile without a word;
Our tastes are similar, you see,
So I love him, and he loves me.

"The happy are the wise;" so said
Some great philosopher, I've read;
We like that creed, and as we can
We practice on it, dog and man;
Both Guy and I believe it best
To take the good and leave the rest;
Our tastes are similar, you see,
So I love him, and he loves me.

Why I Am a Liberal.

Most of my neighbors are Christians, and send their children to Sunday-school. Some of them do not like me because I do not go to Sunday-school as they do.

I hav heard that the Christians used to put people to death for believing differently from themselvs. I don't believe that was right. Everybody ought to think as he pleases and yet be safe.

The Liberals are all friendly to everybody. They will let everybody think and believe as he pleases. This I like much better.

These are the reasons why I am a Liberal.

Intelligence of Animals.

I am very glad that the intelligent little readers of this Corner hav such excellent opportunities afforded them in these latter days of building their education upon the strong and solid foundation of truth. This will certainly be a great advantage to you, and you are really commencing where many of us older people are leaving off. You will hav so little to unlearn, and can go right along through a long and beautiful life, reading, observing, learning, and storing up knowledge that will be a source of comfort and pleasure to you all your lives. How much better that is than to be trammeled and held back by some degrading superstition, to be taught that it is wrong to investigate or inquire into this or that matter, because such investigation might unsettle some foregone conclusion, some dogma or belief that must be held at all hazards! Many of us hav labored under this disadvantage all our early lives, reading forbidden books with an uneasy conscience and a quaking fear lest some dreadful judgment be visited upon us for our presumption in prying into those things which we were emphatically told were far beyond human ken.

Well-meaning but mistaken people took great pains to impress upon the mind of the young that man was created by a God who created every other living creature for his use and with especial reference to him. We, the children of twenty-five years ago, in view of this fact were much impressed by our own importance, so much so that many grand and beautiful truths were overlooked or rejected because they were incompatible with that idea. As we grew older, however, we became a little wiser, and it soon commenced to dawn upon us that many traits, feelings, and emotions we had always thought peculiar to man were manifested by other animals far below him. A little study soon convinced us that the close similarity of our anatomy with that of the brute creation could not be the result of accident. How could we hold out when we were shown that no bone or muscle in our bodies but could be matched with like bone or muscle in the body of a horse? And not only that, but we were shown by those indefatigable truth seekers that some muscles present in the body of a horse, which we do not now possess in good working order, are still present in our bodies in a rudimentary condition. They are of no earthly use to us, but there they are, mute witnesses of our lowly origin.

It is not so very long ago that we began to see the mistakes that were made in our early training. We commenced to realize that, although we are immensely superior to any other animal, yet the difference is not nearly so great as we at first thought. We could not help seeing that many of the lower animals displayed something very nearly like reason. Classing their intelligent actions under the vague term "instinct" did not explain the matter at all. We could not help seeing, when our attention was called to the matter, that a dog enjoys a joke, aside from his love of play and fun. Hav you not seen him, when you had thrown a stick for him, take it and run away with it for some distance, and then, placing it on the ground in front of him, wait for you to come and pick it up, and just as you got near enough to do so, snatch it up in his mouth and scamper off with it, evidently enjoying the joke he had played upon you? This maneuver he will repeat with the greatest relish as long as you care to play with him.

I recently read of a tame night-heron owned by a gentleman in England. This bird knew a trick which he dearly loved to play upon his enemy the cat. When he sees puss approaching, he will hide behind a bush or some convenient object until she gets near enough to him to suit his purpose; at that moment he will start up with a most appalling screech, and, if he only could laugh, I hav no doubt he would do so, as, perched upon a limb, he watches her terrified flight. This is a well-authenticated fact, and looks as if the bird must hav reasoned about the matter very much as we would hav done. I do not think it can be "instinct," do you?

Ornithologists, or persons who study the habits of birds, tell us that many birds hav the same kind of love for the beautiful, both of sight and sound, that we hav. At certain seasons, when they wish to make themselvs particularly agreeable, they will take the greatest pains to display their beautiful feathers, or whatever other ornaments they may possess, to the very best advantage. Great numbers of a certain kind of birds in India will assemble at a meeting-place. They will clear a space four or five feet in diameter of every blade of grass and stone. One bird at a time will walk out into this ring and "show off" to the others. He will spread his beautiful tail like an immense fan, throw out first one wing, then another, to display the brilliant hues of the feathers; then, as the bright feathers are upon the under part of the wing, he must needs stick his head through to see what kind of an impression he is making upon the spectators. He does this so often that the feathers are worn quite bare at the loophole he has made for the purpose. Then he will strut up and down with great dignity, occasionally varying the performance by capering round and dancing. When quite fatigued by these antics he will retire with a self-satisfied air, while another bird takes the ground to go through the same performance, while their lady friends look on with evident admiration; and the birds who perform the best, finding favor in their eyes, are accepted as mates for the season. Sometimes it happens that a bird who thinks he has performed his part very acceptably and done himself credit in the general exhibition of charms, will pay his addresses to the bird of his choice, and is rejected with every evidence of repugnance on her part. She will hav nothing whatever to do with him, while she may enter into partnership with another bird of more modest pretensions, build her nest, hatch her little speckled eggs, and liv very happily with him all summer. Other birds are very pugnacious. The warrior who can whip his adversary most effectually is most admired by the lady birds of his acquaintance.

The bower-birds of Australia hav a very peculiar habit of constructing bowers or playhouses, where they meet to play and amuse themselvs in a most fantastic manner. They build a platform of sticks upon the ground, and tall grasses are arranged so that the tops meet overhead. Round stones are used to keep the stems in their proper places, and to make divergent paths that lead to their bowers. The bower-birds display a decided taste for the beautiful in decorating their bowers with gay-colored materials, bits of colored cloth, shells, leaves, and feathers. Young shoots of plants of a pinkish color are arranged at the entrance and along the sides very prettily. These ornaments they will carry about, arranging and rearranging them to suit their tastes. They will chase each other in and out, up and down through these halls, which are five or six feet long and eighteen inches high, playing, and amusing themselvs like so many happy little children.

Other birds, such as the thrush, linnet, canary, etc., develop great nausical talents; and it is consistent with the economy of nature that these gifted little vocalists seldom are provided with splendid coats. Enough for them that they can sit in a swaying bough and charm the very hearts from the little brown breasts of the lady birds by their sweet songs, which they make a point of doing, and go about it in a very methodical and business-like manner. The critical little lady chooses the mate whose song pleased her best, and pairing with him, immediately they fly away together to build their home. And very kind and attentiv he is to her as she sits through the long summer day, patiently awaiting the gawky little birdies which she knows will soon come to their home, taking his turn upon the nest while she goes out for an airing, or in quest of food, which he often brings to her, like the little gentleman that he is.

The traits of character of different birds vary quite as much as do those of the human species. Some are very fickle in their affections, not being so constant to their chosen mates as one would expect such well regulated little creatures to be. A very melancholy instance of this kind is related by a bird fancier, Mr. Hewitt. A couple of mallard ducks had been tamed by him and had lived together very happily for two seasons, until a gay young pintail was introduced on their pond. The mallard duck immediately fell in love with the stranger and shook off her own mate. The pintail did not approve of this proceeding for a long time, but finally succumbed to her blandishments, while the poor mallard was obliged to get him another mate.

Parrots sometimes become so deeply attached to each other that they pine for a long time when separated, and sometimes even die of grief. An English gentleman owned a pair of beautiful Chinese ducks, one of which was stolen. For three weeks the other pined and would not be consoled. Although another mate was procured for her, she would not notice him, remaining apart until the stolen drake was restored, when they recognized each other with extravagant manifestations of joy.

Birds are also capable of benevolent feelings, as is shown in the case of a blind pelican found in Utah, who was very fat, and must hav been well fed by the others. They will also, as Mr. Darwin states, feed the young deserted birds of other species.

So you see, children, by all this, that we are not the only intelligent animals in the world, although undoubtedly other animals are guided by instinct in a great deal of what they do. Yet they do appear to exercise some reason also, and I do not think we should be at all ashamed to acknowledge that all our boasted superiority of intellect over lower orders is simply a difference of degree, and not of kind.

Correspondence.

Oak Mills, Kan., Jan. 3, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am going to write my first letter to the Children's Corner. I am twelve years old. I go to school and am trying to learn. I study arithmetic, geography, grammar, physiology, and history. My teacher's name is Miss Eva Sparks. She is a good teacher, and boards with us.

Your friend, Chas. B. Remsburg.

[We hope all these "first letters" will be followed by others, each an improvement on the previous one.—Ed. C. C.]

Dec. 23, 1887.

Dear Miss Wixon: I once more try to write to the Corner. I am eleven years old. I am going to school. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, and history; our teacher has from fourteen down to say the Lord's prayer, but ma says if she wants us to know the Lord's prayer, she can teach it to us at home. We liv a mile and a half from the schoolhouse. Mrs. Ella Wheeler W. Wilcox and her brethren are sorry about something. I would like for some little Liberal to write to me. Yours, Dessie L. Simmons.

Muskegon, Mich., Jan. 2, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am a little girl ten years old. I am an only child, and pa has taken The Truth Seeker ever since I was a little girl. I hav just had the measles and cannot go to school, so I will spend my time writing for the Children's Corner. This is my first letter, and I should like to see it in print ever so much. I will close now, for fear I will write too much for the first time.

I remain, Yours truly,

Ada Vanderlinde.

Wonervoc, Wis., Jan. 1, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I read so many letters written in the Children's Corner of The Truth Seeker by little girls no older than myself that I feel a desire to write one, too. I am nearly ten years old. My papa, who livs at Fish Creek, Wis., takes The Truth Seeker, and my Uncle Willie takes it here, and it is the only one that comes to this village. He is a Spiritualist, but he likes The Truth Seeker.

I am staying with my grandpa and grandma this winter and going to school. I am in the B grade in the Intermediate room. Some of my school-mates go to Sunday-school, and sometimes talk about God. I told two of them the other day that I did not believe there was any God. They said there was; that he created this world. I asked them who made him, and they said, "He made himself." I asked them where he lived and what he lived on before he made this earth. They could not tell, and I suppose they will think me a bad girl, but I shall be good to them all the same, that they may know that I like them if they do believe such things.

Now I must close for this time, wishing a happy New Year to you and all your little truth seekers.

Eva M. Hill.

Sunday-school teacher to pupil: "Now, my little man, can you explain to us the cause of Adam's fall?" Little man (emphatically): "Yes, sir; 'cause he hadn't any ashes to throw on the sidewalk!"

"Tommy," said his aunt, "I hear your grandmother gave you a watch on your birthday. Was it a hunting-case watch?" "No," replied Tommy, who is seven years old, "it was a barefaced watch."

Mamma had dressed Charley, five years old, to go to walk, and then took Susie, three years old, in hand. Mamma was tired, and so was Susie. Mamma, somewhat irritated, said, "Do stand still, for gracious's sake!" to which Susie gravely responded, "Amen!"

A father was very much annoyed by the foolish questions of his little son. "Johnny, you are a great source of annoyance to me." "What's the matter, pa?" "You ask so many foolish questions. I wasn't a big donkey when I was of your age." "No, pa, but you've growed a heap since."

Mother (to Bobby): "I'm shocked to hear that Willie Waffles whipped the poor cat, Bobby. My little boy wouldn't do such a thing." Bobby (with conscious moral superiority): "No, indeed, ma." Mother: "Why didn't you stop him, Bobby?" Bobby: "I couldn't, ma; I was holding the cat."

How Katie's father said grace.—A South End little girl was taking supper with a playmate a few evenings ago. After the pater familias had said grace with due solemnity, the little hostess turned to her guest asking, "Does your papa say grace at supper, Katie?" "No," replied Katie, with a charming candor, "but he says something else." This answer, of course, aroused the interest of the older persons. "What does he say?" was asked the little visitor. "Good Lord! what a supper!" was the calm response.—Boston Commonwealth.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Poetry.

The Parson's Creed.

O money! O money! thy praises I'll sing,
Thou art my savior, my god, and my king;
'Tis for thee that I preach and for thee that I pray,
And make a collection twice each Sabbath day.

I hav candles and all sorts of dresses to buy,
For I wish you to know that my church is called high;
I don't mean in structure of steeple and wall,
But so high that the Lord cannot reach it at all.

I've some poor in my parish who need some relief;
I preach to their poverty and pray for their grief,
And send my box round to them morning and night,
And I hope they'll remember the poor widow's mite.

I gather my knowledge from wisdom's great tree,
And the whole of my trinity is £ s. d.;
Pounds, shillings, and pence are all that I crave
From my first step on earth to the brink of the grave.

And when I am laid low and my body's at rest,
Place a box in my grave, 'tis my latest request,
That my friends may all know who come for reflection
That I can't rest in peace without a collection.

For, as money's my creed, I'll not pray without it;
My heaven is closed against all those who doubt it;
For this is the essence of parsons' religion—
Come regular to church and be plucked like a pigeon.

My pay may be hundreds or thousands a year;
Double it, treble it, still I am there,
With my box or my bags, collecting your brass—
I can't do as Jesus did, ride on an ass.

I'll hav carriages, horses, and servants, and all;
I'm not going to foot it like Peter and Paul,
Neither, like John, liv on locusts and honey,
So out with your purses and down with your money.

Foolish people will ask what I do with the money—
They may as well ask the bees what they do with their honey;
But I'll answer them all with a wink and a nod,
I keep three-thirds myself and the rest giv to God.

In the cold, silent grave I shall soon be laid low,
To rest with the loved ones who hav gone long ago;
I shall rest there in peace till the great resurrection,
Then be first on my feet to make a collection,

—Unknown Author.

The Story of a Converted Russian Prince.

The following story is told by L. C. M. in the Youth's Companion of December 22d. To avoid the use of needless space the narrativ is abridged, but is otherwise given in just the language and order of the author:

"A Russian prince, a thorough scholar, a vigorous writer, and a man of power in every direction, with the rest of his modern learning had become imbued with skepticism. Like the fool, this man—wise in the wisdom of this world—said in his heart, 'There is no God.'

"At last he wrote an essay to prove the absurdity of the idea of a divine creator. He read it over with a glow of satisfaction; surely no one could refute it. Suddenly a voice seemed to say to him: 'Yes, you hav reasoned powerfully; it will hav its effect. If there is no God, it is all very well; but if there is a God, where are you?'

"It came again and again, 'If there is a God, where are you? If there is a God, where are you?' till at last it frightened him; and he could resist no longer. Throwing himself on his knees he cried out passionately, as one who would not be refused—'O God! if any God there be, show me thy truth. Now, this night, this very night, reveal thyself to me if thou art God indeed!'

"All night long his strong cry went up to heaven, but with the dawn came into his soul a light brighter than the dawn, the knowledge of God. He tore up the essay and burnt it to white ashes. 'There goes my past life,' he said to himself, as it burnt. There, indeed, went the plans, purposes, and ambitions that had been his life hitherto."

In conclusion, L. C. M. assures us "this is a true story, with no coloring nor exaggeration. Precisely thus was wrought the change that turned a prince, second in power to the czar only, into Christ's soldier."

Let me remind L. C. M. that we are living pretty well along in the nineteenth century, and that anyone who tells such stories as this, and uses such cant in telling them, will be considered even by the average Sunday-school scholars of the infant class as a poor pious prevaricator. I do not recognize the hero of his story in any history at my command, either because he is not there, or the story is not told quite that way. In his eagerness not to giv "color to or exaggerate" the circumstances he seems to tell us of a miracle; but if he were questioned, I am quite sure L. C. M. would confess that he does not think there was anything extraordinary in the conversion of his Russian prince. Nothing but an every-day, old, orthodox conversion. They all get it the same way. The studious conclusions of a sober lifetime are abandoned instantly. This Russian prince could not answer his own arguments. So, in the "precise, uncolored, and unexaggerated" twaddle of L. C. M., "he tore up the essay and burnt it to white ashes." How graphic! He not only tore it up, but he also "burnt it;" and, mark you, and don't forget, he not only burnt it, but he burnt it to "ashes," "white ashes." If ashes make leys, don't "white ashes" make white—perish the pun! But the essay could not be answered, so, as I would simply state it, it was destroyed. I can find much historical mention of this method of disposing of heretical persons as well as heretical writings. Christians hav always been prone to play with fire. The atmosphere is scarcely yet cleared of its murkiness from the burnings for witchcraft. It is far easier to burn Infidel books and Infidels themselvs than to refute them. However, the fashion changes a little even with the immutable church, and her engins of rage today are not just what they were when Bruno and Servetus were burnt.

This Russian prince, according to the story, instantly threw away the hoarded observations, experiences, and conclusions of a lifetime, for no reason at all—simply because "he became frightened"—got into a panic! Oh, what a precious set "Christ's soldiers" are! Every one of them ought to be pensioned as being a mental and moral invalid, wrecked in the service of Christ. Frightened at a voice that seemed to say, "If there is a God, where are you?" These supernatural voice stories are getting to hav rather a chestnutty flavor! From the time when the first pair are said to hav "heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day," no voice has been able to make itself distinctly heard without a mouth. A voice that has legs might, so to speak, run on all-fours in a sort of unintelligible rustle; but any voice without a mouth must only "seem to say." Miss Joan d'Arc had her little confabs with the voices—and, let me see—did it not end in some sort of cremation? But I will giv my own testimony to the verity of this part of the story, for I hav heard a voice, too, uttering the same conundrum in the same misleading words.

As this "voice" was no "handwriting on the wall," I would like to ask L. C. M., or whoever first gave this "voice" written expression, Why is the word "God" capitalized? If there should be a god benevolent enough not to damn a poor, ignorant wretch for honestly confessing his ignorance or frankly speaking his doubts, it is not that infinitly egotistic "I am" that begins his name with a capital "G." The followers of any god that damns all the "other fellows" can use that conundrum in all its beautiful effectivness. The more the god is addicted to damning, the more fearful becomes that "where-are-you" clause. Does L. C. M. mean that the Christian God, or Jewish Jehovah, is the only deity that denounces curses on honest doubt?

The argument raised by this only half-expressed question ought to bring the blush of shame to the face of a heathen idolator. It is the coolest effrontery in the whole wide field of religious pretension. There are some Christians, like the Universalists, who hav the sense to perceive and feel its shame, and they reject it. So this is what frightened this Russian prince into instant submission, so that, right or wrong, he might be safe. Yet this prince is commended as a proper soldier of Christ—"Christ's soldier." "He became frightened"—got into a panic. At once he did from choice what an idiot does from necessity; ceased to regulate his own conduct by his own judgment; ceased to reason; ceased even to remember that he ever had reasoned; drew the eraser of religious submission across the tablets of his intellect, and became a "blanked fool."

One who abandons himself in this way, who ignores the guidance of reason, who listens to "a voice that seems to say," is not a safe man to exercise the secular functions of a judge or juryman. The Pocasset tragedy shows that he is not even a safe citizen. If he follow his whimsicalities and voices only in his other-worldliness, it would not matter; but, strive all he may, he cannot follow two masters going in opposit directions. The early Christians recognized this fact; and, if they were not anarchists to all secular government, they at least acknowledged themselvs to be "strangers and aliens." Their citizenship here they felt to be incompatible with their citizenship in "a kingdom not of this world." A union of church and state is a strange medley. Either the church swallows up the state, or the state subverts the church, or they mutually destroy each other and introduce anarchy. I might hav some confidence in that eminent jurist who said that he prayed for refreshment, but studied for information; but if he had transposed the objects of his exercises, and had only prayed for knowledge and studied as a recreation, I could not trust him as a secular judge.

We hav taken the Companion now about ten years, and hav found its matter mostly of a high literary character, both instructiv and entertaining, and in the main evincing good sense as well as exquisit taste. I do not know who L. C. M. is, but I should not wonder if he is the "gospel sharp" of the editorial corps. If it were the intention to ruin the Companion, there can be found no more effectual way than to load it with such nonsense as this.

J. K. P. Baker.

England and America.

A CONTRAST, BY AN ENGLISHMAN.

This Christmas I purchased a few little "penny books" for the children, thinking they were good enough to "break up." I read them and reread them to the little folks, until a five-year-old preached me a short sermon. He had been taught that "it is wrong to lie," and that "a lie is something said which is not true." I noticed that the children became somewhat horror-stricken by some of the stories. I endeavored to offset this by telling them, "These are only stories; it wasn't really so." "Papa," said the little preacher, "isn't it wrong to tell lies? You said a lie was something wasn't so." This was a short sermon, but one of the weightiest to which I hav ever listened.

One of the books to which I hav referred represents St. Nicholas foaming with rage for some little trifling offense of boys. Another presents a bad boy trampling a magpie to death, and then shows how the bird, after it was buried, rose again, this time a monstrous bird, and chases the boy around the garden, picks all the hair out of his head, etc.

The powerful sermon to which I had listened led me to reflect on the grave responsibilities resting on those who hav the training of a child's mind.

On observation, I found these books were English productions. Ordinarily, they would not be looked upon as having an evil tendency, because they teach good morals.

The religion of a country often determins its form of government; conversely, the form of government will characterize its religion. Hence, in England, God is always represented by the priesthood as a king, and you hear about "the wrath of an angry God," etc. The people living under that monarchical form of government comprehend what kind of a person Jehovah is. A king commands; his subjects obey. They hav one text there that never wears out—namely, "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken, than the fat of rams." The substance of the whole business of the state church in England is to make good subjects for royalty. Even the nursery books are fraught with this scarecrow teaching.

How different in America! Here morals are taught in a different manner. I hav before me a "Lesson to Little Folks." A little girl cannot stop crying; her papa takes a looking-glass and lets her see her face; she laughs to see such an object.

A little boy is going to take his auntie boat-riding; he starts too quickly, and auntie falls into the water; she gets out, laughs, changes her clothes, and gets into the boat, has her ride, and Charlie learns a lesson to be "careful." This contrast is found running all through the teaching for the young in the two countries.

But the question arises, Why introduce this "scarecrow" teaching from England? Certain American citizens for years hav vied with each other in seeing who could make himself the biggest fool in aping England. All the Old World is interested in America. The pope, undoubtedly, figures on this country as his headquarters. Some dukes, earls, and such like, of Britain, already hav vast estates here, and the money-kings of Columbia are on the most intimate terms with the "nobility" of England. Land in America is going into the hands of a few, and the masses are becoming dissatisfied. A storm is coming, and there are preparations to establish a monarchy on the ruins of the republic. But the people must be prepared for the change; hence Rome is busily establishing parochial schools, in order to destroy knowledge, and the country is flooded with these English books, which play their part in laying the foundation for superstition in the child's mind. This may be a trifle in the eyes of ninety-nine out of a hundred, but Rome understands that when she has formed the mind of the child, she has virtually secured her ends.

You nativ-born Americans do not believe that monarchy is at your doors, but it is, nevertheless, true. I speak not as a prophet, but from logical deductions. I may attempt to demonstrate this in the near future.

Kent, O. John Davey.

Edgar M. Sellon.

Edgar M. Sellon died at Omaha on the 23d of December, 1887. He was a stanch Freethinker, and readers of The Truth Seeker will remember the verses he frequently wrote for these columns.

The services and funeral were under the auspices of Denver Lodge, No. 4, I. O. O. F. At the grave the introduction to the burial services of the order of Odd Fellows was read, after which Mr. Mills read the following, which had been prepared by the deceased and was re-dated at Omaha on the 23d instant. The copy was in type-writer manuscript, and had originally been dated Leadville, April 30th:

SERVICE FOR THE DEAD.

Why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift-flying meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.

Our life is but the shadow of a cloud passing before the midday sun. We can travel the road but once; every golden hour misspent is forever lost. We should ever do deeds of kindness, so as we are passing toward the sunset of our lives it may be said the world is better for our having lived. We encounter superstition at the dawn of our existence, and we are more or less influenced by it along the uncertain path of life to the grave. A few years ago we were not—today we exist—the past a dream, the present a mystery, the future a doubt. In a few days we will hav unraveled the enigma of death and joined the endless procession to the shore of the great ocean of eternity, over whose dark waters no voyager's bark is seen returning, and where those who hav crossed, even if they do exist, are forbid by backward look or sign to divulge the secrets of the coffin and the shroud. Every form of life returns to dust. The very particles of dust under our feet were once what we are now, and are now what we will soon be. Bud, blossom, and flower, are the epitaphs of the loved dead. Truly it has been quoted, "Beyond nature we cannot see, above nature we cannot rise, and below nature we cannot fall." All nature is tending to a final doom. The great clock of time, whose seconds tick centuries, whose minutes are ages and hours are eternities, is running down, and every second its pendulum stops one beat nearer the center of eternal rest, and will until the whole universe returns to the primeval firemist from where it so vainly emerged. Then why should frail man alone expect an existence perpetual which has never been proved and is against the fate of all universal death? At the various mile-posts along the path of life we should leave a record of at least one kind act, one kind charity, and one kind word, passing them all, not on bended knees and in useless supplication, but honorable and erect, and when at the last mile-post we falter and lie down in our final sleep, let us hope that some good angel of mercy may meet us, holding in her hands the sacred scales of justice, wherein may be weighed our actions at the gate of eternity.

BENEDICTION.

And now into the arms of Nature, our universal mother and our final home, we consign thee; forever past the trials of life, forever free from the tears of sorrow and pain—rest, oblivion forever, in thy windowless tomb under the blue canopy of space and sky; in moonlight, sunlight, starlight; summer's golden dawn, autumn's chilling frost, and winter's shroud of snow, rest, sweet rest, sleep, eternal sleep, whose dust knows no awakening, and whose repose dreams of no future—again, peace, quiet, and rest; a last, long farewell. Edgar M. Sellon.

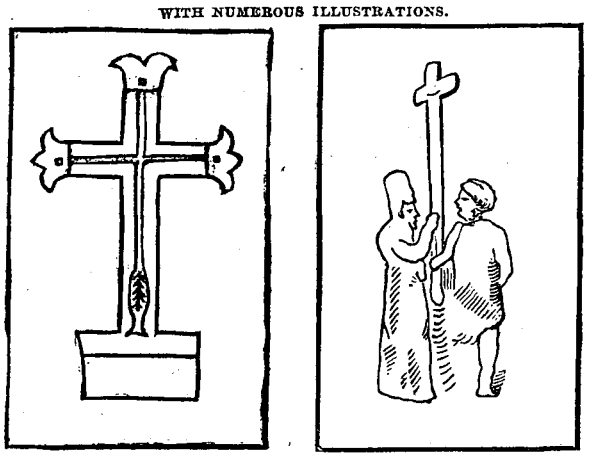
BIBLE MYTHS;



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiqnity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

News of the Week.

THE Canadian paper that is regarded as the organ of Cardinal Taschereau says: "Some hav said that the Knights of Labor are approved. This is false. The sentence pronounced against them has been simply suspended."

DISCOVERY is made of a plot to assassinate the German crown prince.

A GREAT international exhibition is to be held in Paris in 1889.

A PLOT for the death of the czar has been discovered just in time to prevent its execution.

THE value of the presents received by the pope at his jubilee is variously estimated at from $4,000,000 upward.

SUBSCRIPTIONS are being circulated to obtain funds for the erection of a grand Catholic University at Washington, to cost several millions.

AN indictment found against a Spiritualistic medium for obtaining money by trickery has been quashed by the Massachusetts superior court.

THE non-naturalized British subjects resident in this country, who are estimated at 500,000, are procuring naturalization and organizing for political ends, partly to oppose Irish Catholicism and partly from general anti-Irish feeling and race hatred.

THE Knights of Labor are busily preparing their monster petitions to Congress for the establishment of a national telegraph system.

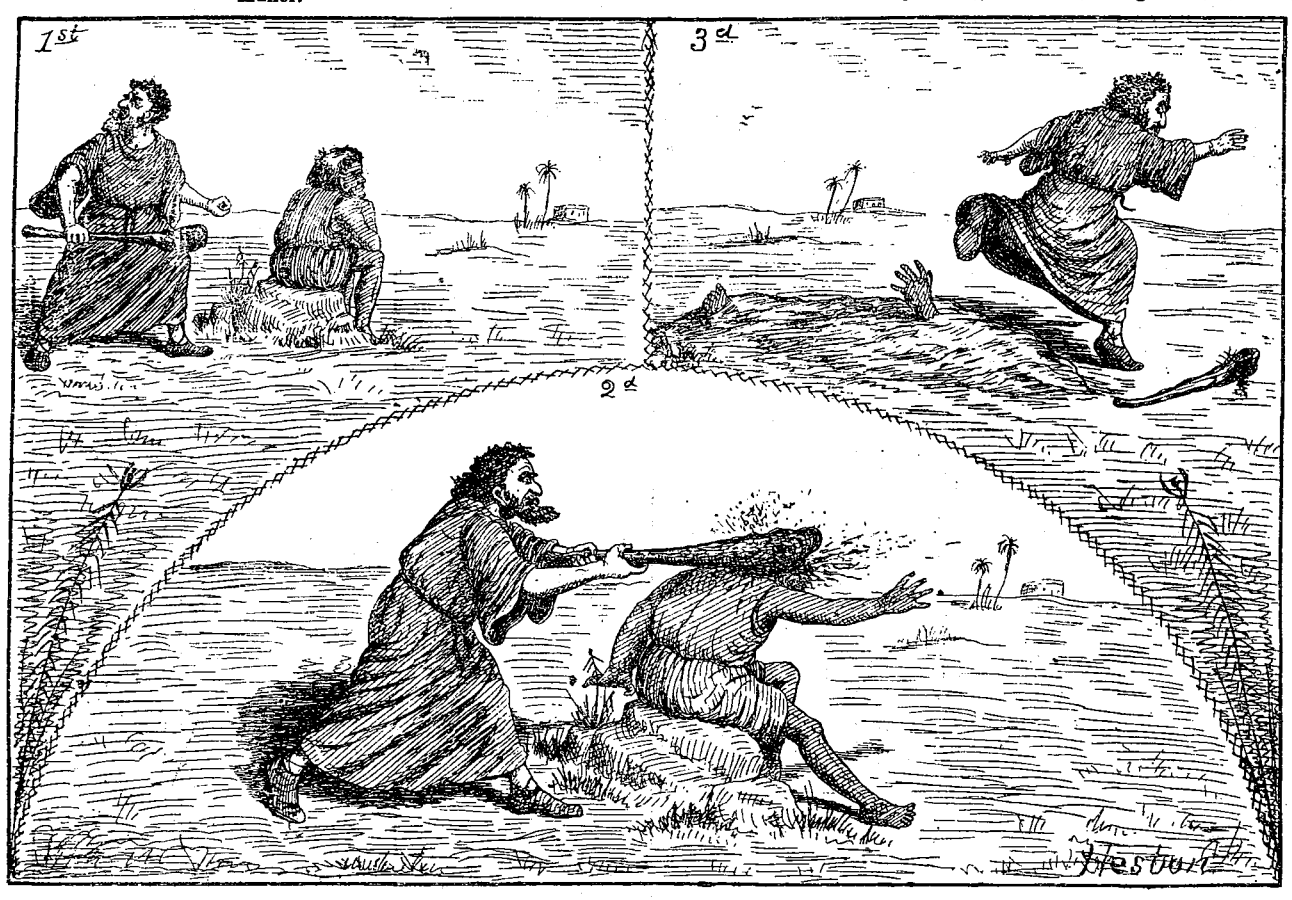
SUITS hav been begun against the government for the recovery of 300,000 acres of Michigan land that it has fraudulently granted to railroad corporations.

ON the 16th was held the dedication of the Catholic Church of the Blessed Sacrament, built on 71st street, New York, on lots just bought at a cost of $160,000.

INDIGNATION is excited by discovery of the disgraceful and dangerous state of administration of quarantine measures in New York harbor, produced by corrupt politics.

THE late blizzard in the Northwest was the severest known. In the blizzard of 1873 70 persons perished, while reports thus far show the lives lost in the present one to number over 100.

THE capitalists and military officers of Germany, who want war, denounce the Socialists, who ask for international peace, for their "display of anti-German spirit under the guise of universal humanitarianism."



THE czar is shamelessly adopting wholesale reactionary courses. Even the slight educational measures adopted by predecessors are revoked, and a late ukase renders ineligible to any civil office all but the nobility.

AMONG the numerous cranks here and there founding new churches, the latest is Rev. Samuel Smith, of St. Paul, Minn., who has just discovered the Apostles' creed to be the only correct thing in the way of creeds, and has left the Methodist church and started the People's church, to be guided by that document.

APPLICATIONS for copies of the third annual report of the bureau of labor statistics hav been filed by a great number of labor organizations, laboring men, and manufacturers. The bound copies will be issued by the public printer within two months, and can be obtained through members of Congress, or by direct application to the labor bureau.

OPINIONS on the significance of the magnificent universal pageant by which the pope has been honored, together with his surprising activity and success in politics, are that Leo XIII. is destined to be classed with Gregory VII. and Innocent III., in the roll of great pontiffs who hav made and unmade kings, nations, and the destinies of peoples.

MOSES GETS THE DROP ON THE EGYPTIAN.—A TRAGEDY IN THREE ACTS.

And he looked this way and that way, and, when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand.—Ex. ii, 12.

Odds and Ends.

WHY don't women get bald? Because they don't hav any anxiety whatever to occupy the front seats of a variety theater, that's why.

MAUD (awakening suddenly at 3 A.M.): "Mother, there's a man trying to break into the house." "Hush, my child; it's your father. He's afraid to ring the bell."

SHE: "Before we were married you promised to fulfill every wish you read in my eyes. But I don't find it so at all." He: "Yes, since that time I hav grown very near-sighted."

NEWSDEALER: "I havn't the change; you can pay me to-morrow." Gentleman: "But suppose I should be killed to-day?" Newsdealer: "Oh, it wouldn't be a very great loss."

"WHEN I grow up I'll be a man, won't I?" "Yes, my son; but if you want to be a man you must be industrious." "Why, mamma, do the lazy boys turn out to be women when they grow up?"

AN old lady who has had extensiv experience as a boarding-house keeper defines a genius as "a man who knows more'n he can find out, spills vittles on his clothes, and doesn't pay his board regularly."

JUDGE: "How comes it that you dared to break into this gentleman's house in the dead of night?" Prisoner: "Why, your lordship, the other time you reproached me for stealing in broad daylight. Am I not to be allowed to work at all?"

"So you were a slave before the war?" "Yes, massa." "Had a hard time in life, eh?" "Spec's I has, massa." "Ever sold?" "Golly, yes, massa. Some feller put a half-dollar on de sidewalk only dis mawnin', sah; I was sold by dat."

AN eastern Oregon man married a Portland widow not long ago. During their bridal tour East he asked her sentimentally: "Darling, do you love me better than your first husband?" "Oh, certainly," she replied; "he's dead!"

DAKOTA lady (to bride of a year): "I understand, Mrs. Pullquick, that your husband has reformed somewhat since his marriage." Mrs. Pullquick: "Oh, my, yes; John drinks as hard as ever, but he doesn't shoot as many people as he used to."

MAGISTRATE (to Uncle Rastus): "I am sorry to see you here, Uncle Rastus. Only a week ago you experienced religion, and now you are up for chicken-stealing." Uncle Rastus: "Yes, yo' honah, but it 'quires mo'n er week, sah, fo' ter git to be much ob a saint."

"THERE is fear," observed the parson, "of this brook overflowing our garden." "Oh, dam it!" suggested little Tommy, whose practical mind was bent on blocking the channel with earthworks. "I'll teach you to swear," cried the astonished father, as with pious energy he boxed Tommy's ears.

A GENTLEMAN once saw a boy peeling the bark from one of his choice trees with a hatchet. The gentleman tried to catch the boy, but the latter was too quick for him, so the pursuer changed his tactics. "Come here, my little son," he said, in a soft, flute-like voice, with counterfeited friendliness; "come here to me a minute. I want to tell you something." "Not yet," replied the recipient; "little boys like me don't need to know everything."

HER NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTION.

My lover is a bashful youth,
And though he loves me well,
Hope long delayed makes me afraid
His love he'll never tell.

Now I've resolved that, once for all,
This sort of thing must stop,
The glad leap year is almost here,
And I am going to pop!

RECENTLY in a Washington horse-car a colored dude was seated among the passengers. A young woman of his own color entered, and he immediately rose and offered her his seat. She gracefully demurred and said: "I do not like to deprive you, sir, of your seat." "Oh, no depravity, miss," was his reply, "no depravity at all; I prefer to stand."

BUT DON'T YOU TELL.

Dear Mrs. Jones, I'm glad you called!
I hoped you'd come to-day.
Now, hav you heard what awful things
They tell of Elder Gray?
You havn't! Why, I heard last night
That some one heard in town
He went to see the "Black Crook" show,
Along with Deacon Brown.
But don't you tell—I'm sure you won't—
Perhaps it isn't so;
But, really, that is what they say—
I don't pretend to know.

Now, Mrs. Jones, do you suppose
That Mr. Smith would cheat?
I'm told by those who ought to know,
He swindles on his meat.
Two ounces short a pound, they say,
And just the same on tea;
And he a member in the church,
Along with you and me!
But don't you tell—I'm sure you won't—
Perhaps it isn't so;
But, really, that is what they say—
I don't pretend to know.

They say that Thompson and his wife
Just quarrel night and day.
He's jealous. Well, perhaps there's cause—
That's not for me to say.
The way that woman puts on airs—
New hat and diamond ring,
And gad, gad, gadding all the time,
With beaux upon her string.
But don't you tell—I'm sure you won't—
Perhaps it isn't so;
But, really, that is what they say—
I don't pretend to know.

They say that Mrs. Johnson's got
A new silk dress, and she Don't pay her washing bill, I'm told—
It came quite straight to me.
It's hinted that her husband drinks
And gambles on the sly;
But then folks gossip so, you know,
But, thank my stars, not I!
Now, don't you tell—I'm sure you won't—
These things may not be so;
But, really, that is what they say—
I don't pretend to know.

Gems of Thought.

IT is not to be denied that some Christians were put to death in the first two centuries of the existence of the church, but they hav abundantly paid the debt. For every Christian that was put to death by unbelievers, the Christians hav put to death in the most cruel manner not less than five hundred poor victims for not entertaining the right sort of belief.—D. M. Bennett.

THAT is a sad and degrading dogma which teaches that, without immortality, there is no difference between virtue and vice. "If I must die like a dog," says Robertson, of Brighton, "I will liv like a dog," and if he could say that, it is not strange that lesser men put it more coarsely. "If it was not for immortality," says one of the most popular preachers in New York [H. W. Beecher?], "I would hav my fling." That is what I call the language of irreverence. The man who can say such a thing as that, and mean it, has had his fling already in his heart. But there is still another way of holding the faith in immortality with irreverence. It is to hold it garrulously, to dogmatize about it, to pretend to know all about it, as if you had been there and come back. Better a great "hope" than such a dead and rotten certainty. — J. W. Chadwick's Higher Reverence.

THE miracles performed by Jesus exceed thirty in number; that is to say, thirty of them are recorded, and these are only a small sample or specimen of his numerous acts of supernatural goodness. Many of them were wrought before a great multitude of people—friends and enemies—in the open day and where there was no possibility of deception. And it really requires more faith to believe that such a multitude could he so often deceived by one of the most blameless of men that ever lived on the face of the earth than it requires to believe the miracles themselvs.—Bible Cyclopedia, by John Eadie, D.D., LL.D. [NOTE.—Thus we are taught to believe that, after all, the hard-hearted Infidel, who holds all miracles, whether done by Moses or Christ, are mere bosh—"mere shoe-leather and prunella"—shows more faith than the sound believer, who takes down whatever is set before him. After studying Dr. Eadie's special plea for a manifest absurdity with what patience the reader can command, he will not fail to appreciate the manly and straightforward deliverance of "honest David." So here goes.—Hylax.]

Look you here, upon this picture, and on this;
The counterfeit presentment of two brothers.
—Hamlet.

THERE is not to be found, in all history, any miracle attested by a sufficient number of men, of such unquestioned good sense, education, and learning, as to secure us against all delusion in themselvs; of such undoubted integrity, as to place them beyond all suspicion of any design to deceive others; of such credit and reputation in the eyes of mankind, as to hav a great deal to lose in case of their being detected in any falsehood; and, at the same time, attesting facts performed in such a public manner, and in so celebrated a part of the world, as to render detection unavoidable; all which circumstances are requisit to giv us a full assurance in the testimony of men.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

If the wild filly, Progress, thou wouldst ride,
Hav young companions ever at thy side;
But wouldst thou stride the stancher mare, Success,
Go with thine elders, though they please the less.
—Schiller [?].

MEN are continually mourning over heresy who are cheating widows out of their inheritance and making business men bankrupts by their selfishness. All our fine scholarship and philosophy will not avail much, unless they teach men to pay one hundred cents on the dollar and to produce a dividend here and now. Talk as we please about the superficiality of some men who seem to ignore poetry and ideality in the interest of simple good works, they will assert their right to be heard as teachers and even iconoclasts, until we can show some practical result of our fine idealizing in common, every-day honesty. Even morality in the lowest sense will be a broader principle than ever religion has been, if it touches the every-day miseries and wants of needy men and women.—S. J. Stewart.

"A PIN a day is a groat a year." "Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselvs." Both these maxims, taken in their true spirit, are admirable prudential rules for the whole of our housekeeping through life. Nor is their usefulness limited to the purse. That still more valuable portion of our property, time, stands equally in need of good husbandry. It is only by making much of our minutes that we can make much of our days and years. Every stitch that is let down may force us to unravel a seam. A minute may be a minute portion of time, but every moment is of moment.—Hare's Guesses at Truth.

THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

Notes and Clippings.

An Illinois editor writes: "Never judge by appearances. A shabby coat may contain an editor, while a man wearing a high-toned plug hat and sporting a dude cane may be a delinquent subscriber."

Wesley Merks, a Baptist preacher at Sower, ten miles from Shelbyville, Ind., was dragged out of bed one night last week by White Caps, and flogged, because he did not do enough preaching to support his family.

Governor Foraker says in his message: "Next after God it is our duty to take care of America." This is delicious. The idea of the governor of Ohio taking care of deity is a museum idea that ought to be stuffed.—Alta Californian.

Subjects of the queen in Canada hav to respect the English flags whether or no. A citizen of Toronto found this out the other day, when he was arrested and fined for displaying in front of his store a union jack bearing an advertisment of the bargains in clothing to be found inside.

The Adventists of Battle Creek, Mich., are in a state of great religious excitement. They believe that the final consummation of earthly matters is close at hand. They hav discarded all their jewelry. Recently at a meeting $3,000 was turned into the church in cash, and $2,000 in jewelry. The latter will be sold to the ungodly, and the money given to the establishing of missions in Switzerland, Norway, England, South Africa, and Australia. On several occasions before these people hav sold their homes for trifling sums and given the money to the church, with all other personal property. The craze bids fair to go to as great an extent as hav previous ones.

Half a dozen book agents were arraigned before a Pennsylvania judge for obtaining money through false pretenses. The judge held that they had done no more than to tell falsehoods in order to sell their goods, and that the law would not warrant him in imprisoning them for plain, ordinary lying.

Speaking of Alaska in a recent lecture in Washington, Prof. J. W. Chickering said that the great obstacle to enjoying a summer there is the vast number of large and bloodthirsty musketoes. Dogs are killed by them, and men preserve their lives only by covering their faces with thick cloths and wearing gloves.

A bill is now before the New York legislature authorizing Felix Adler to celebrate marriages. As long as ministers hav this power, the ethical preachers should be invested with it. But a better way would be to allow none but civil officers to perform the ceremony. Marriage is not a sacrament, but a civil contract.

A Philadelphia family, living near the church of St. Alphonsus, own a very bright parrot. Every evening the bells of the church ring the Angelus, and recently one of the little girls of the family was taught to recite the appropriate prayer at the sound of the bells. The parrot watched her carefully, and the other evening, at the first sound of the chimes, dropped to the bottom of the cage, put down his head, and said the first few words of the prayer. He has kept this up ever since, and is adding other words of the prayer as the little girl teaches them to him. And of such as this parrot is the kingdom of heaven!

Fashionable rector (to little girl): "So you love to go to church, Flossie, and be a good little girl?" Flossie: "Yes, indeed, Mr. Whitechoker." Rector: "Do you know many of the little girls who belong to the church?" Flossie: "No, sir; not very many. I only care to know those who sit in the middle aisle."

It has been decided recently by the court of common pleas of Berks county, Pa., that it is a violation of the law to charge an admission fee to camp-meetings on Sunday. The case was that of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against Weidner, on the complaint of the Rev. T. A. Fernley, and the law under which the decision was made is an act of April 22, 1794.

Joseph Cook, the Boston sensational preacher, caught a Tartar on Sunday afternoon in New York, where he was holding a Prohibition meeting. The pious Joseph said that Sunday papers were as bad as Sunday saloons, and insisted that the latter should not be closed until the newspapers were. When he got through questions were solicited from the audience, whereupon a Mr. Lewis arose and asked Mr. Cook what was the difference between running a political Prohibition meeting on Sunday and issuing a newspaper on Sunday, and when he received no answer he continued: "You stand on that platform a self-confessed hypocrit; you and all the others on that platform are running a political party to make as much money as possible." This plain talk made the whole crowd sick, but they had to take it.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

The bank clerks are greatly disgusted with the turn of public opinion against the perpetuation of the Saturday half-holiday. They hav already grown very fond of it, and it is now possible to hear the same kind of talk about grasping greed and conscienceless capital inside the banks that used to be heard among workingmen, who imagin that a place in a bank is the next thing to a happy hereafter.

The Rev. Mr. Pentecost, assigned Newark clergyman, is growing heretical. In his sermon last Sunday he said: "Those who believe in the Bible may hav no difficulty in believing the record of Jesus, and it's not for me to sneer at them. That Jesus could turn stones into bread, that he was whisked through the air to the top of the temple, or that he was on a mountain top from which he could see all the kingdoms of the earth, is impossible for me to believe. Neither are there any good reasons why I should believe in a personal devil. The devil was of Persian origin, and he was imported by the Hebrews into Palestine. I can't believe in the existence of an almighty God and at the same time of an almighty devil. Say what you will, in the popular conception of religion the devil is smart enough to get the best of God, at least for a season; and if Calvinism is true, the devil has more power to destroy than God to save. Neither do I believe the writer of St. Matthew's gospel knew anything more about angels than I do, and I don't know anything about them. The only angels I know are women and children."

The Distribution of Wealth.

But some are saying: We do not object to the wealth that man creates being distributed upon the principles you suggest. What we object to is that land, which no man creates, shall be so distributed.

I answer: 1. No man creates anything, personal or real. All he can do is to make a profitable and serviceable use of something that nature creates or that naturally exists. Man does not create a chair or watch; he only fashions the wood and metals in such forms and shapes as fit them for use. He does the same with land when he fences it, fells its trees, drains its swamps, plows, harrows, and hoes it, puts habitations on it, and does whatever work upon it makes it fit for use and a source of profit. In parts of New York state you can to-day buy hundreds of thousands of acres of land as fertil as the sun ever shone upon for taxes or 50 cents an acre. Why don't you go and buy it? Not because you havn't the means, for every person here has the means. It is because you don't want it at the prices at which it is offered. But suppose one only of all your number says, "But I do want it," and givs up the attractions of city life, goes up to the north woods, buys his farm of 200 acres with $50, puts up his log-house, and twenty years from now the change of values raises that of his farm to $20,000, is that any reason why society should take his farm away from him and giv it to the state? You say the value in his farm depends on its location with reference to society's aggregated movement, and is, therefore, the product of society's aggregated labor. I reply, the aggregated movement of society creates all values of goods as well as of land, for nothing has value except as it is demanded; and what determins the degree in which it shall be demanded except its nearness to the aggregate social movement? Time and toil depend for their value on demand; hence, on the societary movement, as truly as land does. Hence, if the fact that society creates all values entitles it to take all values, it entitles it to take goods and labor as well as land. Again, if in the twenty years when this land was rising in value you preferred to take the higher wages you could get in town to the poorer fare of the woods, having drawn upon the social movement for your higher wages and better fare for twenty years, can you now turn around in fairness and seize also the land which, when it was cheap, you declined to take as a gift? Both of you were dependent—you for higher wages for your work, and he for the higher ultimate value of his land, upon the aggregate societary movement. But you draw on that societary movement every day for value which you enjoy or spend, retaining nothing, while he waits twenty years, deriving little from the societary movement, and then draws it in increased value. Having eaken the whole of your cake, what entitles you to half of his?

Now, all titles to land begin by occupation while the land is worthless, and when it is a sacrifice of society to become its possessor. Nobody has ever heard of the Lispenards, Schuylers, Livingstons, Roosevelts, Astors, Schermerhorns, Van Cortlands, or Vanderbilts who clung to good wages and city life in Holland and Germany, but only of those who forsook these for the cheap lands and poor fare which could hav been had in 1630 to 1670 on Manhattan island. You can all make the same venture now on Puget sound or Borneo.

Whether land is cheap or dear, the only terms on which any man can obtain or hold it are that he will either pay or forego more enjoyable wealth for its possession than any other man living thinks it worth while to pay or forego. All titles are at all times virtually and momently at auction to the highest bidder. If you are out of possession and want to buy, you pay enjoyable values—money or its representativ. If you are in possession and want to hold, you forego receiving enjoyable values which you might at any moment get. Therefore, all land is virtually under a perpetual process of distribution and redistribution, and always goes to him who will either pay or forego the largest sum in enjoyable wealth to get or keep it. Can any allotment be fairer in principle than this? Organize your state Socialistically or nationalize your land, and could you arrive at any more perfect basis of distribution than to giv to each one in proportion as he was able to pay for it in return service to society at large? Would you not hav to hold each allotment open to competition, to be carried off by him who would pay most, at least control most votes, to sanction his possession—and is not that exactly where we stand now?

2. The function of rent of land is to drive men from the centers toward the circumference of the societary movement. That is a humane function, for it is intrinsically unhealthy for men to liv too close together or under too permanent conditions. Rent is the centrifugal force which drives men from industrial centers, as wages, interest, dividends, and other forms of earnings are the centripetal force which draws them toward these centers.

It is a good thing that men should be driven from the great centers, because high profits only arise under new conditions. Profits are migratory, and their function is to invite investments forward into new fields of enterprise, in order that all resources may be developed, and all men and all forms of talent employed.

£100 in England easily buys 3 acres of land; $500 in Iowa easily buys 10 acres of land; $500 in Dakota easily buys 50 acres of land.

3 English acres produce 100 bu., which, at $1.25, bring $125; 10 Iowa acres produce 150 bu., which, at 80 cents, bring $120; 50 Dakota acres produce 1,000 bu., which, at 30 cents, bring $300.

3 English acres pay £5 cash rent, leaving from $125, $50; 10 Iowa acres pay 10 per cent interest on $500, $50, leaving from $120, $75; 100 Dakota acres pay 20 per cent interest on $500, $100, leaving from $300, $200.

Dakota farmer pays transporter 95 cents per bu. on 100 bu., $95; Iowa farmer pays transporter 45 cents per bu. on 150 bu., $67.50; English farmer pays rent, 75 cents per bu. on 100 bu., $75.

The opponents of private title to land assert that it produces all poverty, and that to relieve poverty the land must be owned by all, either communistically, tribally, or nationally. In Russia the land is held by communes, yet the poverty there is severe, and wages one-fifth what they are here. Among the American Indians and nativ Africans, and by nearly all savages, land is held by the tribe in common, yet even at this moment all our philanthropists are pointing out the need of getting away from a tribal to an individual ownership to prevent the Indians from starving. In India the land is nationalized, but wages are nowhere else so low. Hence, neither communal, tribal, nor national ownership of the land is a cure for poverty; nor ought they to be, for to cure poverty is to stop work. "But," says the Peter the Hermit of this new crusade, "I would only nationalize land by taxing it up to the value of its ground rent." This would be virtually transferring the control of all capital and of all production from the enterprisers to the demagogs; for, as nobody could get the rise in value of real estate, nobody would want to own it, buy it, hold it, or improve it, but all would want to throw it upon the state and let the state become the only producer and distributor, and, necessarily, the sole employer of labor. Exchange and profits would be at an end. Money, hitherto the emancipator of labor, would hav no value, but all society would be resolved back into an army—coercion would take the place of wages, and despotism of individualism. How kind the state would be as an employer, let the lash of the Pharaohs answer. How economical the system would be, let the cost of all armies prove. In 1862–5, with less than 1,000,000 in the field, our government expended $4,000,000 a day in the distribution of wealth to that army. It cost the taxpayers $4 a day, or Hoffman House rates, for every man in the field, and they got bean coffee and decayed cow to eat. How pure a distribution of wealth through majorities and votes would be, let the corruptions of Tammany Hall and of all politics everywhere answer. How equal it would be, let the New York street department answer, where recently for shoveling sand one man drew $1.10 per yard and another $11 per yard. Consider, also, how it would affect us in our international competitions. England does not tax land or capital at all. Our most formidable difficulty in competing with her in manufactures is that all our state, city, and local taxation rests on land and capital first of all. Thus we are handicapped in our race, but Henry George proposes to change our load from a pound or two to a ton.

The shortest step toward such a fulfilment would desolate our land and send our capitalists and laborers fleeing to South America and Africa. Anything like its complete fulfilment would strike the earth like a universal epidemic of insanity. The notion that the millennium is to be brought in by taxing all values up to the point which destroys all value, is on a level with that held two centuries ago by the peasantry of England, that the revelation of a burning hell for nearly everybody is glad tidings of great joy.

Moreover, we are told by many of the devotees of this gospel that it is to come in with the crash of war and revolution. Now, successful war is the most capitalistic of all enterprises.

The North suppressed the Southern rebellion only with capital. England defeated Napoleon with capital. A social revolution in this country could not be begun on any considerably less scale of expenditure than $1,000,000 a day. This would mean that the revolutionary committee would issue bonds, as Jeff Davis's Confederacy did, and undertake to negotiate them. They go with them, hat in hand, to Jay Gould, for instance, and beg to know at what rate he will buy them. Says Mr. Gould: "What is your collateral?"

Committee: "We pledge to you all the lands in the country, whose titles and values it is the object of our revolution to destroy, and the collectiv honor of an organization of men and women bound together by one common tie of sympathy, viz., the incapacity to acquire wealth, or to use money profitably. We pledge you the collectiv energies of the millions whom our revolution will exempt from the necessity of ever again doing anything whatever for anybody, and the hidden stores of precious metals which our revolution will relieve the present downtrodden miners from the toil of bringing to the surface."

"And what interest will you pay?" asks Mr. Gould.

"Sir," replies the committee's chairman, "it is the object of our revolution to abolish interest, as among the medieval relics of darkness."

"And when will you pay the principal?" inquires Gould.

"All collections of debt," replies the chairman, "will, under our new system, be abolished. We will pay it whenever it is demonstrated to us that it is easier for the debtor to pay than not to pay."

"But," replies Gould, "all my wealth is in new and pioneer railroads, most of them paying no dividends. If you inaugurate revolution, these roads will be the first to be torn up and destroyed."

"Yes," responds the chairman; "and if we succeed, the state will take all these roads, and you will be left free to build new ones."

"And what assurance am I to hav," replies Gould, "that all this is to lead to a better state of things, or that you will run my railroads better than I do?"

"How can you doubt," replies the chairman, "when you consider that our entire finance system is to be under the control of men who hav never known the value of money?" The assumption is that Gould would say:

"Pray, for what sum shall I draw my check?"

In contending that the men who hav the value sense large must, perforce of natural law, control the organization of society and the employment of labor, as men who hav the military sense control in war, I admit that society does not get the economics connected with this system without cost. All great values cost. Success in war costs. The private soldier bows and bends under such a yoke of despotism that the element of private will and judgment is reduced to zero, in order that his army may win. As in America and Great Britain, the war which man is waging against nature and for wealth is more intense and activ than it has ever been before, or is elsewhere, it is possible that right here where man claims to be freest, the greatest subordination of the private will, judgment, and even rectitude and conscience, are, or seem often to be, essential to success. More than half of all the enterprise that controls capital and employs labor in both countries is corporate enterprise. You know how strict the disciplin of corporations is. They are seldom humane in positiv intent. Yet who denies that, for the very reason that they are the most economic employers of labor, they are also the most successful, and hence the most beneficial to labor.

We must distinguish between the intent to do others good and the actual beneficence which is accomplished. In the arrangement of the world, much the greater amount of actual good to all is accomplished indirectly through the working of selfish or business motivs. This is the major key to which the economic harmonies of society are pitched. But there is also a minor key, which is subordinate in function and in fact; which receives most of the praise, but accomplishes least of the practical good which is done among men. This minor key is altruism, benevolence, or philanthropy. The total good obtainable through philanthropy is extremely small compared with the involuntary good arising out of industrial pursuits conducted from a selfish motiv. It is like the utility of the flowers compared with that of the grasses, vegetables, and trees—highly ornamental, fragrant, and attractiv, seldom useful, and occasionally poisonous. Occasionally altruistic acts do good. When Charles O'Conor, the best lawyer America has ever produced, had just been admitted to the bar, he was without a library, but had found a law library which he could buy for $300. A friend suggested to him that he go to a Mr. Pardow, whom he knew slightly, but who was under no obligations to assist him, and ask him to indorse O'Conor's note for the sum required. O'Conor did so. Mr. Pardow listened, without intimating whether he would make the loan or not, and without indicating whether the request pleased, or annoyed, or was indifferent to him. He simply made no reply. A week after, he sent word to O'Conor that he would indorse the note. O'Conor, with tears flowing in his bright, large eyes, went, note in hand, to the bookseller and brought away his prize, 150 volumes of law-books, which became the basis of his subsequently large library.

Sixty years later, when O'Conor had retired to his island home in Nantucket, he narrated this incident to a friend after dinner.

"And what has become of the family of your benefactor?" asked his friend.

"That young lady in the other room," said O'Conor, "whom I now call my adopted daughter, is Mr. Pardow's great-granddaughter."

As such acts of beneficence are priceless, money cannot measure the coin in which the truly noble will repay them. The loan of $300 was repaid when it fell due by O'Conor to Pardow in person. But sixty years afterward the kindness which dictated the loan came back to the good man's great-granddaughter in years of the nurturing fatherhood of a good and great mind toward an orphan girl, ending at its close in the whole of his princely estate. Moreover, such had been the effect of this man's act on O'Conor's mind that he made it a rule through life never to deny a person asking charity.

Charity, to be such, must be unorganized and personal. All organized charities degenerate into modes of egoism, instead of remaining altroistic in any sense; they become modes of business, but are inferior to business in their complete unproductivness. They cultivate also the kind of want they endeavor to relieve. When, under the English poor laws, a weekly allowance was made to unmarried women who gave birth to children, and also to the child, the object and intent was to discourage abortion and child-murder. The effect was that young unmarried shameless girls would boast of their superiority over married couples, for the latter got no allowance unless in pinching want, while the former got a weekly allowance merely for and in proportion to their depravity. Most organized charities breed the evils they aim to remedy. Charity, therefore, must be subordinated to selfishness; benevolence must be made secondary to business, or the world would speedily be destroyed by the disasters that would follow. In this respect, the actual constitution of human nature is more nearly aplomb to the true interests of society than the dreams of philanthropic visionaries are, who would remodel human nature on the false basis of subordinating self-love to the love of others. Fortunately, human nature is so obstinately and indestructibly firm and true to itself that, while altroistic systems can perpetually be preached, they can never be practiced.

VAN BUREN DENSLOW.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

Colonel Ingersoll's Extensiv Constituency.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav copied the above heading from the New York Evangelist, one of the leading weekly papers of the Presbyterian church, owned and edited by Henry M. Field, the writer of some letters, recently, to the colonel, in the North American Review. It is very evident that the colonel's letters to Editor Field hav caused no little consternation in the orthodox ranks. There is never such a fluttering in the flock unless some one has been hit. Many clergymen hav been so disturbed by the influence of the colonel's letters that they feel impelled to write to the editor and unbosom their poignant grief. Some of the more zealous Presbyterian fossils, who hav no ideas beyond the pale of the church, urge Editor Field to write a book on "Ingersoll Infidelity," to which Mr. Field replies, in his Evangelist, as follows: "We shall never find the time, nor strength, to write a book in reply to Colonel Ingersoll. Nor does it seem to us quite so necessary as the writer thinks. We had an edition of a thousand copies of my letters to Colonel Ingersoll, printed on thick paper, in the style of the North American Review, for which we paid $85. As the postage is two cents per copy, if we could sell them all, we should not get our money back. Any subscriber to the Evangelist can hav a copy for nothing, by calling for it. Colonel Ingersoll's work is done by lectures printed in the cheapest form, and sold on news-stands at five cents apiece. In this, he shows admirable sagacity. He knows that a minie bullet will kill a man as effectivly as a cannon ball. So he aims with that which is sharp and keenly pointed, wit, which accounts for his immense popularity."

An eminent theologist wrote: "Many copies of your letters in pamphlet form hav been circulated among the thinking and reading young men, and professional business men, of the community. To you, it may not be a surprise; but to me, it was, to find that nearly every one of these men had procured the North American Review for the sake of reading those letters of the colonel's, while they had not read your letters, nor made any effort to procure them. On the table of a retired New Yorker, who loves horses far better than most men do theological discussions, I met with the North American Review, which had been purchased solely for Colonel Ingersoll's letters. For this, I confess, I was not prepared. But the numbers in which your letters were published were not procured. This fiery assailant of the orthodox faith has a constituency the range of which, I am now sure, is wider and higher than many of us believed. I hav never so much as mentioned his name in any sermon or address. My eyes are opening to the fact that multitudes of intelligent and thinking people are reading but one side. Until I had made inquiry, I did not know how many read everything Colonel Ingersoll has to say, but will read nothing on the other side. The conviction grows upon me that our churches are tinged with these secret innings of the enemy far beyond our knowledge or conjecture. There are grave doubts and a growing distrust of our teaching concerning God and the hereafter."

I hav a good orthodox sister who wrote me that she had tried to induce her neighbors to read Editor Field's letters in her copy of the Evangelist, but they will read only one side, she wrote, for the reason that the other side hav nothing to offer only Jesus and Jerusalem, and, "We are tired of it," they all say.

I trust that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be amused at the constituency of Colonel Ingersoll in certain commercial circles in New York city and in the cities and villages round about the great metropolis. A wealthy firm of tobacconists, L. Miller & Sons, 155 Chambers street, New York city, hav been to the enormous expense of printing several thousand splendid chromos of Colonel Ingersoll, larger than life size, which are as perfect as any painted portrait. These beautiful chromos are put in costly frames, about four feet long and nearly a yard wide (as I estimated), covered with glass, and one of these splendid "show-pictures" is delivered to every purchaser of tobacco of this firm. Above the head are the large letters in gilt, "Our Bob." Beneath the chromo is the attractiv word, "Cigars." The frame is hung in a conspicuous place, to induce purchasers to buy cigars of this particular stamp. I must confess that it is not at all pleasing to my notions of propriety to see Colonel Ingersoll's life-size portrait appealing to smokers to purchase "Our Bob Cigars," as I am a thorough anti-tobacco advocate. But the fact illustrates the wide constituency of the great reformer.

VERITAS.

Religion in France, Italy, and Spain.

Philip Schaff, D.D., in the Independent.

FRANCE.—France has lived since 1789 under eight constitutions (1791, 1793, 1795, 1799, 1814, 1830, 1848, 1852, 1875). The charter of August 14, 1830, signed by King Louis Philippe and his prime minister Guizot (a Protestant), provides that "each one may profess his religion with equal liberty and shall receive for his religious worship the same protection" (Article V), and that "the ministers of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion, professed by the majority of the French, and those of other Christian worship, shall receive stipends from the public treasury" (Article VI). The constitution of the second republic of 1848 guarantees that "everyone may freely profess his own religion, and shall receive from the state equal protection in the exercise of his worship. The ministers of the religions at present recognized by law, as well as those which may be hereafter recognized, hav a right to receive an allowance from the state" (Ch. II, Art. 7). The present constitution, adopted February 25, 1875, says nothing on the subject of religion. Since the reign of Napoleon I., who wished to keep all the churches under his control, the French government has not only recognized and protected, but also supported the Roman Catholic, national Reformed (Calvinistic), and Lutheran churches; since 1841 also the Jewish synagog, and, in Algiers, the Mohammedan religion. This state aid diminishes their internal independence. The government does not even permit the national Reformed church to hold an official synod; those which hav been held since 1872 are "unofficial" and hav no legislativ force. Other denominations, as the Free church of France, the Episcopalians, Wesleyans, Baptists, etc., are tolerated under restrictions.

The spirit of the French republic is strongly anticlerical and tends toward a separation of church and state, from hostility to rather than respect for religion. We may add from the "Statesman's Year Book" for 1887 (pp. 66, 67), the following additional information:

The population of France at the census of December, 1881, consisted of 29,201,703 Roman Catholics, being 78.50 per cent of the total population; of 692,800 Protestants, or 1.8 per cent of the population, as compared with 584,757 in 1872; of 53,446 Jews, and 7,684,906 persons "who declined to make any declaration of religious belief." This was the first census at which "non-professants" were registered as such. On former occasions it had been customary to class all who had refused to state what their religion was, or who denied having any religion, as Roman Catholics. The number of persons set down as belonging to "various creeds" was 33,042.

All religions are equal by law, and any sect which numbers 100,000 adherents is entitled to a grant; but at present only the Roman Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and Mussulmans (Algeria, etc.), hav state allowances. In the budget for 1887 these grants were as follows:

	Francs.
Administration	275,800
Roman Catholic worship, etc	44,327,123
Protestant worship, etc	1,551,600
Jewish, etc	180,000
Protestant and Jewish places of worship	40,000
Mussulman worship	216,340
Total	46,573,763

ITALY.—The year 1848 forms a turning-point in the history of Italy. The constitution of Sardinia, proclaimed by King Charles Albert, Turin, March 4, 1848, declares the Roman Catholic church to be the only state religion, but grants toleration to other existing forms of worship within the laws. This fundamental statute (statute fondamentale del regno) extends over the whole kingdom since its unification, with Rome as the capital, in 1870. Since that time the legislature by several acts has diminished the power of the church and clergy, and subordinated them to the authority of the civil government.

Cavour, the statesman; Mazzini, the dreamer; Garibaldi, the hero; and Victor Emanuel, the king, of regenerated Italy, were in favor of full religious liberty, though more from indifference than from positiv faith. A large number of educated men in Italy, as in all the Latin races, are indifferent and skeptical; but, knowing only the Roman religion and wishing to be on the safe side in the other world, they usually send for the priest on their deathbed.

Although toleration is a poor concession, it marks a great advance beyond the former state of disgraceful intolerance when, as late as 1852, the innocent Madiai family were imprisoned in Florence for no other crime than holding prayer-meetings and reading the scriptures in the vernacular, when the Bible could not pass the custom house in the pope's dominions, and when the foreign Protestant residents of Rome were not allowed to worship God except in strict privacy or in a house behind a barn outside of the city walls. Since 1870 there hav been organized at least a dozen Protestant congregations in the city of Rome, which represent the Waldensian, the Free Italian church (Chiesa Libera), the English and American Episcopal, the Scotch Presbyterian, the Methodist, the Baptist, the German Evangelical, and the French Reformed denominations. Such a variety is very confusing to the mind of an Italian Catholic discontented with Romanism and yet used to the idea of the visible unity of the church. The total number of Protestants in Italy at the census of 1881 amounted to 62,000, of whom 22,000 belonged to the Waldensian church of Piedmont, and 30,000 to foreign Protestant bodies.

The kingdom of Italy sustains a peculiar relation to the papacy. It has destroyed its temporal power and broken the backbone of hierarchical state churchism. It conquered the papal territory, made the papal capital its own capital, and thereby incurred the curses of the Vatican, which will forever protest against the robbery of the patrimony of St. Peter. But by a decree of December 31, 1870, and May 13, 1871, Italy guarantees to the supreme pontiff the dignity, inviolability, and all the personal prerogativs of a sovereign; untrammeled correspondence with the Catholic hierarchy throughout the world; the perpetual possession of the Vatican and Lateran palaces and Castel-Gandolfo, with all the edifices, museums, libraries, and gardens belonging thereto; freedom from taxation, and an irrevocable dotation of 3,225,000 lire or francs from the public treasury. The pope has refused the salary, and prefers to liv on the Peter's penny and other voluntary contributions of the two hundred millions of Romanists throughout the world.

The political regeneration and unification of Italy has not materially changed the ruling religion of Italy, but has established a separation between the civil and spiritual powers, and confined the papacy to the latter. Practically the modern Italians are Protestants and disobey the pope in temporal matters; religiously they are Catholics and serve him as the head of the church.

SPAIN.—The land of the Inquisition, of somber cathedrals and bloody bull-rings, is more intensely Roman Catholic than Italy, and owing to its comparativ isolation is less influenced by modern ideas of progress. Under the reign of Queen Isabel II., Matamoras, Carasco, and their friends, converted Bible readers at Malaga, were thrown into prison and condemned to the galleys for professing Protestantism and assembling for religious devotion; in consequence of a strong protest of an international deputation of the Evangelical Alliance the sentence of penal servitude was changed into exile (1863). The misgovernment and immorality of the queen resulted in her expulsion from the throne (1868), and in a succession of civil wars.

The constitution of 1869 declares, in Article 21, the Catholic Apostolic Roman religion to be the religion of the state, and imposes upon the nation the obligation of maintaining its worship and its ministers. This is old Spanish. The second clause grants, for the first time, toleration to non-Catholics in these words: "No person shall be molested in the territory of Spain for his religious opinions, nor for the exercise of his particular religious worship, saving the respect due to Christian morality." Very good so far as it goes. But during the reaction under Alfonso XII, the constitution was modified, June 30, 1876, and the concession of toleration virtually nullified by the addition: "Nevertheless, no other ceremonies nor manifestations in public will be permitted than those of the religion of state." Thus the constitution of 1876 restricts the liberty of non-Catholic worship to private houses. No church or chapel looking like a house of God, no tower, no bell, no procession, no public announcement, is suffered by law, and Protestant preachers and evangelists depend altogether upon the tender mercies of the local magistrate, priests, and people. Notwithstanding, the Protestants continue to labor, under these disadvantages, in about fifty humble places of worship in Madrid, Barcelona, Seville, San Sebastian, and other cities where more liberality prevails than in ignorant and bigoted country districts. At the census of 1877 it was found that sixty per cent of the population could not read.

On the other hand, the Spanish government has greatly diminished the material resources of the state church. By two decrees of the Cortes, passed July 23, 1835, and March 9, 1836, all monastic establishments were suppressed, and their property confiscated for the benefit of the nation.

Portugal knows and tolerates no other religion besides the Roman Catholic, except among foreign residents, who may worship privately in their houses, but not in a church.

The Work of Redeeming the World.

Christian papers are glorifying over missionary reports and the speedy redemption of the world, and point to the thirty-five missionary societies at work in Africa, claiming that its 225,000,000 inhabitants "are practically under the influence and control of Christianity." We will make a few excerpts from the speech of Rev. Canon Taylor at the Church Congress recently held at Wolverhampton, England, and let the reader judge where the first-class prevaricator lies:

The faith of Islam is spreading over Africa with giant strides. . . . Christianity is receding before Islam, while attempts to proselyte Mohammedans are notoriously unsuccessful. We not only fail to gain ground, but even fail to hold our own. . . . An African tribe, once converted to Islam, never returns to paganism, and never embraces Christianity. . . . When Mohammedanism is embraced by a negro tribe, devil-worship, fetichism, cannibalism, human sacrifice, infanticide, witchcraft, at once disappear. Filth is replaced by cleanliness, and they acquire personal dignity and self-respect. Hospitality becomes a religious duty, drunkenness rare, gambling is forbidden. A feeling of humanity, benevolence, and brotherhood is inculcated. Islam, above all, is the most powerful total abstinence association in the world; whereas, the extension of European trade means the extension of drunkenness and vice, and the degradation of the people. Islam introduces a knowledge of reading and writing, decent clothing, personal cleanliness, veracity, and self-respect. Its restraining and civilizing effects are marvelous. How little hav we to show for the vast sums of money and precious lives lavished upon Africa! Christian converts are reckoned by thousands; Moslem converts by millions. . . . The strictly regulated polygamy of Moslem lands is infinitly less degrading to women, and less injurious to men, than the promiscuous polyandry which is the curse of Christian cities, and which is absolutely unknown in Islam. The polyandrous English are not entitled to cast stones at polygamous Moslems.

Do the above quotations furnish the impression that Christianity has Africa within her grasp? This unusually candid canon practically admits that Christianity can only demoralize the Africans, as dealings with the European traders (all Christian products) means their demoralization and degradation. What glorious work this spreading the gospel is, to be sure! Africa is safe from contamination, however, as the reverend gentleman avers that "European teachers will never Christianize Africa. The experiment has been tried and failed."

Not content with attempting to demoralize Africa, these meddlesome missionaries are pegging away at China, where thirty-three societies are trying to turn its 350,000,000 from the religious reverence they cherish toward their progenitors—a duty that makes it almost sacrilege for a son to neglect his parents—for one which declares: "If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and sister, and brother, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

"Blow ye the gospel trumpet," and let the heathen realize the depths of depravity he has attained in following such fallacious teachers as Confucius, who first gave the Golden Rule in a direct and positiv form: "Never do to others what you would not hav them do to you;" who with singular perversity places duty above faith in his code: "Fix thy thoughts on duty; practice without ceasing the virtue of humanity; and, if you hav time, cultivate the arts."

O thou sinful, sallow-colored, pig-tailed heathen! knowest thou not that to fulfill the glorious gospel of Christ the son must turn against his father, the daughter against her mother, and the mother-in-law must bring up the rear of the circus? Ye philosophical mandarins, who pretend to follow the unsanctified Confucius, realize the insufficiency of your simple creed: "Adore heaven and be just." You need dousing very deep in a fountain filled with blood. That's what's the matter.

We are also apprised that Christian missionaries hav established schools throughout India, and are preparing to bulldoze and boycott the nativs from their adherence to Brahma and Buddha; and, as the British Christian government controls the resources of life in India, many nativs are induced to play the hypocrit to be on the right side of the powers that be, just as is the case in America. Buddha laid particular stress on purity of mind and expression; what can the Hindoos think of the sacred book of the Christians, which contains some two hundred passages from which no preacher would venture to select a text? There's no accounting for taste, you know. A cardinal principle of the benighted Hindoo is that of kindness, especially toward dumb brutes. "He that heedlessly treadeth on a worm is darkly alienate to God," is their manner of expressing it. Yet the Lord God of Israel, when he "got on his ear," as the gamins say, commanded men to "slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." Truly thy "ways are ways of pleasantness and all thy paths are peace;" and if the Hindoo heathen don't believe it, let them turn to thy approval of Samuel's humorous sport in hewing "Agag in pieces before the Lord." Thy command to "slay every man his neighbor" may hav had a salient effect on the followers of Nana Sahib about the time of the Cawnpore massacre, for those nativ troops had considerable knowledge of Christianity, and that passage possibly gave them the necessary inspiration. The Lord moves in mysterious ways his wonders to perform. Yes; his ways are far above man's ways, and the farther the better for the inhabitants of India.

The cheering statement is also at hand that all the Feejeeans hav been converted to Christianity—"that in no part of the world has Christianity been so successful, and there is not now an avowed heathen on the island." If this be true—and we are willing to take the assertion as it stands—possibly the instinct of heredity can account for this religion of the tender morsel. Doubtless the missionary who did this "converting" held forth such special inducements as are found in the Old Testament, presenting the extraordinary bill of fare of the Israelitish restauranteur—"and they shall eat every one the flesh of his friends." The Feejean free-lunchers then devoutly sang, "How amiable are thy ways, O Lord God almighty!"

We are further informed that schools and missions are filling up Turkey, Japan, and Persia; that the jaw-smiths of the Jewish Jehovah are in possession, and "that the grandest day of opportunity for the kingdom of God that the earth has ever seen has fully dawned." Well, we hope the almighty duly appreciates this golden "opportunity," and we advise him to seize it with alacrity and not let it slip through his fingers. This may be his first and last chance.

But seriously, it is disgusting and disheartening to think that D. K. Pearson, of this city, gave $50,000 each to two theological tread-mills where they turn out students prepared to teach this brutal blasphemy (mixed, of course, with some humanity), only a short time ago. Think of it! $100,000 to spread the story of endless torment—that our dearest friends, if they can't believe this gospel of blind faith and blood, are elected to everlastingly broil! What a consolation even to those who imagin they hav received their O K mark!

Last week, Dr. Tolman Wheeler, of Chicago, a decrepit old man of eighty-six, blind, deaf, and irrational of course, was wheedled into adding property of $150,000 value to his former gifts to the Episcopalian theological seminary, which totals his endowments to that institution alone $280,000. Church beggars are around him like flies around a candle, and he has willed $75 000 more to similar institutions. What a munificent gift to permeate people's minds with such monstrous rubbish—to consign human beings either to happiness or endless misery, with all the chances in favor of the latter, the road to happiness being a narrow little moss-grown towpath, where one's feet are almost sure to slip, while the other has to hav broad-gage double tracks for its enormous traffic to its terminus, the great Sulphur Springs!

The American Secular Union needs at least $2,000 additional, and it needs it now. With this we can publish facts about the justice and necessity of sustaining Secular principles. This preliminary work devolves upon Freethinkers, as the natural defenders of Secular government—the heirs of Paine, Jefferson, and Washington. These things would tend to elevate, instead of degrading, humanity; they would make a paradise of earth, instead of waiting for one in the heavens; they would teach mankind that the time to be happy is now, and the place to be happy is here. If every Liberal would respond according to his financial ability, this could easily be accomplished.

If you will not sustain Freethought and Secular principles, you certainly are not entitled to masquerade under the title of Liberals. So, Liberals, learn to giv. A little financial forethought on behalf of Secular Freethought would soon establish Secular principles.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Hell and Presbyterianism Going.

The New York Evangelist, Henry M. Field, editor, recently published the following letter from a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK EVANGELIST, Dear Sir: I hav read with interest the letter in the Evangelist of September 15th quoting the Confession of Faith, and likewise your reply to it. Very few will be disposed to take issue with Dr. Field in his statement that he "never heard of any Christian teacher who said that the creator brought beings into the world to destroy them." But the Confession of Faith, if I understand the English language, states just that; and I fail to comprehend how you can speak of "a possible interpretation" or "a construction" of such plain, unequivocal words. Just as soon, it seems to me, might you speak of the fact of two and two making four as possibly bearing some other construction. No, "we are not called upon to justify every doctrin taught or every form of expression used long before we came into the world;" but I think we are called upon not to sail under false colors. Is it not reasonable for a person to turn to the Confession of Faith to see what Presbyterians believe; and can we find fault with Ingersoll or anyone else who brings this up against us? The Confession of Faith is a hindrance to the cause of Christ, and a stumbling-block to many a one. That so many are indolent or indifferent enough to be ignorant of what it teaches does not alter the case. We ought not to be hampered by a Confession of a past generation, teaching doctrins which we, basing our faith on God's word, cannot believe.

I know of some good Christian brethren who hav been deterred from accepting the office of elder because they could not hold office conscientiously under the teachings of such doctrins. When called to the eldership myself, I made similar objections, and my pastor overcame my scruples by saying that, as I accepted the general teaching of the Confession, I need not be considered as accepting every part. But I confess I don't like to be in such a position. A friend, upon union with the church, had a copy of the Confession placed in his hands; it was a great hindrance in his Christian life.

Let us hav a Confession of what we believe in this day, not what the Westminster divines believed.

If the Westminster Confession goes, Presbyterianism goes, and Colonel Ingersoll can congratulate himself upon having driven hell and John Calvin out of the creed of the church.

Open Letter to the Proscriptionists.

Ever since the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 7th I hav been trying to get time to say a few words to Brother Shoemaker. If his letter were the only one of the kind, I should not hav noticed it; but first and last there hav been hundreds of the same proscriptiv character. In the same issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER there are two or three others bearing the earmark of bigotry and intolerance. And through Brother Shoemaker I wish to speak to all the rest.

I hav no disposition to dispute with or enter into controversy with my brother Liberals. If there were but few who take the same position, and these marching in single file and a respectable distance apart, I should hav remained silent.

But when they come mounted, and two abreast, and two on a horse, and charge the gallant old TRUTH SEEKER, then you may expect to hear the clang of my old rusty sword. I do but draw it mildly when I say that the cannonading of THE TRUTH SEEKER during its existence has done as much to batter down the walls of superstition and secularize the country as any other paper. I do not say that it is the best Freethought paper in the country, but I do say of it, as Billy Cowper said of England: "With all thy faults, I love thee still."

Our complaining brother may be a good shoemaker, but I do not like the style of the shoe he makes. He virtually says that I shall not enjoy the visits of THE TRUTH SEEKER from week to week.

If the question should be submitted to Brother Shoemaker whether THE TRUTH SEEKER should be blotted out of existence or continue on in its grand career, I think he would tremble at the thought of hearing the death knell of the gallant old flag-bearer.

And yet, perhaps, without knowing it, his decree has gone forth that THE TRUTH SEEKER shall die, and that thousands of hearts shall no more be made glad by perusing its instructiv pages. Because, if all should follow the example of Brother Shoemaker and order the paper stopped, what would become of the grand old lighthouse of Freethought?

What has caused this great commotion? Why, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has allowed certain individuals to say that justice was not meted out to the Anarchists who were hanged at Chicago, and hence these intolerant fault-finders infer that all who hav expressed sympathy for them and complained of the injustice done to them, including the Editor, are Anarchists. Although the Editor has said many times that he was not an Anarchist, and notwithstanding the fact that he has written quite long editorials to show the unreasonableness and impracticability of Anarchy, yet, like Beecher's dog Noble, they still keep barking at the hole in the wall.

The most that the Editor has ever intimated in regard to the Anarchists to my knowledge, was that the hanging was not justifiable from the evidence adduced in the court. So say I, and so say thousands all over the country.

Do you know that there are a great many wise and good men in the country who are Anarchists? Are these men to forfeit all their rights because you and some others disagree with them?

Mr. Palmer said that they were hanged because they were Anarchists, more than because they committed murder. Had he not a right to say that?

You say the Anarchists ought to be exported out of the country. I may think otherwise, but would it not be the rankest bigotry in me to order THE TRUTH SEEKER stopped because the Editor allowed you to express an opinion adverse to my belief?

Few realize that nearly all the newspapers of the country are under the control of capitalists. Nearly all the people read these papers and take their cue really from what the capitalists say or dictate to be said. The Anarchists championed the cause of the bread-winners, and in doing so they exposed the corruption, and oppression, and injustice of the tyrannical capitalistic barons of the country, and a subsidized press cried aloud for their blood, and in obedience to its clamor and at the behest of the capitalists the victims were sacrificed. I may be mistaken in all this, but will some one order his paper stopped on account of what I say? O my friends! this spirit of intolerance will never do. Are we no better than our Christian brethren? It was this spirit which breathed the breath of life into the Inquisition—which drove the Jews and Moors out of Spain—which actuated the witch-hunters and woman whippers of New England. It has kindled the fires of torture in hell and on earth, and brought thousands to the stake and the gibbet.

I hav admired the open-heartedness, the magnanimous and Liberal spirit, which the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has manifested. What I admire Brother Shoemaker and others condemn. Has he not dealt Liberally with you? Has he not published your adverse criticism, though damaging to himself? Has he not bared his breast to the poisoned arrows of your complaints and those of others, himself not complaining? Materialists complain because Spiritualists are allowed a hearing, and Spiritualists cry out against articles written by Materialists; but all get a hearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some inveigh against Heston's cartoons; others declare them the grandest feature of the paper. All are allowed to express their thoughts. Should not all good men be interested in keeping up a paper in which every thought can find expression? Who shall be shut out? Who shall say that the thoughts of one shall find expression and those of another be smothered down? Suppose the Editor should run the paper to suit the Materialists, or the Spiritualists, or Agnostics, or Deists, what would become of THE TRUTH SEEKER? Is it not a thousand times better to hav a paper free to all? What right has a man to say that I shall not eat a certain kind of food because he does not like it? I, for one, am glad that the Editor proposes to keep a free table, where everyone is allowed to eat what to him may be the most palatable. None but a selfish bigot will find fault with the arrangement.

Let us put away this selfishness, and leave those who differ from us in the full enjoyment of all the rights and privileges which we claim for ourselvs.

Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see.
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me.

Naples, N. Y., Jan. 15. 1888. JOHN PECK.

Books and Periodicals.

"Miracles and Miracle Workers" and "Christian Absurdities," by John Peck, ought to hav a big circulation. The price of the first is 10 cents, or 75 cents per dozen; of the second, 20 cents, or six copies for $1. John Peck is one of the most convincing and entertaining writers in the country.

We hav received the thirty-fifth annual report of the Children's Aid Society, whose office is at 24 St. Mark's place, this city. The society is doing a splendid work in helping the waifs and strays, "the flotsam and jetsam on the wild, rude sea of life," to grow up useful citizens, and should be encouraged. By and by, when justice prevails, there will be no need of charity, but that time seems afar off, and generous actions should be appreciated.

Colonel Ingersoll's argument at Mr. Reynolds's trial for blasphemy makes an exceedingly neat appearance under the skilful workmanship of Mr. Eckler. We make an extract from the argument on another page, and may perhaps quote other gems therefrom, but the pamphlet is too bulky to wholly reprint in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Send 25 cents for a copy, or $2 for a dozen copies to distribute, and get one of the 50-cent, cloth-bound copies to put in your library.

The "Woman Publishing Co.," 122 Nassau street, this city, began in December last the publication of a monthly magazine named Woman. It is the usual magazine size, is illustrated, well printed, contains nearly a hundred pages, sells for 25 cents per number, with yearly rates of $2.75, and the contents are good and interesting. The writers are well-known literary men and women, and the magazine contains many departments such as we naturally look for in a woman's journal.

The trouble the Rev. John C. Kimball of Hartford, Conn., got into by condemning the execution of the Chicago Anarchists will be remembered by our readers. The sermon which caused the trouble has been printed by the Plimpton Manufacturing Co., of Hartford, and 10 cents will probably pay for a copy, though no price is marked upon the one sent us. Mr. Kimball does not understand Anarchy very well, but he has a tender heart and courage to speak its sentiments. He also clearly recognizes that the Chicago Anarchists did not hav a fair trial.

The proper thing to say in Volapük, when you meet a companion, is, "Liko stadols?" and if your friend is all right, he will answer, "Stadob benüno." If it is early in the morning and he looks hungry, you should say, "Li-vilols göledön koobs?" which is the melodious invitation Mr. Schleyer, author of Volapük, extends to him he desires to see at his breakfast table. In the twenty-four-page "Abridged Grammar of Volapük," which I. Schick, of Chicago, sends us, there are many more phrases equally as plain as these, and the boys and girls can get more than 20 cents' worth of fun from it. The Grammar contains also an account of the origin of Volapük and the reasons why a new universal language is desirable. It is worth the investigation of all scholars. Those more familiar with the German than with the English language can obtain "Die Weltsprache Volapük in drei Lectionen," at the same price.

The Workmen's Advocate, New Haven, Conn., says: "The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1888 is out. A frontispiece picture of Science Hall, on Broome street, New York, as it appeared in 1829, givs the volume a venerable and historical tone, which is, however, fully counterbalanced by Watson Heston's quaint pen drawings of biblio-legendary subjects. A review of the Free-thought movement in the United States and twenty-four portraits of distinguished American Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers make the Almanac a valuable addition to the library table. Price, 25 cents."

James Caleb McIntosh, Exeter, Ont., Can., has published "The Eventful Chronicle and Bible Advocate and Expositor," and sent a copy to this office, though wherefore we fail to see. Mr. McIntosh is another one of a somewhat numerous class of gentlemen who kindly undertake to expound divine mysteries for the benefit of the unenlightened. He says: "Reader, do you wish salvation? If so, you cannot get it in any of the sectarian churches. They are blind, and will feed you with chaff in place of the finest of the wheat. Come out of Babylon or sectarian creeds; the number of the beast at the appearing of Christ shall be 666 (see Rev. xiii, 18)." The author closes by saying that he is still compos mentis, a statement we take the liberty to doubt. We should judge that 25 cents, remitted to the author, would be ample compensation for the book.

The difficulty of starting a new paper and getting it out on time is very humorously described by George Macdonald in a communication which we shall print next week. But, we may say in advance, considering the trouble that he and Mr. Putnam had, they succeeded well. We hav received two issues of Freethought, and find it about what we expected—a splendid journal. It is full of the earnest enthusiam of Mr. Putnam and the no less earnest but more witty attacks upon superstition of "our brother," who is something of a Voltaire in his way. We agree with the Investigator that Freethought "makes a handsome appearance, is well filled;" and, with Mr. Seaver, "we hope it may prove successful and endure for generations to come." The Pacific coast needs an Infidel journal, and we know of no men more competent to conduct one than the editors of Freethought.

To save the Editor the trouble of reading "A Half Century of Science," the publishers send along with the pamphlet the following notice:

"The progress made by science within the last fifty years is the most noteworthy phenomenon of recent history. In the work before us that momentous episode finds adequate record and exposition, one of the authors, Professor Huxley, being the foremost biologist of our time as well as a recognized leader of scientific thought; and the other, Mr. Grant Allen, one of the most successful popularizers of the results of scientific research. It forms No. 96 of the Humboldt Library of Popular Science—a series containing many of the scientific works which hav in our day revolutionized the intellectual and moral world. Such works must command the attention of every intelligent man who would understand the mind of the age in which we liv."

In spite of the kindness of Mr. Fitzgerald, we hav read the work, and can conscientiously recommend others to send 15 cents to this office and get a copy.

Fowler & Wells, publishers of "How to Succeed as a Stenographer and Typewriter," price 25 cents, sold at this office, hav sent this to us: "This practical manual for the shorthand student and writer considers among other things the advisability of learning shorthand, the time and practice required; the percentage of failures; the choice of system; the average of speed required, and the advantages to be derived from its study; also where to seek a situation; the reporting of evidence; the rates charged, etc.; the reporting of meetings, lectures, etc., with a great deal of information of interest to every shorthand writer and student; also a department on typewriting, the qualifications necessary; speed, rules for the use of capital letters and punctuation, how to get business, salaries, etc.; a chapter on newspaper reporting will be found especially interesting. It is well worth the price, 25 cents, even to a man who does no shorthand work." We doubt the last assertion, but will let it go, as Fowler & Wells are friends of ours, though they are Christian.

Lucy E. Parsons, wife of the late Albert R. Parsons, deceased Anarchist, has opened a bookstore in Room 35, 169 Washington street, Chicago, and laid in a stock of social and economic works. She has also published in handsome shape her husband's book, written in prison and finished but a short time before his execution, on "Anarchism: Its Philosophy and Scientific Basis." The first part of this work—we quote the words of its author—givs a historical outline of the period prior to the Revolution of 1776 up to the present time in the United States. It also traces the origin and development of the wage system in Europe from the fourteenth century, and contains copious extracts from Karl Marx's "Capital" on the economic law of wages. The second part is devoted to extracts from the speeches of the eight condemned Anarchists on the subject of Anarchy, which were delivered before the court in reply to the question why sentence should not be pronounced. Also to articles defining Anarchy by Peter Krapotkin, Elisee Reclus, C. L. James, and other Anarchists. Mr. Parsons was an intelligent compiler, a vigorous writer, and owing to the peculiar circumstances under which the book was produced it will no doubt find a large sale, as it should, to help the widow and the orphans of the wrongfully executed author. We do not agree with the philosophy of the author, nor with his conclusions that the abolition of government is possible, and we hav no space to enter into controversy on the point. We hav already done that in opposition to Mr. Tucker. But we love justice, which Mr. Parsons did not receive, and we sympathize with his family. The price of the book is $1, and we advise those who can spare that sum to send to Mrs. Parsons for a copy, whether they read it or not.

Some time ago we mentioned that the Investigator was printing a serial from the pen of Wm. McDonnell, author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Beautiful Snow," and so forth, entitled, "Reminiscences of a Preacher." This serial is now completed, and published in handsome book form by Mr. Mendum. The following outline of the story we copy from the Investigator:

"The author makes England the scene of his story, and an itinerant preacher the hero. This hero is the only son of a widow, who is not only poor but pious—for in a strictly orthodox family piety and poverty go together. The widow intends her son to be a preacher of 'the living word.'

"In the first chapter of the story, while yet a boy, the son receives his first theological impression. He, with a male companion near his own age, is caught in a thunder-storm, and while seeking shelter under a tree his companion is killed by the lightning. He thought it a singular 'providence' that preserved him, but destroyed his companion.

"When about nineteen years old he left home, after a quarrel with his mother. He entered a saloon, drank some gin, and enlisted in the English army. He was in the famous battle of Waterloo, where he was wounded. While in the army he became acquainted with a young man who had deserted his betrothed on the wedding-day, and who confided the story of his treachery and the name of the betrayed girl to his keeping. The young man was killed in battle. Our hero left the army upon his return to England. Remorse of his harsh treatment of his mother drove him back to his old home, but she was no longer there. He sought her in various places, and at last found her just as she was being laid at rest in the grave. Without friends, without a home, and without an occupation, he obtained a license to preach, with the resolve to atone by the future for the past. He was assigned a district in a mining region especially noted for its desperate characters. Having met with considerable opposition in his new field, he at last overawes it, and in the rough and wild country, and living with these uncouth men and women, he finds a young woman by the name of Mary Edgar, who proves to be the deserted betrothed of his army friend. He falls in love with her, hears her sad story from her own lips, but renews his offer of marriage, and goes away expecting on his return to be her accepted lover.

"He comes back in a few weeks to find her sick, and his love goes with her to the grave and not to the altar. She leaves her little child to his care, but in a few years he buries her beside her mother. This ends the romance, and the story is told in an interesting way.

"The last few chapters of the book leave the hero out entirely, and are devoted to the discussion of 'Capital Punishment,' 'Eternal Punishment,' 'Clergymen,' and general religious topics. The author in these last chapters deals the church and the Christian superstitions some telling blows."

The story is used by Mr. McDonnell to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once. Those who hav not, can begin on this one and go backward. The price is 75 cents, in cloth; 50 cents, in paper covers. We hav it for sale.

Lectures and Meetings.

JOHN E. REMSBURG lectured in the city hall at Brunswick, Mo., January 13th. On the following day, in the same hall, J. C. Talmage, a cousin of the Brooklyn divine, was arraigned for murder.

FRIDAY evening, January 27th, Benjamin R. Tucker, of Boston, will address the Manhattan Liberal Club upon the subject of "Socialism and Anarchy: How Far They Agree, and Wherein They Differ." The club meets at 220 East Fifteenth street.

MR. FRED. MAY HOLLAND, of Concord, Mass., is to lecture at Montreal before the Pioneer Freethought Club, on Sunday evening, January 29th, on "The Millennium As It Was; or, How the Saints Ruled the Earth Between 400 and 1400 A.D." He is preparing a lecture entitled, "Christus vs. Cosmos."

THE twentieth annual convention of the New England Labor Reform League meets in Codman Hall, 176 Tremont street, Boston, Sunday and Monday, January 29th and 30th, three sessions daily. Rev. J. M. L. Babcock, Rev. A. A. Miner, D.D., John Orvis, Joseph P. Sheafe, Carl Fredi, N. E. Chase, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers are expected.

SUNDAY, February 5th, Charles Watts will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, of Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets. Subject, at 2.30 P.M., "The Devil: His Birth, Reign, and Death;" at 7:30 P.M., "Confucius, Buddha, and Christ: Their Merits and Demerits." Liberals throughout the vicinity are cordially invited to coöperate to make these lectures a grand success. Admission free.

Another Minister Renounces Presbyterian Doctrin.

From the New York Sun.

Few people outside the Calvinistic denominations realize how far their recognized leaders are from accepting the old-time doctrin of election and predestination in all its rigidity. The Rev. A. E. Kittridge, who, though he is pastor of the Madison Avenue Reformed church, at Fifty-seventh street, calls himself a Presbyterian, said in last Sunday evening's sermon that he did not believe there was a single soul now in heaven because he was one of the favored few, or a single soul in hell because he was left out of the favored few. He could not and would not believe such a thing.

Communications.

The Middle Ages in the Nineteeth Century.

The Middle Ages in the nineteenth century! The millennium of inhumanity in the most humane age! The devil's spirit in an angel's body! Queer, is it not? Is such a thing possible? Suppose I tell you that I intend to write about dry water, hot ice, and cold fire—would not you say that I hav a very poor opinion of my readers if I want them to read such nonsense, or that my mind is diseased if I am in earnest? But I tell you, my kind reader, the Middle Ages are not a thing of the past yet. Their evil spirit is still among us; their sword, besmeared with the blood of millions of human beings, has not got rusty yet, and when you are acquainted with the facts that I am about to relate, you will agree with me that the Middle Ages are still in robust health and probably the present generation will never attend their funeral.

It is a sad story; a story of inhumanity, cruelty, and murder, and that inhumanity, cruelty, and murder done in the name of law and order, progress and civilization—of course, Christian civilization. The name of the land where these things happen is Russia.

"Ring the bell, and let the curtain drop!" some one may say; "what delight do you find in turning over these pages?" Very little indeed. But it is by no means a pleasure to look at a wounded body; nevertheless you do occasionally. My story will not gladden your heart. It was not written for amusement. Still, it may interest some one, it may fill some one's heart with sympathy for oppressed people.

Two years ago, when the Bear and the Lion were so anxious to kill each other, the New York Herald used to sing very sweet odes in honor of the Russian government. It has gone so far as to say that by robbing some Asiatic nations of their land Russia is doing a blessed thing—those poor barbarians, being conquered by Russia, are getting civilized. O Civilization! what has become of thee? Think of a barbarian being civilized by the sword of another barbarian!

While reading such nonsense in a paper which claims to hav the largest circulation in the United States, I said to myself: Is the editor of the Herald so ignorant that he really thinks that Russia desires to civilize some Asiatic barbarians? What is Russia doing for the civilization of her own people? Is it trying to enlighten them? By no means. There was a time when the government wanted to educate the people. But that time has gone. Now the government is doing its best—or its worst—to suppress knowledge. Why? Because it came to the conclusion that so long as the people are ignorant they consider the czar as a superhuman being. But as soon as they get some knowledge, they begin to ask, What right has one man, who is by no means wiser or better than any other man, to make millions work for him? Such a question cannot be tolerated in Russia. Only think, what would become of the drones, called the "czar's family," if all the people became troubled with that question? What will become of the czar's servants, called ministers, senators, governors, etc.? What will become of the nobles—people with noble blood (can you tell, my dear reader, what is noble blood?) who liv on the labor of poor people without a drop of noble blood in their veins? Do you really expect them to make an honest living? Do you want them to handle an ax, to follow a plow, to run a machine? What nonsense! You might as well expect to see a lion playing with a lamb. Well, something must be done to make people forget such impious questions. And, taking into consideration that any means are just for that purpose, the government said: "Away with the school! Blessed be ignorance!" Only a few weeks ago Count Tolstoy, a true servant of the czar, issued a proclamation to the directors of the gymnasiums and universities prohibiting their accepting as pupils children of farmers, tradesmen, shopkeepers, peasants, etc.

But what is to be done with the people who are so enlightened that they can't forget the first lesson of humanity? What is to be done with that class who are so wicked that they desire to think without the permission of the policeman and priest? What is to be done with that revolutionary element, with those "terrible Nihilists," who not only do their own thinking, but dare to convert others to their views by issuing books and papers, and sending missionaries to the peasants? In the Middle Ages of the past they would hav been burnt at the stake. In the Middle Ages of the present—that is to say, in Russia—such a barbarous act could not be done? Think of burning a man in a "civilized" country! The Russian so-called heretics and traitors are not burnt, but sent to Siberia, an everlasting hell; where they hav no chance of becoming better, supposing them to be bad; where they hav no right to call themselvs human beings. Still they may congratulate themselvs and thank Mother Nature for her blessed gift—death. After all, their misery won't last for ever. When their hearts, filled with love for mankind, will cease to beat, when their eyes will be closed, they will find rest in their graves.

By saying that the Russian government does not burn its antagonists, I did not mean to say that their lives are always spared. Now and then a poor victim is secretly tortured to death in some terrible prison, and then they print in the Pravitelstvenny Vestnik (the official organ of the government) a little note saying that such and such a prisoner died of such and such a sickness. That is not an imaginary story, my reader, but a real fact.

The best and the greatest men and women are now in Siberia, and if there is in Russia a place which will soon be civilized, Siberia is the place. Even Tchernychewsky is there. Tchernychewsky is one of the greatest men of our age. As a writer on the subject of political economy he ranks very high, and in his great romance, "What is to Be Done?" he gave to the world a gospel of egoism, but such a noble egoism that if all men and women could cultivate an egoism of that kind the earth would become a heaven. There was no man in Russia, unless it be the late Pisareff, the great Realist critic, always in agreement with our martyr-hero, so capable of having an influence upon the mind of the young generation as Tchernychewsky. The Rakhmetoffs, Lopukhoffs, Kirsanoffs, and Vera Pavlovnas—the heroes and heroins of "What is to Be Done?"—will always be dear to the Russian youth as representativs of their own secret thoughts and dreams. Tchernychewsky, being in prison, dreamed and prophesied about a bright future. His enthusiastic disciples are still dreaming and hoping; they are willing to sacrifice their lives for the ideas of their great teacher. Alas, friends! You are sincere, honest and generous; you are not hypocrits, but real friends of the human race. Maybe in the future you will be canonized as saints. But you will never see the sun of righteousness enlightening the world.

What crime has Tchernychewsky done, that he was banished? Why, he is a dangerous man! He wouldn't support the government, he wouldn't applaud its robberies, its crimes, its murders. Is such a man to be at liberty? No! Down with him!

Do you know what would become of our great Ingersoll had he lived in Russia? He would share the fate of Tchernychewsky or would be under the sod long ago. Which is the best, I hardly know. "Giv me liberty or giv me death." The pure teachings of the Ingersolls and the Tchernychewskys are vicious doctrins in Russia.

But my intention is not to describe all the beautiful flowers of humanity which grow on the Russian soil. Perhaps I will do it in the future. At present I wish to say a few words about a poor little sheep which is so wicked that it dares to disagree with the Bear on some mathematical question. The Bear says: "Three times one makes one." The sheep says: "I beg your pardon, sir; three times one makes three." What right hav you, foolish little sheep, to contradict the Bear? It is impossible for you to rival him in strength, and in an open fight with his majesty you will be conquered and your head will be bruised. Why, then, be so stiff-necked? I'll tell you, my friend, what to do. Fall upon your knees, plead for mercy; say that you were mistaken; that after careful consideration you discovered that the Bear is the greatest mathematician that ever lived on the globe, and then he will treat you as an equal. But you won't take my advice—you are too honest to tell a lie? All right! Be true to yourself, dear innocence! But you will hav to suffer the consequences of your honesty. Prepare to meet your fate. And the poor sheep does suffer.

Kind reader, expose yourself to feel what the wretched sheep feels. The unhappy creature in question is a Jew—a being commonly called man—but the Russian law-makers hav not found out yet what species he belongs to, notwithstanding the fact that the Jews hav lived in Russia for many centuries. We all know that many of the greatest and best men of the world were Jews. The most illustrious poets, philosophers, sculptors, statesmen, etc., belong to that able race. Remember Spinoza, Heine, Börne, Lassalle, Marx, Beaconsfield, Mendelssohn, Rubenstein, Antokolsky, Rachel Felix, Sarah Bernhardt, and a host of others. And I hope none of you will deny that a Jew, as a rule, is not worse, if no better, than a Christian. Homo sum et nihil humani alienum puto.

Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter, as a Christian? if you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? and if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?

Three centuries hav gone since Shakspere wrote these immortal words. So Shakspere, though he lived in a barbarous age, understood very well the feeling of a Jewish heart, but to the Russian government it is still Greek. I venture to say that a Jew is treated worse than a dog. You cannot be too cruel to a dog, for there is a society for protection to animals, but there is no society for protection to Jews. A dog can migrate from one government to another without any difficulty; a Jew cannot. Almost all the Jews—with a very few exceptions—are obliged to liv in a penitentiary—that is, the northwestern part of Russia—at the gate of which are placed cherubim with flaming swords in their hands to keep the way of the tree of life, central Russia. Think of such an order of things! A Jew can liv and build a house in the government of Vilna, but he cannot do the same in the government of Pskoff. Is not that an infinit absurdity? But the government looks upon the Jews as upon some kind of a disease. It says to them: "It is bad enough to keep you where you are, but you must be kept at a far distance from healthy people, lest they get exposed to your disease. Your morality is very low; your honesty is very doubtful, and unless you put your trust in Christ we cannot tolerate you in our community."

Now, I do not mean to say that the Russian Jews are the salt of the earth. I am willing to admit that they are far from being perfect. But in the name of common sense I ask you, How can they be perfect? They are allowed to liv only in a few governments. If a Jew cannot make a living in his penitentiary, he must still be there, even if he starves to death. They cannot own land (I presume our dear old Mother Earth would get demoralized under their influence). All the paths of civil life, all the liberal professions, are closed to them. What, then, ought a Jew to do? Commit suicide? That is possible for an individual, but not for a whole nation.

Supposing, for argument's sake, the Jews to be vicious people, we can find an excuse for them; we should not forget they are followers of Jehovah, a cruel and revengeful god. But the Christians claim to follow the meek Christ, who told them to love their enemies. Are they models of perfection? How do the Christians of Russia treat the Jews, who are by no means their enemies? Only a few years ago in many cities they destroyed their houses and everything there was in them. Those worshipers of a loving and merciful God hav thrust daggers into the breasts of men and women. What hav those victims done? Oh, they committed the most terrible crime—they were Jews! The Christian love could not forbear punishing that. What else hav the gentle and moral Christians done? They hav violated mothers and daughters; they hav . . . but enough; their crimes are innumerable.

Do you wish to know how the government and the press hav styled these heartless crimes? "Anti-Jewish disorders." What a splendid expression! Hundreds of men killed and wounded; hundreds of houses destroyed; hundreds of families left without bread and shelter—and highly cultivated men call it "disorder." Oh, human degradation! Count Ignatyeff, then minister of interior, in his famous circular, printed in the Pravitelstvenny Vestnik, instead of explaining to the Christian people that destruction, murder, and adultery are not the bud and the blossom of civilization, rebuked the Jews for their unheard-of pretensions. What did they ask? Did the widows and the orphans ask the government to bring to life their husbands and fathers, murdered by the loving hands of a Christian mob? Did they ask it to take care of their sick, to build and repair their houses? No, they demanded justice; as subjects of the Russian government, they demanded protection of the law. Is not that, indeed, unheard-of pretension?

The common opinion is that in ancient times the Jews hav been persecuted for their religion. But now, in our progressiv age, they are persecuted for some "political and economical reasons." This I deny. Let us see.

The hypocrits of the Middle Ages of the past said: "Burn the Jew! He is an Infidel; he crucified our God." The Jew was burnt or banished, and his property confiscated. Now, if the Jew was put to death only for being a Jew, why not burn his property, too? But that has never been done. The king and the priest fraternally divided the Jew's property. O Shame! where was thy blush?

The hypocrits of the Middle Ages of the present say: "Throttle the Jew! We don't persecute him for his religious opinions. But he is a dangerous man; he is dishonest, immoral. Those are the reasons why we don't tolerate him."

Thus so long as the Jew remains a Jew—that is to say, so long as he is true to his honest opinion—he is an immoral wretch. But so soon as he is "converted" to Christianity—that is to say, so soon as he is willing to tell a lie in order to keep himself and his family from starvation—he becomes virtuous and the equal of any man. O Absurdity, thy name is Christianity! If a Jew is to be regarded as a monster an hour before his "conversion," how can he be a sinless angel an hour after his "conversion?"

Says Börne: "Admitting the Jews to be criminals, we should not forget that their crimes are, after all, human crimes, and the Christians may not be entirely faultless. Now, if human rights are not natural things, but rewards for virtues, why should bad Christians possess all the rights?"

You will find in the Russian code a number of laws allowing the Jews to exercise certain half-privileges. Is it not foolish, or at least useless, to allow a man something which is his natural right? But the Christian framers of the Russian laws took the ground that a Jew has no natural rights; ergo everything which is not allowed by the law is prohibited. Does it not mean that Jews are not human beings? If a Jew is a man, he should hav human rights. A man without human rights is no more a reasonable conception than a living being without a head. If a Jew is not a man, what is he, then? Won't some scientific men be so kind as to investigate that subject and find out what kind of an animal a Jew is? Try it, gentlemen, and if you succeed, science and humanity will be under everlasting obligation to you.

Such are the religion of love and the age of humanity.

How long will men find delight in torturing their fellow-men? Will the Middle Ages never fade away? Is there no hand to dig a grave for them? Alas! I cannot answer these questions. Nevertheless, let us wait and hope for the best. Let us hope that some time in the future a monument will be erected to their memory with the following inscription: "The Demon of Inhumanity. Killed by the Goddess of Liberty and Human Rights. Peace to his ashes!"

CLEMENS P. BERYLSON.

Purdy Station, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1887.

Blasphemy.

Extract from Colonel Ingersoll's Argument in the Reynolds case.

GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY: I regard this as one of the most important cases that can be submitted to a jury. It is not a case that involves a little property, neither is it one that involves simply the liberty of one man. It involves the freedom of speech, the intellectual liberty of every citizen of New Jersey.

The question to be tried by you is whether a man has the right to express his honest thought; and for that reason there can be no case of greater importance submitted to a jury. And it may be well enough for me, at the outset, to admit that there could be no case in which I could take a greater—a deeper interest. For my part, I would not wish to liv in a world where I could not express my honest opinions. Men who deny to others the right of speech are not fit to liv with honest men.

I deny the right of any man, of any number of men, of any church, of any state, to put a padlock on the lips—to make the tongue a convict. I passionately deny the right of the Herod of authority to kill the children of the brain.

A man has a right to work with his hands, to plow the earth, to sow the seed, and that man has a right to reap the harvest. If we hav not that right, then all are slaves except those who take these rights from their fellow-men. If you hav the right to work with your hands and to gather the harvest for yourself and your children, hav you not a right to cultivate your brain? Hav you not the right to read, to observe, to investigate—and when you hav so read and so investigated, hav you not the right to reap that field? And what is it to reap that field? It is simply to express what you hav ascertained—simply to giv your thoughts to your fellow-men.

If there is one subject in this world worthy of being discussed, worthy of being understood, it is the question of intellectual liberty. Without that, we are simply painted clay; without that, we are poor miserable serfs and slaves. If you hav not the right to express your opinions, if the defendant has not this right, then no man ever walked beneath the blue of heaven that had the right to express his thought. If others claim the right, where did they get it? How did they happen to hav it, and how did you happen to be deprived of it? Where did a church or a nation get that right?

Are we not all children of the same mother? Are we not all compelled to think, whether we wish to or not? Can you help thinking as you do? When you look out upon the woods, the fields—when you look at the solemn splendors of the night—these things produce certain thoughts in your mind, and they produce them necessarily. No man can think as he desires. No man controls the action of his brain, any more than he controls the action of his heart. The blood pursues its old accustomed ways in spite of you. The eyes see, if you open them, in spite of you. The ears hear, if they are unstopped, without asking your permission. And the brain thinks, in spite of you. Should you express that thought? Certainly you should, if others express theirs. You hav exactly the same right. He who takes it from you is a robber.

For thousands of years people hav been trying to force other people to think their way. Did they succeed? No. Will they succeed? No. Why? Because brute force is not an argument. You can stand with the lash over a man, or you can stand by the prison door, or beneath the gallows, or by the stake, and say to this man: "Recant, or the lash descends, the prison door is locked upon you, the rope is put about your neck, or the torch is given to the fagot." And so the man recants. Is he convinced? Not at all. Hav you produced a new argument? Not the slightest. And yet the ignorant bigots of this world hav been trying for thousands of years to rule the minds of men by brute force. They hav endeavored to improve the mind by torturing the flesh—to spread religion with the sword and torch. They hav tried to convince their brothers by putting their feet in iron boots, by putting fathers, mothers, patriots, philosophers, and philanthropists in dungeons. And what has been the result? Are we any nearer thinking alike to-day than we were then?

No orthodox church ever had power that it did not endeavor to make people think its way by force and flame. And yet every church that ever was established commenced in the minority, and while it was in the minority advocated free speech—every one. John Calvin, the founder of the Presbyterian church, while he lived in France, wrote a book on religious toleration in order to show that all men had an equal right to think; and yet that man afterward, clothed in a little authority, forgot all his sentiments about religious liberty, and had poor Servetus burnt at the stake, for differing with him on a question that neither of them knew anything about. In the minority, Calvin advocated toleration—in the majority, he practiced murder.

I want you to understand what has been done in the world to force men to think alike. It seems to me that if there is some infinit being who wants us to think alike, he would hav made us alike. Why did he not do so? Why did he make your brain so that you could not by any possibility be a Methodist? Why did he make yours so that you could not be a Catholic? And why did he make the brain of another so that he is an unbeliever—why the brain of another so that he became a Mohammedan—if he wanted us all to believe alike?

After all, maybe Nature is good enough, and grand enough, and broad enough to giv us the diversity born of liberty. Maybe after all, it would not be best for us all to be just the same. What a stupid world, if everybody said Yes to everything that everybody else might say!

The most important thing in this world is liberty. More important than food or clothes—more important than gold or houses or lands—more important than art or science—more important than all religions, is the liberty of man.

If civilization tends to do away with liberty. then I agree with Mr. Buckle that civilization is a curse. Gladly would I giv up the splendors of the nineteenth century—gladly would I forget every invention that has leaped from the brain of man—gladly would I see all books ashes, all works of art destroyed, all statues broken, and all the triumphs of the world lost—gladly, joyously would I go back to the abodes and dens of savagery, if that is necessary to preserve the inestimable gem of human liberty. So would every man who has a heart and brain.

How has the church in every age, when in authority, defended itself? Always by a statute against blasphemy, against argument, against free speech. And there never was such a statute that did not stain the book that it was in, and that did not certify to the savagery of the men who passed it. Never. By making a statute and by defining blasphemy, the church sought to prevent discussion—sought to prevent argument—sought to prevent a man giving his honest opinion. Certainly a tenet, a dogma, a doctrin is safe when hedged about by a statute that prevents your speaking against it. In the silence of slavery it exists. It livs because lips are locked. It livs because men are slaves.

If I understand myself, I advocate only the doctrins that, in my judgment, will make this world happier and better. If I know myself, I advocate only those things that will make a man a better citizen, a better father, a kinder husband; that will make a woman a better wife, a better mother—doctrins that will fill every home with sunshine and with joy. And if I believed that anything I should say to-day would hav any other possible tendency, I would stop. I am a believer in liberty. That is my religion—to giv to every other human being every right that I claim for myself, and I grant to every other human being, not the right—because it his right—but instead of granting, I declare that it is his right to attack every doctrin that I maintain; to answer every argument that I may urge—in other words, he must hav absolute freedom of speech.

I am a believer in what I call "intellectual hospitality." A man comes to your door. If you are a gentleman and he appears to be a good man, you receive him with a smile. You ask after his health. You say: "Take a chair; are you thirsty, are you hungry; will you not break bread with me?" That is what a hospitable, good man does—he does not set the dog on him. Now, how should we treat a new thought? I say that the brain should be hospitable and say to the new thought: "Come in; sit down; I want to cross-examin you; I want to find whether you are good or bad; if good, stay; if bad, I don't want to hurt you—probably you think you are all right—but your room is better than your company, and I will take another idea in your place." Why not? Can any man hav the egotism to say that he has found it all out? No. Every man who has thought, knows not only how little he knows, but how little every other human being knows, and how ignorant, after all, the world must be!

There was a time in Europe when the Catholic church had power. And I want it distinctly understood with this jury, that while I am opposed to Catholicism I am not opposed to Catholics; while I am opposed to Presbyterianism I am not opposed to Presbyterians. I do not fight people; I fight ideas; I fight principles, and I never go into personalities. As I said, I do not hate Presbyterians, but Presbyterianism—that is, I am opposed to their doctrin. I do not hate a man that has the rheumatism; I hate the rheumatism when it has a man. So I attack certain principles because I think they are wrong, but I always want it understood that I hav nothing against persons—nothing against victims.

There was a time when the Catholic church was in power in the Old World. All at once there arose a man called Martin Luther, and what did the dear old Catholics think? "Oh," they said, "that man and all his followers are going to hell." But they did not go. They were very good people. They may hav been mistaken—I do not know. I think they were right in their opposition to Catholicism—but I hav just as much objection to the religion they founded as I hav to the church they left. But they thought they were right, and they made very good citizens, and it turned out that their differing from the mother church did not hurt them. And then after awhile they began to divide, and there arose Baptists, and the other gentlemen, who believed in this law that is now in New Jersey, began cutting off their ears so that they could hear better; they began putting them in prison so that they would hav a chance to think. But the Baptists turned out to be good folks—first rate—good husbands, good fathers, good citizens. And in a little while, in England, the people turned to be Episcopalians, on account of a little war that Henry the Eighth had with the pope—and I always sided with the pope in that war—but it made no difference; and in a little while the Episcopalians turned out to be just about like other folks—no worse—not as I know of, any better.

After awhile arose the Puritan, and the Episcopalian said: "We don't want anything of him—he is a bad man;" and they finally drove some of them away and they settled in New England, and there were among them Quakers, than whom there never were never better people on the earth—industrious, frugal, gentle, kind, and loving—and yet these Puritans began hanging them. They said: "They are corrupting our children; if this thing goes on, everybody will believe in being kind and gentle and good, and what will become of us?" They were honest about it. So they went to cutting off ears. But the Quakers were good people and none of the prophecies were fulfilled.

In a little while there came some Unitarians and they said, "The world is going to ruin, sure;"—but the world went on as usual, and the Unitarians produced men like Channing—one of the tenderest spirits that ever lived—they produced men like Theodore Parker—one of the greatest brained and greatest hearted men produced upon this continent—a good man—and yet they thought he was a blasphemer—they even prayed for his death—on their bended knees they asked their God to take time to kill him. Well, they were mistaken. Honest, probably.

After awhile came the Universalists, who said: "God is good. He will not damn anybody always, just for a little mistake he made here. This is a very short life; the path we travel is very dim, and a great many shadows fall in the way, and if a man happens to stub his toe, God will not burn him forever." And then all the rest of the sects cried out, "Why, if you do away with hell, everybody will murder just for pastime—everybody will go to stealing just to enjoy themselvs." But they did not. The Universalists were good people—just as good as any others. Most of them much better. None of the prophecies were fulfilled, and yet the differences existed.

And so we go on until we find people who do not believe the Bible at all, and when they say they do not, they come within this statute.

A Growing Young Man.

From the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

Congressman John Wise, of Virginia, tells a good story on John E. Lamb, of Indiana, for whom he spoke during the late contest of the latter in his state. Wise did not know how popular Lamb was at home. He was on the cars going to Terre Haute, when a short Roman-nosed German turned about and said bluntly: "Be you a drummer?" "No," replied Wise. "Be you a traveler?" "No." "So," rejoined the German. "Then what be you?"

"I am here," answered Mr. Wise, "in a Democratic district, to speak in favor of the Republican candidate."

"You don't tell me you're going down to Terre Haute to make a speech against Schon Lamb?"

"Yes," said Wise, "I am."

"Mine friend, you make one mistake. Schon Lamb is one of the greatest men in the country."

"What!" replied Wise, with a smile, "is he greater than General Grant?"

"Yes, mine friend, he is greater as four Sheneral Grants."

"Not greater than Garfield?"

"Garfield was not a circumstance to Schon Lamb. Mine friend, Schon Lamb is the greatest man that ever lived."

"No!" said Wise; "you don't mean to say that he is a greater man than Solomon?"

"Ah! mine friend," rejoined the German, with enthusiasm, "I don't say that Schon Lamb is now a bigger man than Solomon"—and here he leaned over toward Wise and shook his finger solemnly in his face—"but, mine friend, Schon Lamb vas young yet."

Some Questions for Christians.

How can two different genealogies of a man be both true, and how can they affect his son when he is not his son's father?

How can the infinit be limited, and the immortal die?

Are the people to blame who do not see omnipotence in a man put to death for sedition? Is he the embodiment of love who brings not peace on earth but a sword?

Would a respectable minister nowadays, even a priest of Quebec, kill a man and his wife who refused to deliver up all their property? If not right now, why was it right in the days of the apostles?

Why is it that four men inspired by God to write the same thing should write four different stories? Who is to blame, God or the scribes, and why should we believe any of them? If our salvation depends upon believing the right thing, who is responsible for our damnation?

If Jesus wished to establish Christianity, why did he not devise its rules and establish the rites? Why did he not say that baptism and the Lord's supper, confirmation, penance, and extreme unction were necessary to the future enjoyment of heaven? Why did he not tell us whether, as the Protestants hold, faith is necessary to the efficacy of the sacraments, or whether, as the Catholics claim, the sacrament works independently of the state of the recipient's mind? Is it possible for a priest to go into a bread shop and turn all the loaves into the body, blood, soul, and divinity of Christ by saying over them, Hoc est enim corpus meum? Did Jesus authorize this to be done?

What did Dr. Luke mean by saying that his generation should not pass away till Christ should come in great glory in a cloud? Has not that generation gone, or has Jesus come and no one found it out? Why did Paul tell the Thessalonians that the Lord would come down from heaven and that those which were alive should be caught up in the clouds? Did this ever happen in Paul's time or since?

Is it necessary to establish the truth of a religion to say, 'Believe or be damned?' Would a mathematician expect to convince a man of the truth of a proposition by such means? And is God less powerful in argument than a mathematician? Can the truth of anything be shown by burning a man forever?

If being born of a virgin constitutes divinity, why is not Christna as divine as Christ? If the belief of a certain number of people that Christ raised the dead, that he was crucified, descended into hell, rose again, and ascended into heaven, whence he will come again at the last day—if all these prove Jesus to hav been the son of God, why does not the same belief by more people prove Christna to hav been the son of God also?

When Jesus said that he would make his apostles fishers of men, did he prophesy that they would be priests?

Why did not Mark corroborate Matthew as to the miraculous birth of Jesus? as to Peter's casting himself into the sea? as to the promis of the keys of heaven to Peter? as to the resurrection of the saints? as to the earthquake at the crucifixion? Was it because the writer of Mark did not believe the writer of Matthew, and did not expect to be believed if he related these trifling incidents? Did the authors of the gospels, like the theologians of to-day, lose confidence in each other as they became acquainted?

Why were several hundred gospels, each as good as the others, permitted by the Lord to delude people? Did he not know which he inspired? And how could a majority vote in a council decide divine authorship? If fewer bishops had voted for Luke's gospel, would that hav proved it *un*inspired?

If the Bible is revised every few centuries, and is essentially changed at every revision, without injury to the revisers, what is the use of the nineteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter of Revelation?

If Christians are sincere in adopting the teachings of Christ, why do they hav savings banks? Why do they take thought for the morrow? Why are civil engineers and laborers with pick-ax and shovel necessary to move mountains? Is there no church member with faith as big as a mustard-seed? Where do we find the Christian who will eat arsenic, or drink prussic acid, or handle rattlesnakes?

Why are the churches always on the side of the powerful? and how many votes does President Cleveland expect to get by his present to the pope?

If the first and simon-pure Christians had everything in common, why was Dr. McGlynn excommunicated from the church for preaching common property in land?

When these queries are answered, we hav some more to ask.

Dr. Schaff and His Concealments.

The statements of the Rev. Philip Schaff upon the comparativ extent of religious liberty allowed in France, Italy, and Spain are instructiv, but in the cases of France and Italy somewhat misleading. Mr. Schaff has achieved fame as a painstaking student of historical theology, and was for that reason made president of the American committee for the revision of the New Testament. We do not think that he would wilfully misstate facts, but when he condenses the story of present France, as to her attitude toward religion, into twenty-six words—"the spirit of the French republic is strongly anti-clerical, and tends toward a separation of church and state from hostility to, rather than respect for, religion"—he is guilty of concealing much more than he reveals.

It is true that the spirit of the French republic is Atheistic, and it is true that its rulers are hostil to religion. But this attitude springs solely from the misconduct of the church herself. The church was responsible for the French Revolution, and it is more than doubtful if the Reformation would hav stayed it, so miserable was the population under the misrule of the priests and the aristocracy. Since that period the effort of France has been to reduce the power of the church. The effort has sometimes been apparently suspended, only to be resumed under republican government. The rulers of France are imbued with the spirit of the Encyclopedists, the geniuses of the eighteenth century who stirred the people of two continents to demand freedom. The last third of the last century was a period when the aspirations for real liberty took tangible form. The debt this country owes to France for our Revolution is still unacknowledged. Certain it is that to Paine and Jefferson we owe our comparativ immunity from theological rule, and who knows how much they were inspired by the thought of French heretics of the time? France is thoroughly skeptical to-day, so far as she is educated. The governing classes are radicals, and subsidize the churches simply that they may be controled. By that means a hold upon the ecclesiastics is maintained, for churchmen will submit to much for a little money in hand.

The true state of Italy, too, is concealed by Mr. Schaff. The statesmen to whom he pays tribute were not only indifferent to religion, but were hostil to it, and desired, so far as they could, to replace the states of the church and the political divisions of Italy by a nation with a secular government. Protestantism has but little hold upon the Italian people, and the government policy toward the Catholic church is that of a conqueror to his foes. When the Italian people leave the religion of their childhood, they generally become Rationalists, and there are many Freethought societies in Italy. As in France, a large proportion of the educated and wealthy classes are Infidels.

The condition of religious affairs in France is as satisfactory as can be expected, considering that one hundred years ago the church had the nation by the throat, and considering, too, that slaves but slowly learn to use their freedom aright. Italy is also doing well. One or two decades is too short a period to exhibit startling changes. The lives of nations are longer than the lives of individuals, and twenty years is not much. Italy is growing.

Spain and Portugal are not civilized countries, and never will be till they lose about nine-tenths of their religion.

Is There No Repression?

Our esteemed contemporary, the Ironclad Age, announces its editorial policy in these words:

"It ought to be known by this time that the Ironclad Age denies the existence of legal restrictions upon legitimate free speech in the United States of America. Every man is a million times free to preach and print in decent language whatever he believes. The man who believes there is restriction upon free speech in this country should leave it of his own volition or be made to on the double quick. Nor are there any restrictions upon the mails that cripple the freedom of publication. No decent loyal man can justly say that restrictions are placed upon the freedom of his speech or publication. He may rail daily in the streets against the government and the laws and all its officials, from constable to president, and he may print detraction and slander against the government by the wagon-load and the government itself will freely dispense the rubbish to the uttermost limits. The people are free; speech is free; the mails are free. Hence it is useless to send articles here lamenting the slavery of the people, the muzzling of free speech and the press, and the tyrannical restrictions upon the mails. Such articles are not in accord with the purposes of this journal, and they are false, pernicious, and infamous."

We wonder if these statements are true? We wonder if C. B. Reynolds will agree with Dr. Monroe? We wonder if Mr. Reynolds was not mobbed and arrested at Boonton for saying that the Bible is untrue? We wonder if his trial at Morristown never occurred? We wonder if Colonel Ingersoll's argument against prosecutions for blasphemy is all wasted words? It makes a very substantial pamphlet, but perhaps it is not real after all. It can't possibly be, if "every man is a million times free to preach and print in decent language whatever he believes." Are there no restrictions upon free speech in this country?

Was D. M. Bennett's arrest and imprisonment a myth? To us it seems very real, and we hav Dr. Monroe's own words for saying that it was cruel and without cause. Are there no restrictions upon the mail, when for putting a pamphlet into the post-office a man is sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment in a penitentiary?

Are the people free when men are imprisoned for working on Sunday, or when a man cannot get justice in a court because he does not think as the Christians do? Ask James Percy, of Bloomfield, N. J., against whom a verdict was rendered only three weeks ago, because his testimony was refused for the reason that he does not believe in future rewards and punishments—ask him if the people are free! Ask the tailors who were fined by police judges of this city last summer for working between Saturday night and Monday morning if the people are free!

Ask Dr. E. B. Foote if the mails are free! Ask E. H. Heywood—and remember that Dr. Monroe certified to the purity of "Cupid's Yokes"—if the mails are free! Look over the blasphemy laws of the various states of this Union and then say, if you can, that "legal restrictions upon legitimate free speech in the United States of America" do not exist! Must the man who reads those infamous and savage statutes be made to leave the country on the "double quick?" Read the Sunday laws, count the dollars forced from their violators, and then say, if you can, that the people are free! Read of the legal disabilities placed upon Atheists in about half the states of the Union, and then say, Dr. Monroe, that the people are free. Can Colonel Ingersoll lecture in Delaware on Sunday without paying a fine? Is speech free in that state?

Oh, yes! The people are free—if they do what the Christians desire. Speech is free—if you pay your fines for talking, and the judge is afraid to imprison you. The mails are free—if you hav $3,500 in your pocket, or don't mind a year or two in jail. And hence, of course, certainly there need be no protests against blasphemy laws, against Sunday laws, nor against Comstock laws! Such protests are wasted and are false, pernicious, and infamous! And those who don't think so should leave the country on the double quick.

But what a pity it is that Colonel Ingersoll should hav wasted four or five hours talking to a Jersey jury when there could hav been nobody on trial—for speech is not restricted in the United States, where every man is a million times free to preach and print in decent language whatever he believes!

The Tremendous Difficulty.

In a recent Sunday issue a daily paper of this city considers the problem of education and religion, and finds it of "tremendous difficulty," which appears the greater the more it is discussed. The position of the Roman Catholic church in regard to it is well-known, and our contemporary finds that the Protestants are gradually adopting the same views. President Seelye, of Amherst, the late Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, and other Protestant theologians of distinction are cited as condemning the divorce of religion and education, and the late actions of Protestant bodies are quoted. In October last a committee of the Presbyterian synod considered a resolution urging "the incorporation with the course of state and national instruction of the following religious truths as a groundwork of national morality:

"1. The existence of a personal God.

"2. The responsibility of every human soul to God.

"3. The deathlessness of the human soul as made in the image of God, after the power of an endless life.

"4. The reality of a future spiritual state beyond the grave, in which every soul shall giv account of itself before God, and shall reap that which it has sown."

The committee's report—which we commented upon at the time—recommended "the inculcation of such principles of dependence upon God and obligation to him as are essential to sound learning, safe character, and wholesome citizenship." In 1882 the evangelical ministers of Boston appointed a committee to consider the same subject, and in 1886 the Presbyterian synod of Illinois adopted resolutions declaring that "the teaching of Agnosticism or Atheism in our public schools, directly or indirectly, is as truly the teaching of a creed as the teaching of Deism or Christianity," and that the "studious ignoring of the Christian religion in the text-books of our public schools, and the practical Agnosticism of the same, is untrue to the origin of our school system and inconsistent with its history," and "dangerous to the morals as well as the faith of our children, and ought no longer to be tolerated by the people of our states."

All this our contemporary finds to be identical with the claims of Romanism, and the impossibility of reconciling the two great sects, or even the minor sects of Protestantism, constitutes the tremendous difficulty visible to its eye. Besides, "there is a large and increasing part of the public who do not want to hav their children instructed in even the fundamental articles of religion common to Catholics and Protestants, and who would rather prefer that, as in the Paris public schools, even the very name of God should be excluded." And in a country like this, it adds, where there is no state church, and where not even Christianity is recognized as a state religion, it seems to be impossible to logically and justly enforce any sort of religious teaching in schools supported by general taxation. If, therefore, the different churches regard such teaching as an imperativ necessity, apparently the only course for them to take is to set up schools of their own. But then would come up among Protestants also, the question which has been raised by the Catholics, as to whether the state can rightly compel people to contribute to the support of schools of whose instruction they disapprove; and the permanence of the whole public school system would be endangered.

The bugbear which is thus conjured up is more apparent than real. There is actually no tremendous difficulty about the problem at all. The state can maintain strictly secular schools for the benefit of those who choose to take advantage of them. Those who do not so choose can support schools for themselvs. To divide the school funds among the different sects would be to go back instead of ahead. Education, when controled by religion, never amounted to much. The most ignorant periods of the world hav been its most religious periods.

Let the public schools be devoted to secular instruction, and religion be left to the parents. That removes the tremendous difficulty of the education problem.

The Woman Suffrage Council.

The National Woman Suffrage Association has called an International Council of women for March 25th to April 1st, inclusiv, to be held in Albaugh's Opera House, Washington, D. C. This council is in part to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the "first public demand for equal educational, industrial, professional, and political rights for women" made at Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1848. The object of the council will be an interchange of opinions on the great questions now agitating the world, by which it is hoped to rouse women to new thought, intensify their love of liberty, and giv them a realizing sense of the power of combination.

This is well, and we wish the ladies good luck. Women do not now hav the influence in state affairs to which they are entitled. They are taxed, but hav no voice in expending the money taken from them. They are ruled, but hav no choice of rulers. They must submit to law, but can say nothing as to what the law shall be. The most ignorant male Roman Catholic in the country, who has lived here five years, can help elect our officers, while the most magnificent examples of female intelligence must remain dumb. The coarse and brutal African, with hundreds of years of slavery and ignorance darkening his mind, can vote for the man he desires to tax and rule him, but the queens of literature, the mothers of heroes, the tender teachers of love and benevolence, are powerless to help make their own government. Yet they are persons, individuals, as independently as men. They are not side issues, or worthless sprouts growing at the root of masculinity. They hav brains and hearts, intelligence and love, and can govern themselvs as well as men. Their right to do so is as natural and inalienable as is the masculin right.

We hope, however, that this council will not allow itself to be dominated by priests. We hav no respect for the victim who persists in licking the hand of his master. The influence of the church has kept woman in her subordinate position more than any other one agency. She has been its support and its slave; its stanchest friend, and its most trifling plaything. And until she breaks loose from it she will stay where she is. Many of the leaders of the suffrage movement already recognize this, and the idea is growing in the minds of the rank and file. Realizing this fact, and dreading the loss of their most submissiv victim, the ministerial leeches hav fastened upon the movement, and seek to control it. The last public assemblage of woman suffragists in this city was so permeated with piety that many Freethinking supporters of the movement—who could remember when a woman suffragist was held by the church to be as infamous as an Infidel or Abolitionist—were forced to leave the hall, or stuff handkerchiefs into their mouths to keep from laughing at the silly orators. Imagin Helen Gardener or Elizabeth Cady Stanton under the infliction of prayer by some little minister just fitted to take the infant class in a Sunday-school!

We wish the woman suffragists good luck! Even and exact justice demands the enfranchisment of their sex. But it will be too bad if, after masculin government has crawled from under the pulpit, it is to be seized and thrust back again by those who hav suffered most from its rule.

The Brutal Society.

Anthony Comstock's society held its annual meeting on the evening of the 17th instant, at the Young Men's Christian Association hall. The usual number of ministers were upon the platform, and after the usual prayer Comstock read his usual report. He growled the usual growl at the authorities who would not do as he requested; denounced, as usual, the people who thwarted his legislativ projects; paraded the usual number of tons of obscene literature seized, and gave the audience the usual speech on the viciousness of art and the depravity of mankind in general.

However, the meeting was enlivened by the presence of Lum Smith, who, when Comstock denounced him as a notorious liar, jumped up and shouted back, "I'll denounce you, you villain!" Comstock angrily called upon Police Superintendent Murray, who was upon the platform, to arrest Smith, but Mr. Murray merely told that gentleman to keep quiet. Mr. Smith at once subsided, but when the meeting adjourned he was found upon the sidewalk distributing copies of his Herald containing matter derogatory to the character of Comstock as a gentleman and a Christian. Britton, the little red-headed Jew employed by the society, ordered Mr. Smith to consider himself under arrest, but that individual declined to so shape his thoughts, and asked for the authoritativ warrant. Britton caught Mr. Smith by the collar, but was pushed off, when the crowd, which was thoroughly in sympathy with Comstock, having been selected with that view, threatened to duck Smith in the snow. But a big policeman happening along, the ducking scheme fell through, and Smith escaped from the pious supporters of Saint Anthony.

Every year Comstock's society is getting more and more into disrepute, and it requires strenuous effort to obtain sufficient funds to support it. At this last meeting Kiliaen Van Rensselaer, the wobble-jawed treasurer, made a pathetic appeal for cash, as did Samuel Colgate, the soap-boiling president. Comstock deplored the fact that thirty-one artists of the city had signed a petition praying for the suppression of himself, and pathetically remarked that "our enemies are numerous." The National Defense Association seemed to be the thorn that penetrated his side most deeply, and he called its members "ex-convicts, abortionists, and Freethinkers." Comstock can hold a successful annual meeting only by distributing his tickets to superannuated rakes who hav joined the church, bigots like Colgate who desire to superintend the morality of the city, and hypocritical young Christians who cover up their deviltry with pretensions of piety. The Men of the city despise him; the press ridicules him, and public sentiment condemns him. If he will only continue his career of tyranny and interference with reputable professions a year or two longer, he will be effectually sat upon, and the charter of his society will be in imminent danger.

Editorial Notes.

THE ministers of Columbia, S. C., hav denounced the Columbia City Club as a "gambling hell." Among the members of the club are Governor Richardson, Senators Hampton and Butler, and many other eminent public men.

THE Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, who resigned from his church in Newark recently because he is no longer a Congregationalist, says: "The doctrin of the brotherhood of man is dead in the churches. I mean the church as an institution. The church recognizes the aristocracy of money and of birth. It caters to wealth, and culture, and distinction. The work that the church is doing will, if it is persevered in, break down the notion of the brotherhood of man, and some fine morning some man will run a blue pencil through the Declaration of Independence. Already we hav college professors who declare that all men are not created equal."

THE fifth anniversary of Mr. Shaw's society at Waco, Texas, reveals a very satisfactory state of affairs. The society is constantly growing in numbers and influence, and without any disciplinary authority, without any arbitrary plan of assessments, and entirely free from all credal environments, the association has maintained its individuality, its independence, and progressed morally, socially, and intellectually in the same ratio as other and much older organizations. The deluded people, says Mr. Shaw, who believe that the worship of God and Christ, as preached by a hireling clergy, is necessary to good morals and a correct social status, are puzzled to account for the progress made by this creedless association. The only thing that Mr. Shaw regrets is that the movement has confined itself so strictly to one locality, whereas there ought to be hundreds of similar organizations throughout the state. He hopes that by the end of another five years there will be many sister associations to celebrate their progress in this rational reform.

THE Baptist Weekly regards the Sunday newspaper "as the most effectual foe the pulpit has to contend with," and thinks that "the pastor who can secure the pledges of his congregation to shut out the Sunday press and all sensational secular reading on God's day and secure the time heretofore worse than wasted for edifying reading, will add immeasurably to the power of his Sabbath ministry." But the Rev. A. F. Hewitt writes in the Catholic World that "at present heresy and rationalistic philosophy are not the most formidable antagonists to be encountered. The really dangerous foe is a form of unbelief which professes to be science, though it springs from, and conducts to, by the avowal of its adepts, nescience; is in principle Agnostic, and leaves to the intellect nothing but a bewildered, despairing stare at the unknowable. The dangerous importance of this enemy of all Theism and all Christianity is to be measured, not by that which it really is in itself, but by that which it appears to be in the apprehension of a multitude who are attracted or overawed by its pretensions."

Letters from Friends.

McCune, Kan., Jan. 2, 1888.

Mr. Editor: I want to say to my Liberal friends, Let us all try to pay up promptly and keep the banner of Free-thought in the air. I say, Long liv The Truth Seeker; long liv Watson Heston. Those pictures are worth volumes, and I think they get better all the time. We hav our share of Christians here with us, but lately one of the leaders in the Christian church forged the names of several of his friends and church brethren to notes, drew on several banks to the amount of $3,000, and has skipped; and a Presbyterian that is very religious (in his way) drew money on forged paper, but the matter drifts along smoothly. Wishing all the noble Liberal workers a long and happy life, I am,

Yours in the cause of truth, M. S. Gowin.

St. Louis, Mo., Nov. 22, 1887.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed find twenty-five cents in stamps, for which please send me a Truth Seeker Almanac of 1888, which I observe in the last issue of The Truth Seeker is completed. I am a constant reader of The Truth Seeker, and am delighted to say that it is the best paper in the country for the object in view.

The cartoons especially serve as a teacher. If seen by any orthodox, they cannot help realizing at once that they and their teachings are far behind the true teachings of to-day. The pictures, though without words, take hold and shake a man up pretty badly, but by seeing them again and again, any man will realize that the truth, and nothing but the truth, is represented in both pictures and the columns of the valuable paper. A man who once starts to read The Truth Seeker cannot help but leave the dark dungeons of the church and follow the new light until he becomes a Liberal.

Yours very respectfully, A. F. Lange.

Adrian, Mich., Jan. 6, 1888.

Mr. Editor: It is not possible that finite man can giv the true solution of the origin and destiny of humanity. The man or woman who does not believe in a future existence has no right to say to those who think they hav an immortality that they are wrong. The fallacy of orthodox futurity is very apparent to the mind not trammeled with superstition and the orthodox nightmare. It is a more agreeable thought that when the body becomes unfit or incompetent to retain the mind and dissolution takes place, the part called thought still livs, than the uninspiring belief that death ends all. The best disseminators of Secularism say they don't know. Neither do we know that we liv in the future, but the thought is more agreeable and ennobling. One writer says thought is simply a production of the physical impression upon the brain. In my opinion that is too absurd to be entertained for a moment. It is not worthy of notice.

I think monstrous the theory of equality advocated by some writers, that I, being a thrifty, industrious citizen, must share with my neighbor, who may be a shiftless, lazy, good-for-nothing character, and that should I refuse he may burn my property or do mortal injury to myself and dear ones who compose my household—that he may become an incendiary or a murderer to carry out the equal distribution theory.

Another writer says it is time—speaking of the condition of Secularism—to reach out for the control of government affairs; in fact, to nominate a man for president who will carry out the principles of our sect. Does the writer know creeping comes before walking? If government affairs were conducted by any one sect, where would the rights of outsiders come in? It is right as it is. It is governed by no sect or religious body. If controled by any one single dogma, all others would be wrong and would hav to take a back seat. It is conducted for the interest of all as it is now carried on. Be content; you cannot better it, except it might be a little more Liberal in some respects. There are a class who would not acknowledge any government but brute force. There are many of this element who would not hesitate to cut your throat or mine for a dollar, and think nothing of it, only to get the dollar. Happily there is a petard to hoist all such scum who go about with inflammatory designs to stir up deviltry.

Freethought is a grand thing, and its ethical teachings are humane and philanthropic. The old orthodox devil will be obliged to disappear under the persevering dissemination of Freethought and Liberalism. O. S. Barrett.

INFORMATION WANTED ABOUT JOHN WESLEY.

Oleander, Dec. 17, 1887.

Mr. Editor: One of The Truth Seeker correspondents, in a letter published in The Truth Seeker two weeks since, spoke of "the adulterous John Wesley." As I had been brought up a Methodist and had not learned that trait of his character, I wrote to this correspondent (Geo. H. Bethard, of Burlington, Kan.—formerly a Methodist preacher). He informs me that the fact is quite extensivly known in Georgia, where Wesley was missionary for a time, and suggests that, if asked, The Truth Seeker would look up the facts and giv us reliable information. Mr. Bethard states that while traveling in Georgia he learned—the fact is freely talked of there—that John Wesley was indicted for adultery, and that the judge tried to bring him to trial, but that Wesley evaded a trial and went back to England.

It seems ungracious to inquire about the errors of so distinguished a man as John Wesley so long after his death; but if he is to be named as an adulterer in the columns of The Truth Seeker, the readers of The Truth Seeker would like to know whether this is an unfounded slander or veritable truth. As he was in Georgia in colonial times, the indictment and record, if it exists, would probably be at the state capital.

D. M. Bennett, in his "Champions of the Church," does not mention Wesley. He mentions Luther at considerable length, and severely, but does not mention the fact given in Michelet's Life of Luther, and in his own words, that the year before Luther's marriage he had "three spouses," etc. See Michelet's Life of Luther, chap. v, p. 131. When the evangelical sects were organizing in New York not long ago to rear a statue to Luther's memory, it occurred to me that that fact should be inscribed on the pedestal. When we are called on to worship the heroes of the church we hav a right to ask about their real characters.

I often see Luther's "Table Talk" quoted (Bennett quotes it), and I hav tried to obtain a copy of it, but when I get it it proves to be an expurgated edition.

I would like to obtain one unabridged. If you hav it, or can get it conveniently, please send it to me.

Yours very truly, N. J. W.

Williamson, Dec. 29, 1887.

Mr. Editor: Find inclosed $5 to pay my subscription for another year, also for one new subscriber. I hav been trying to work up another or more subscribers to the best paper extant. The Truth Seeker is a terror to churches and priests, and, in fine, to all the cohorts of bigotry and superstition.

I was born of honest parents and in poverty; reared in iniquity, because I was reared in the church. When I was a boy old Satan came around, and, after a long pettifogging scheme concocted by the church and its cohorts, I was seduced into the church at the age of eighteen years. Walked with the members, cheek and jowl, for two years, when, as the Dutchman says, I begins to smell a mouse. First, one of the deacons closed a chattel mortgage on a poor man's cow; sold it from a poor man, woman, and three helpless children.

That stuck in my crop, and I asked my father if that was all right according to religion? The old gent says, "I guess not." Next there was a complaint against the preacher that he had been a little too familiar with some of his congregation. All this time I was acting as second to the poor slimy cuss—blowing and striking for him through the revival. After a little, things began to develop.

Gossip became plenty, and I, with a few others, became somewhat seldom. The deacons came to visit me, and said if I would return to the fold that I could just as well become a preacher as not. I was somewhat like the fellow that was a-going to be hung; and when the sheriff asked him if he had anything to say, his reply was, "I prefer it not." When we had to pay the preacher from fifty to one hundred dollars per annum, feed from one to five every day in a year on yaller-legged chickens, cream biscuit and honey, baked potatoes, and all the other varieties that a good woman could think of, and support church-meetings, donations, revivals, and missionary meetings, I began to think of something else besides religion.

My! Mr. Editor, I hav raked buttons enough off my vest, etc., driving roosters from under the barn to feed preachers on, to stock a respectable tailor shop, and all we got for it was a few questions in relation to our souls; read a chapter, then get down and tell the Lord what a good meal they had been the happy recipients of, and then ask the blessings of the Lord direct upon us all, and close the scene by lying, saying it is all for Christ's sake, when they had the whole benefit. Two years' experience in any church is enough for any thinking person, and many are leaving in this vicinity. The churches, preachers, evangelists, and all others that can do anything to keep the cheat alive are at it; still, the sensible people are leaving, and the cause of mental liberty is coming very fast. A. G. Austin, M.D.

Block, Kan., Jan. 1, 1888.

Mr. Editor: I feel as though a few lines from this country would not be out of place in The Truth Seeker. It is very seldom I see anything in it from these parts.

I feel as though I had been going to school for seven years, but when I think, the school has been coming to me once a week, in the shape of The Truth Seeker, as I hav been a subscriber for that length of time.

I hav closely watched all the articles in the paper, and must say that some of the writers are a little fanatical, but the most of the communications are good. I am of the opinion that no person able to read can help being bettered by a careful perusal of The Truth Seeker.

I particularly admire the articles under the editorial head, but must say that I believe Mr. Jamieson is right in regard to debating with Braden. While I do not in the least doubt that Braden is a rascal, I believe the Christians generally indorse him, and him whom they indorse it is our duty, I believe, to meet in debate, even if we would not hav a thing to do with him in any other way. I had the pleasure of listening to part of the debate between Mr. Jamieson and Braden at Paola, and must agree with Mr. Jamieson that Braden is more brainy than either Cook or Talmage.

It is the men of intellect our lecturers want to meet in debate. Why do we want to put such men as Messrs. Jamieson, Underwood, Ingersoll, and a host of others against a hollow-headed preacher or set of preachers? Even if their morality is good, what would we gain? I say, let our lecturers meet Braden in debate every time they hav an opportunity, and do as Mr. Jamieson did, charge only half as much as Braden does, so as to enable the few Liberals around each little burgh to employ a debater every time such a sky-pilot as Braden or any of his ilk comes around, and in time the lecturers will reap their reward. If the Liberals around Paola—and, for that matter, every other city of its size—were able to hire a good debater twice a year and hav such a debate as the Jamieson and Braden debate, they would soon grow till they would be able to hav regular lecturers and debates. And until our debaters say, "Collect what you can; I will be there to debate with Braden or the devil," we will make slow progress, from the fact that some of the Liberals are not very liberal and others are very poor.

I want to say, Keep right on publishing every letter or communication that has a good idea or moral in it. Do all you can to enlighten mankind. Don't think that nothing is being done in these parts, for we are every day adding to our lists, but money is very scarce. We hav failed raising crops till some of us are about to choke down with debt.

Yours truly, W. A. Lowe.

Ford Co., Kan., Jan. 1, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed please find $6 for two copies—one to Thomas B. Van Voorhis, Spearville, Kan., the other to your humble servant. I will take this opportunity to say that there are a few good Liberal, thinking people in this county, and especially in Dodge City. There are a goodly number there, but orthodoxy is in a large majority. But they seem to feel safer by having a Liberal in their council, knowing he will do what he can to keep the others straight. But it will keep him busy. The people of the county hav elected a Liberal for one of their commissioners, who will do all he can to hav the business attended to properly. The people feel safer by having a few of them mixed in, rather than trust so much to those Christian people who are reared on the flesh and blood of the innocent beasts, and at the Lord's Supper are made to believe that their bread and wine is the blood and flesh of their Lord and savior Jesus Christ. They are made to believe by that Christian doctrin that they may rob Smith, kill Jones, and seduce their neighbors' wives, and receive forgivness by asking some person whose flesh they hav eaten and whose blood they hav drunk to cancel their sins from the record. Oh, what cannibals! And all cannot be told in one lifetime. We hav a young red-headed rooster who has been preaching the Howling Methodists' doctrin, and by his infamous statements dethroned reason from the brain of several of his hearers. What can't be done by the devil?—or perhaps that's too good a name for the sky-pilot. There was a time when it was thought to be a credit to be a church-member, but that day has passed and gone, and the day of church-building is near its end. The time is near at hand when we shall see them turned into school-houses and temples of education and science where pure truth, good-fellowship, and the person doing the most good for his fellow-man will be the most honored and respected. That's my doctrin. When each one shall be rewarded in this world for the good he does, let the next world look after itself; in other words, let the dead bury the dead.

I would like to find The Truth Seeker in every house.

Lathrop, Mo., Jan. 2, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed please find $4—$3 to renew my subscription, and for the remaining $1 please send me a Truth Seeker binder.

Now, if the court please—excuse this blunder—the Lord willing; i. e., if the Hon. Editor and his satanic majesty (the first school-master, see Gen. iii, 5) hav no objections—we would like to speek in meeten, and tell what the Lord—as above—has done for us. It—The Truth Seeker—has taken our mud-hooks from the horibel pit and miery clay of orthodoxy and set them upon the rock of ages—of reason and common sense—yet to come. We feel, brotheren—hallelujah!—like congratulating ourself on making our escape from the horrid nightmair and spuke-jungle of heathen—Christian—superstition.

A sojourn of upward of six months in this city enables us to say that perhaps this is the most fanatically religious community the sun ever shone upon—excepting, however, Messrs. Loeb and Mandelstein, who are intelligent Liberals. All others are, notwithstanding the illuminating rays of science, reason, and common sense, wallowing in the quagmire, hog-wallow, and filthy old goose-pond of superstition. Hence they think of little else but to run to the joss-house, day and night, week in and week out, and month after month—no let up. Therefore one hears men, women, and children (especially the latter), at home, in the highways and byways, singing pious songs, Sunday-school slop, for Christ's sake, which forms a mammoth Salvation Army, and, with the doleful clanging ding-dong of the church bells, is very annoying to us and demoralizing to the people, but must be endured, seeing it's all for Jesus, who commands his followers to swap shirts for a sword (Luke xxii, 36).

We are happy to inform you that we hav made the acquaintance of Dr. Toothcarpenter, a very promising young man—i. e., promises to yank teeth from the hash receptacle of the people and shekels from their pockets—but wofully gone on spookism, hence he believes that joss-houses and Bible-thumpers are good to hav around and in the family. We also had the honor of making the acquaintance of Professor Woodbutcher, a dealer in wooden overcoats. He had the kindness to inform us that we were unfit for his holiness to converse with, from our non-stockholding propensities in his mythical God and other hobgoblins. Therefore it behooves us, whilst meandering the intervening space from the club-room to our humble domicil, to keep an eye oblique, lest some pious devotee of the Gods, under cover of the darkness, should treat us to an eggnogg of stale hen-berries and soil our raiment.

When we take into consideration the modus operandi of educating the young, this aversion to the so-called Infidel is to be expected. For instance, the pious mother brings her child upon its knees; directs its eyes to heaven—wherever that may be—and has it mumble the so-called Lord's prayer. Then, as soon as it can toddle, it lies away to the Sunday-school, where it receives from its sanctimonious teacher a more substantial diet—such as the bear story, the fish tale, the snake yarn, etc. Then the parson, with the clerical force-pump, crams into the young student the entire contents of the Jewish and Christian pill-bags, when the victim becomes a graduated intolerant bigot and liar for the glory of God (Rom. iii, 7). Hence it becomes impossible to eradicate it from the minds of the unreasoning, ill-informed masses.

In conclusion, we would suggest giving especial attention to the source of this evil; make a specialty of the mental slaveholders, the drones in the human hive.

Fraternally yours, L. CHUTE.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., Jan. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mundus vult decipi, etc. This was a forcible suggestion to your correspondent on witnessing the procession or parade of the faithful adherents to the Catholic church in this city on Sunday afternoon last. You probably hav had your share of the same in your cosmopolitan city, where probably different elements and manifold nationalities are represented. This being the case in the Alamo City, it was but natural that the procession was unique in its formation and make-up. Immediately after noon-time the main plaza in front of the Spanish cathedral was thronged with spectators of all ages, conditions, and nationalities, while marshals were busily engaged in locating and placing in position the manifold organizations. The caravan started at last at 3 P.M. from the bishop's residence. It consisted of the greatest mixture or conglomerated make-up ever beheld in this city, of religious societies of the various churches, Celtic, Czechic, Slavic, Spanish, Italian, German, Mexican, and a large number of the "to-the-manor-born" American element, not to speak of the numerous smaller representations. The procession consumed twenty-five minutes in passing any one point. It was a curious sight to see the brass band of the S. A. Fashion Theater, a variety show, do duty in the parade. However, "the cause sanctifies the means." Wherever the carriage of the right reverend bishop passed he was seen to make the sign of the cross as a benediction, his lips moving. Who can tell but that he uttered the words at the head of this article?

We are about to start a club of science-loving people here, the name of which has not been determined yet, and for this purpose I would ask you or some club in your city to send me a copy of a constitution and by-laws for guidance in organizing. Your correspondent is a proscribed character, owing to his plain, outspoken ideas against Bible, religion, and their whole immense fraudulent make-up in duplicity and falsehood.

As is well known, the Prohibition question was defeated in this state by a large majority some time ago. But many counties hav local option within their lines. Among them is Bee county; on the day preceding Christmas only one hundred and fifty jugs went to Beeville on the train. They all were sealed and contained soda and mineral waters. Is not this hypocrisy personified? H. BREUSING.

LEXINGTON, KY., Dec. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to inquire into the nature and origin of the power which our president possesses of appointing individuals to fill certain offices. But my object at present is to observe that the state calls loudly for a humane officer to remedy all defects which the law fails to provide for, and this in the way of progress, perfecting and even constructing faculties for those who govern, suggesting modes of action to suit the meanest of living beings. There is nothing to hinder the president from offering $4,000 to a competent person whose duty it shall be to look after the interests of poor children, attending to their education, support, and moral condition. Guardians should be appointed in every town to see that this design is faithfully carried out. A wealthy man should be disgraced who passes by a suffering child on the street without attempting to improve its condition.

Great efforts are now being made to raise money for the heathen. It is said that one cent paid by a Christian will convert a heathen child, while twenty-five will bring a civilized man into the church. How much will it take to restore liberty and prosperity to the poor, degraded Sandwich islander, whose lauds were taken, whose trade was destroyed, by the pretended reformer? Who will raise poor Africa from her enslaved condition? Why are not intelligent artisans, and business-like teachers, sent out by this government to aid the heathen, who would gladly enter into their plans? Let presidents and queens travel about to do some good, instead of playing the fool and wasting the substance of the people on their own luxury.

Taxes should not be reduced on whisky and tobacco, but on the necessaries of life, and perhaps a wholesome fear of the elements which now assert themselvs as factors in politics will giv a new character to this question. Perhaps now the poor will obtain a hearing, and their rights will be respected. Earnest-hearted Anarchists hav possibly gone too far. Who can blame such men, who resemble St. Columban standing in the presence of a king, alone and fearless, lifting his emaciated arm and denouncing him for his cruelty, shameful neglect of duty, prodigality, selfishness, and indifference to the wants of his subjects?

The following are facts in the United States: Loads of provisions are sent to families who are not really destitute, while the helpless poor are ordered to go to work. These persons are then left in their misery, called tramps and beggars, while their children are degraded, and kept at work without education or encouragement.

I heard Professor Fluno lecture last night on the faith cure and kindred topics. He traces everything good, first principles and all, to a Gothic chieftain, called God, a magician, who dwells in the seventh story of the universe. This chief praised himself for a long time, and being weary of this, spoke into existence a lovely giantess, called Nature. She raised her delicious eyelids, and with sweet glances, awoke beauty and harmony everywhere. God then went to sleep. But Nature never missed him; she has evidently a mind of her own, for, in sunshine and storm, beauty and calamity, immensity of force or tenderness of sympathy, she asks no favors of anyone. The sleeping God is nothing but a ghost, and if he created anything, it must hav been the devil, for an adverse influence sometimes mars Nature's delightful plans, and this was the origin of evil, no doubt. But the lecturer made no such admissions, though it is plain that God is a thief, and silently steals his powers from Nature. He said: "There is no strength in a muscle, no feeling in a nerve, but by God." So, then, the brain is a wheel, and prayer is the energy which brings a force to move and affect it. This is the jargon which finds favor with gullible simpletons.

And with regard to Mayor Hewitt, who is no doubt an honorable man, he sees now the difference between sowing and reaping. Nature's causes will hav their way, though rocks are rent, and governments scattered to the winds.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Jan. 7, A.S. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed stamps, and send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 288. I hav at last become the happy possessor of a this year's miracle, for which I am hopelessly indebted to Christian science. Doubtless you know that here, in this military home, there are hundreds of arms and legs wanting. Now, a Christian scientist from away back—God knows where—appeared like the morning star in Milwaukee last week. The news of his arrival spread rapidly. Now, one of our fellows minus a leg—shot off above the knee—had wanted it back for nearly a quarter of a century; and, being aggressivly pious and having faith equal to a ton of mustard seed, mounted his crutches and sped for the scene of action. We found the professor in a large hall, fitted up expressly for Christian scientific purposes. High seats were arranged along the walls for the afflicted, while the multitude stood in the midst and looked on. The professor had his coat off, and, reeking with sweat, had rolled his shirt-sleeves up to his shoulders, in open defiance of the Comstock law. He was healing the wounded, curing the sick, giving sight to the blind, and with lightning speed, while the halt and lame jumped for joy at this marvelous sight. He had restored over ten thousand within half an hour, saying to each, "Take up thyself and walk."

At last it came my friend's turn, and it seemed to me that this new-leg business would require extraordinary attention; but it didn't, for the spirit of the Lord came mightily to the aid of the professor, and he spoke as one having authority. He asked my friend, in thunder tones, this question: "Do you believe that there is anything impossible with our Lord and savior Jesus Christ?" The man answered, "I believe," and added, "Lord, help thou mine unbelief." Hereupon the professor grabbed the cripple's crutches, broke them into slivers, and consigned them to the flames in the stove. In an instant, like a meteor, the man shot from his perch, and landed upon his feet in the midst of the awe-stricken multitude. There he stood firm as a rock; he had recovered his leg and foot.

Now, just as he had finished rolling up his pants as far as he could, to convince himself and those who had known him since the war, and, just as the professor was charging him with the old charge, "Tell no man," Comstock broke in the door, and arrested them both in their shameful nudity of arms and legs.

Thus ended one of the grandest and most holy shows known to Christian civilization. It beats Talmage's petrified man, and is equaled only by God's youngest son while engaged in the liquor monopoly in that gay little city, Cana in Galilee. Yours truly, NELSON HUNT.

BAVARIA, KAN., Jan. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been thinking about writing to you for a long time and letting our Liberal friends know we are alive and doing well.

Since writing before we hav had Brother Remsburg here two or three different times, and he is a host in himself for the cause of Freethought; any of our friends wanting a Liberal speaker that surprises the orthodox hearers will do well to send for him, as he is good and sound.

The Methodists hav been holding meetings here for about six weeks, and I hav not heard them boasting about their success. They hav caught a few suckers, but I do not think they hav caught any jayhawkers. What they hav got so far hav never been very bad. A majority of their converts were of very tender age and of Christian parents. But they all count for Christ. Some hav been members before, and others experienced religion—as often as their beloved minister shakes hell before them they are taken with the power, and that lasts as long as it takes them to get it.

Several hav been sick on account of the excitement, but they are a heap better now, as one of them expressed it to me the other night, and he 'lowed there was a right smart chance for the minister to do a powerful sight of good here if they would only keep that Remsburg away.

The Methodists are going to build a church here to cost $1,300, and they hav it all raised now but $1,175, so you see they are doing well.

Friend Remsburg spoke here November 11th and our school-house was crowded, although the minister told them to keep away and had a prayer-meeting that night so as to keep them away. They were obliged to adjourn their meetings that night so we could hav the house. A large number of our Liberal friends were here from Salina; among them our old Liberals Judge Osborn, Dr. Hauser, J. M. Itten, W. Kesler, and Mr. Sawin, of the Journal. Come again, friends, and may you hav better success next time in starting a Secular Union in Salina.

Our number has been broken by death for the first time in the death of Sister Mott, one of our charter members, who died November 21, 1887. She left here to go to Iowa to visit her mother, and left in good health, but was taken sick as soon as she got home and never left her bed after that, and what seemed must be all pleasure to her proved her death. She leaves one child and her husband, besides her many friends, to mourn her loss. Friend Putnam will remember and sympathize with Brother Mott, as he made their home his while here.

The Bavaria Secular Union met on the evening of January 1st and passed resolutions in regard to the death of Mrs. Mott. Yours fraternally,

T. H. TERRY, Secretary Bavaria Secular Union.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to hav some learned theologian answer for me one question, which is always a Chinese Wall between me and his God. The question is as follows:

The preachers say they know that some almighty created this world; further they say that if a person doesn't obey the laws of that almighty creator, that person will be punished in the hereafter for violating the laws of his maker; now, where under the sun did they get that knowledge?

"From his book that he gave to his chosen children on Mount Sinai we know him," they say.

But who or what will testify to the validity of that book?

"The greatness, the divinity, of the Bible show that it was inspired by God," they assert.

If this assertion is good proof to anybody, it doesn't prove anything to me. In fact, that book looks to me so defectiv, so one-sided, that if really God is the author of it I would ask him to retire from his throne and let some wiser and more just being manage the affairs of this world. Besides that, is it wise or good policy to depend entirely on the testimony of so interested a thing as the Bible is in its own cause?

"Oh, yes! There are a good many witnesses who will testify to the holiness and godly work of the Bible; Moses, the prophets, and the apostles testify to it and command us to believe so."

But who is Moses? Who are the prophets and apostles, if not the very authors of that Bible? And does it not look rather suspicious that the book testifies of the authority of its author and the author testifies to the validity of his work?

It looks to me altogether a put-up job. The priesthood endeavors to force upon the ignorant the belief in a book which, in return, upholds the authority of the priests on the believers; and I hardly believe that any sane judge and sound-minded jury would giv much credit to such kind of evidence in a civil or criminal case.

True, some sharp lawyer may, by using some sophistry, force upon a simple-minded judge and ignorant jury that kind of worthless testimony, and make them believe in the existence of a supreme being, who inspired the authors of the Bible; but what of punishment? Where is the consistency of a great God and punishment? Is God a perfect being? Of course he is. Does he know what is going to happen in the future? Of course he does. If his prophets knew what would happen after centuries, he must necessarily know what is going to happen after thousands of years. He would not be perfect if he did not. Correct. Now, then, did God know before I was born that I would be born on such and such a year, month, day, hour, minute, and second? Of course he did. Did he know that I would be so poor as I am, or so rich as I am? Did he know what my occupation would be? Most assuredly. Could I alter anything in this line of his knowledge? Could I become a statesman if he knew before I was born that I would be a shoemaker? Of course not. Does not that mean that his previous knowledge of my becoming a shoemaker will keep me in a shoemaker shop working at that trade notwithstanding my earnest desire to sit in the White House and make laws for the people? Yes, it does. Well, did he know before I came to this world that I would not believe in the teachings of his preachers? Of course he did. Could I alter that knowledge of his? Can I be a good, religious man if he knew before I was born that I was going to be wicked? Of course not. Now, I ask, in the name of common sense, why should I be punished for my actions which I could not alter, even if I had a desire to? Is it not cruel and unjust to create a person to be wicked and then to punish him for not being virtuous?

The truth is, you can't make God and hell work together, for if a man is to be punished for his actions he must be set at liberty to do as he pleases, and if a man is a free agent you must admit that God did not know what that man is going to do, and if you take away from him that knowledge he cannot be perfect. If he is not perfect, he is no God.

On the other hand, if he is perfect and knows everything, then a man is not a free agent, but must act as it is prescribed to him by the perfect knowledge of his great creator, and as a matter of course there is no cause for punishing him.

This dilemma is always a barrier between me and religion, and I earnestly ask all the preachers, priests, and rabbis who are preaching God and hell to their simple-minded flocks to try to solve this dilemma for me.

If they will answer this question to the satisfaction of sound logic, I will bow down my Infidel head and will try to be saved. If they will not answer it, I will remain in my belief—that they know about God and hell just as much as I do; and that it is a pity we hav not a good, substantial hell, for it would be the fittest place for all parasites and impostors. INFIDEL.

"Between the dark and the daylight,

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Farmer John.

Home from his journey Farmer John
Arrived this morning, safe and sound.
His black coat off, and his old clothes on,
"Now I'm myself," says Farmer John;
And he thinks, "I'll look around."
Up leaps the dog: "Get down, you pup!
Are you so glad you would eat me up?"
The old cow lows at the gate to greet him;
The horses prick up their ears to meet him;
"Well, well, old Bay!
Ha, ha, old Gray!
Do you get good feed when I am away?"

"You have't a rib," says Farmer John;
"The cattle are looking round and sleek;
The colt is going to be a roan,
And a beauty, too; how he has grown!
We'll wean the calf next week."
Says Farmer John, "When I've been off,
To call you again about the trough,
And watch you, and pat you, while you drink,
Is a greater comfort than you can think!"
And he pats old Bay,
And he slaps old Gray:
"Ah, this is the comfort of going away!"

"For, after all," said Farmer John,
"The best of the journey is getting home!
I've seen great sights—but would I giv
This spot, and the peaceful life I liv,
For all their Paris and Rome?
These hills for the city's stifled air,
And big hotels, all bustle and glare;
Land all houses, and roads all stones,
That deafen your ears and batter your bones?
Would you, old Bay?
Would you, old Gray?
That's what one gets by going away?"

"There money is king," says Farmer John;
"And fashion is queen; and it's mighty queer
To see how, sometimes, while the man
Is raking and scraping all he can,
The wife spends, every year,
Enough, you would think, for a score of wives,
To keep them in luxury all their lives!
The town is a perfect Babylon
To a quiet chap," says Farmer John.
"You see, old Bay—
You see, old Gray—
I'm wiser than when I went away."

"I've found out this," says Farmer John—
"That happiness is not bought and sold,
And clutched in a life of waste and hurry,
In nights of pleasures and days of worry;
And wealth isn't all in gold,
Mortgage and stocks and ten per cent,
But in simple ways and sweet content;
Few wants, pure hopes, and noble ends;
Some lands to till, and a few good friends,
Like you, old Bay,
And you, old Gray!
That's what I've learned by going away."

And a happy man is Farmer John—
Oh, a rich and happy man is he!
He sees the peas and pumpkins growing,
The corn in tassel, the buckwheat blowing,
And fruit on vine and tree;
The large, kind oxen look their thanks
As he rubs their foreheads and strokes their flanks;
The doves light round him, and strut and coo;
Says Farmer John, "I'll take you too—
And you, old Bay,
And you, old Gray!
Next time I travel so far away!"

Why I Am a Liberal.

I hav read much in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last three years of the thoughts or writings of many people on the subject of Freethought or Liberalism; then I hav attended Sunday-schools and hav had my lessons; then listened to the explanations of the teachers and superintendents. I could, in many places, see a different meaning attached to the same words, or verse, which set my mind to work. I soon felt a doubt as to the truth of much we were being taught. Then in comparing the lives of the apostles in the Bible and Christians generally with the lives of good, kind men who claimed to be Liberals, I could see a great difference. Those who claimed to be Christians on Sundays and at Sunday-schools seemed to be grasping for money and using all sorts of little foolish devices to get us small boys and girls to go among the people to beg for five or ten cents, etc. It lookcd as though they, the leaders, were ashamed to do as we were asked to do. I got disgusted with the plan and had to tell my teacher why. I did not want to go on the streets with small jugs, etc., begging for pennies. I was told that my heart was full of pride, and that was very sinful. I thought I was not alone, for many were very richly dressed and it seemed to us as if pride filled a greater part of the hearts of those present. Then I would read some of the chapters and verses I found in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which made me feel happy and manly; I found many verses in the Bible that made me ashamed to read to read to my parents or to my grandparents, with whom I liv; I learn by the example set by the first that it is better to show love and kindness to those who are here on earth with us than to be always trying to make a good bargain with Christ or God and try to get to heaven ahead of some who are just as good as they, and more human. By reasoning and by reading I seem to feel that the churches are a sham—there are so many sorts. There is a warfare between them. That tells the story plainly. I can see the church is a sort of popu'ar place to spend an hour or so in; to visit and show off. I see I shall never be contented with them. I am looking for something more in harmony with nature as we see it in the beasts and birds and with the children; we love them all and sympathize with the human family when sickness or death overtakes them, or their friends. I like to do to others as I would like to hav them do to me under the same circumstances. I feel to be right and just, and it shows a spirit of Liberality. A passage which seems to me far from inspiration is the fourth chapter of Ezekiel, verses 11, 12. And then to think of the stories that the folks try to make the children believe about Jonah and the whale, Noah's ark, Elisha and the bears eating forty-two children, and similar silly tales! I don't believe that they are true.

FRANCIS B. CORNWALL.

Correspondence.

DENVER, COL., Dec. 30, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wish to thank you very much for your remark under my very "bookish" letter, and shall try very, very hard to deserve it.

I send a short article on "The Brain," which I shall like very much to see in our Corner.

I am sure there are a great many of us who know a great deal more than I do on this very interesting subject, but I am also quite sure that there are a few who may learn a little by reading this sketch. With much love, LAURA PRICE STEWART.

[Thanks for the article. It is so well written we hav placed it in the Science Column.—ED. C. C.]

MONTEZUMA, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav seen so many little girls and boys writing to you in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I hav wanted to write you for a long time. You seem like an acquaintance to me. I hav one brother seven years old. We go to school every school day, but not to Sunday-school, for pa says we should learn facts, not fables. So we spend our Sundays riding on the ice, or with whatever we can find to amuse ourselvs.

I will bid you good-bye for this time, hoping to see my little simple letter in print. I also hope to meet you face to face some day, and if the Christian religion is true (which I think is horrible), what a nice little school you will hav when we meet in those fiery domains! I will stop now by sending my love to you and all the little truth seekers.

Yours truly, MABEL M. TRAVER.

OHIO, Jan. 5, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: As I saw my last letter in print, I thought I would try my hand again. If you had had all the letters that I made effort to write, you would hav a letter every week, and sometimes two. I hav the "Story Hour" and the "Little Lessons for Little Folks." I read the Children's Corner and think very much of it. I know you must be very sorry on account of your mother's death, because a boy's best friend is his mother; and I think it is a girl's best friend, too. I go to school every day, and we hav a good teacher. His name is Clem Fox; but I am not afraid of him, for I am not a chicken.

Dear Miss Wixon, this card is for your New Year's gift.

Though dogs delight to bark and bite,
We only wish your New Year bright.

Yours truly, EDITH BROWN.

[Edith has our thanks for the pretty card. —ED. C. C.]

CANON CITY, COL., Dec. 29, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Since so many hav written to the Children's Corner, I thought I would try. I am nine years old. I go to school; like my teacher, and like to go to school.

Mr. Jamieson, Dr. York, and Mr. Putnam hav lectured here. We expect Mr. Reynolds in about three weeks. I was sick when Mr. Putnam was here, so my mother, my sister Dena, and myself didn't hear him lecture. I liked them all better than any preacher I hav ever seen.

I am a Liberal because I think it is the best plan. I think no one knows anything about God or heaven, although the girls at school claim to know all about him.

My five-year-old sister Dena wants to know who took care of the first baby. Can any of the little boys or girls tell her?

One day she and one of my older sisters were at the home of a Methodist preacher who livs near us. My oldest sister and one of the girls were talking of a railroad that was to be built through here, and something was said about its going through certain houses and land. Dena said: "Yes, and if it would go right through our house people would say, 'That is just good enough for those old Infidels!'" She got excited because I wrote that; she says she doesn't want Miss Wixon to know about it.*

Grandpa Pickard is the oldest Freethinker here. He is almost eighty-eight years old. He used to be a Methodist preacher. We laugh a good deal about Mr. Heston's pictures.

I will now close, wishing all of the friends a happy New Year. Good-bye.

Your friend, LULA LOCKE.

* It is all right, Dena. Probably that is just what they would say.—ED. C. C.

BRUNSWICK, GA., Jan. 4, 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: At the beginning of a new year I hav made it a rule to think of the past one, which is gone never more to return—to think what I hav seen, learned, suffered. and enjoyed. Most naturally I also think of the friends of mine who fifty-two times visited me during the year—THE TRUTH SEEKER with its Children's Corner. I also think of those who giv their time and labor for the best paper in the Union. You, Miss Wixon, do not the least to bring it to my mind heartily. I wish to thank you for the many pleasant hours you hav given me and for all the good you hav done to myself as well as to the large number of children who weekly read your columns with delight and interest, both for their educational as well as their moral improvement, and as long as your present friends will liv, they will never forget the good you so unselfishly hav done them. May you continue to edit our Corner and be rewarded by a happy and bright new year.

As you hav been so kind to publish my last letter, I think that also this time my lines will be fit to be published. Although I do not exactly belong to the children, I think that we never cease to learn, and as long as we are young belong to your Column.

Brunswick is a small town of about eight thousand inhabitants, of which about half are colored. It has the usual per cent of churches and Sunday-schools; and in addition a Youug Men's Christian Association was started here a few weeks ago. Not very far from the city one can see the grand Atlantic in all its glory, and many a pretty shell its rolling waves will throw on the sandy shore. Two islands are guarding the harbor. On the first there is a lighthouse and a large saw-mill, and the last is the property of a wealthy New York club, who hav made a paradise for hunters out of it; and deer, quail, partridges, and ducks are in abundance. The harbor is formed by the Turtle river, and considered very good. From all parts of the world vessels come here and carry away the surplus of rosin, spirits of turpentine, and pine lumber, to those places which are in need of it. One sometimes can see Spanish, English, Norwegian, German, and American flags at the same time; and all languages nearly are spoken here. Pine lumber goes mostly to Buenos Ayres, and rosin and turpentine to Europe. We also ship cotton from here to England, and just at present two large steamers are loading about ten thousand bales of cotton for Liverpool. The main streets are Bay, Monk, and Newcastle streets. The principal attraction is the Oglethorpe hotel, which will be opened in about two weeks from date, and which was built at a cost of some $100,000,. The people hav the best hope for a grand boom, and I should not be surprised if they should get it. Hoping that my letter is not too long, nor unsuitable, for the Corner, I remain,

Your and the children's friend,
FRED L. HOFFMAN.

[We thank our friend for kind wishes and his interest in the Corner, where he is always welcome.—ED. C. C.]

With a Moral.

"What's a fool-killer, ma?" asked little Johnny.

"Go and ask your father, my dear," she replied with a sneering intonation. "He knows everything."

"A fool-killer, my boy," returned old Brown, glancing slyly under his paper at his wife, "is a little thing called a cigaret."—Judge.

A Brighter Prospect.

"Ah, my little man," said the benevolent-looking old gentleman, "I see you hav been busy at the blackboard."

"How d'ye know?"

"I see chalk on your fingers, and I am glad to see it. It shows that you are coming up in the right way."

"You bet I am. I ain't got quite 'nough muscle to roll the big balls fur ten-pins yet, but I'm a daisy with the little ones at nine-pins."

JOHNNY: "Mamma, make Minnie put some c'lo'ne on my handkerchief, too." Minnie: "No, mamma; it is full of holes and ain't worth a cent."

The Brain.

"What curious substance hav you in that vessel?" asked Society, meeting a stranger coming out of the dissecting-room. "Brains," replied Truth. "Brains which I hav just taken from a poor dead scholar." "Let me look at them," said Society eagerly. "I never saw any before. Let me look at them; how are they worn?" "In the head," replied Truth. "Out of sight?" asked Society. "Entirely." "Take them away; I hav no use for such ornaments." And so Truth went on into the college with her brains, and Society went on her way without any.

The foregoing is a fable from THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 24th. And now let us follow Truth into the college and examin the student's brain also, while Society may go her way.

We shall see that it is composed of two parts—the cerebrum, or "big brain," and cerebellum, or "little brain." And there are also several smaller organs.

This brain substance is quite soft, so that the protection afforded by the skull and hair is readily appreciated.

It is also enveloped in several membranes, which also protect it, and by which it is furnished with nutriment.

There are but two animals whose brains are larger than man's—the whale and elephant.

The brain of man averages fifty ounces, although Cuvier, the great naturalist's, weighed sixty-four and a half ounces.

Now let us examin the cerebellum, which occupies the front part of the head.

It is divided by a sort of cleft into two parts, called hemispheres.

These hemispheres consist of "gray matter" on the outside and "white" on the inside, and are in turn divided into crooked furrows called convolutions, by means of which, while occupying a small space, a greater surface is obtained.

It is quite wonderful that, were it not for these convolutions, the brain would cover four square feet.

The deeper the convolutions are, the more gray matter there is, and therefore the greater brain power.

In the lowest animals and very young children the convolutions are very shallow, and scarcely visible; but, as the child grows older and thinks and sees, the gray matter increases and forces itself down into the white.

And now we will examin the cerebellum, which occupies the back part of the head, and is composed also of gray and white matter.

It differs, however, in its mode of arrangement, for the furrows are not crooked, but parallel, and the gray matter, forcing itself into the white, givs this part a branch-like appearance – hence, "tree of life."

And now we must discover the use of each of these parts.

The cerebrum is the most important, as it is the organ by means of which we see, feel, hear, taste, and smell, and also the "seat of the mind."

The nerves are cleverly compared to telegraph lines, which carry all sensations to the brain.

The sole use of the cerebellum is to control the muscles, for it was found that when this portion of the brain is diseased, one's movements are uncertain as those of an intoxicated person.

And now we will leave the college, and when we meet Society and tell her the Truth's brains were very wonderful and interesting, I wonder if she will not join us in another visit to the college some other day.

LAURA PRICE STEWART.

QUESTIONS.—Of how many parts is the brain composed? What serves as protection to the brain? How is the brain nourished? The brain of what animals are larger than man's brain? What is the average weight of the human brain? Describe the cerebrum. Tell all you can of the cerebellum. State the uses of each.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by Talmageism.

"All who die in infancy go straight to glory."
"Whoso believeth not shall be damned."

My reverend frieud, if what you teach be true,
Bless Herod, who so many children slew.
Yes, canonize him, as far more divine
Than all the saints that in church history shine.
Hang no one who shall free an infant's ghost,
But giv a prize to him who murders most.
Let Freeman, of Pocasset, who did slay
His child, the Lord's dread prompting to obey,
Beyond all Christian fathers honored be,
Till one kill more of his own babes than he.
Let mothers fear no offspring's hellward slide,
But cheat the devil by infanticide;
For children that grow up, depart then hence,
Must all be damned if blest with common sense.

Is the Cathedral Possible?

From the Real Estate Record and Guide.

There are so many "level-headed" men interested in the project to build the Protestant cathedral that one is forced to hesitate before concluding that they hav embarked on an impossible enterprise. They are not the men who would foster a chimerical undertaking. They must hav carefully calculated what means there are to the end in view, and those means they must consider adequate.

And yet a great many architects can't help doubting the possibility of carrying out Bishop Potter's magnificent plan, as outlined in his letter to the public, and further indicated by the site recently purchased. It seems to belong more to the realm of things devoutly to be wished for than likely to be accomplished.

In the site at Morningside park we hav data for calculations. The committee purchased a plot of land there, 614.6 and 696.6 feet on the avenues, and 782 and 599 feet on the streets. Presumably the intention is to cover this adequately, for so expensiv a piece of ground was not purchased for a parish church. The "fitness of things" will require an edifice of dimensions not much less than 200x400 feet. A building of this size, treated with some magnificence and built honestly, without the numerous shams which architecturally disgrace the Fifth avenue cathedral, cannot be erected for less than $10,000,000. This is simply a minimum estimate, leaving the true figures to be as much greater as they may be. They will depend upon the sort of building determined upon. A hundred millions might be spent, and yet the structure would be inferior in magnificence to many of the eastern cathedrals; but for less than ten millions we would hav merely a large church something like St. Patrick's—a cathedral in name only. If what Bishop Potter has said means anything, this is not exactly what the Episcopalians are striving for.

Now, where is this minimum of ten millions to come from? The chief hope seems to be fixed on the pocket-books of half a dozen or more of New York's richest men. Many think that William W. Astor's donation of $100,000 will not be greatly exceeded, if at all, by that of any other individual, and I believe that at the very most the equivalent of twelve such subscriptions, or less than $1,500,000, will represent the contribution of Dives to the Protestant cathedral. And the remaining $8,500,000——? Doesn't it seem hopeless? The first half million or more might come easily enough, but the millions at the tail end would hav to be drawn from the "millions"—from the "public," who hav taken nearly a century to erect the monument to Washington, and who, in spite of strong appeals, are not moving any faster in the matter of the Grant memorial. In these cases only a few thousand dollars are required; with the cathedral, millions. Moreover, there is nothing to warrant us in supposing that an appeal in the name of religion will be more successful than one in the name of patriotism and the memory of the dead. The soul within religion to-day is not faith, but doubt. The fervid, activ belief that animated men in the cathedral ages exists no longer; whatever there is really vital in religion at present is the element that doubts and wavers—that clings to the old because it is not sure of the new. There is nothing in this to insure a spontaneous reply to an appeal for a vast sum of money.

In company with myself, a great many architects think that Bishop Potter will be forced to do one of two things—sell part of the plot purchased and greatly diminish the size and splendor of the cathedral, or, having laid the foundation stone and perhaps built the chancel, leave the rest to posterity and time. Architects, possibly more than any other body of men, recognize that the building of a great cathedral would be one of the chiefest glories in the history of New York. But to wish for a thing ardently doesn't make it possible; though it often raises the imagination to a point where facts are no longer seen in their true dimensions. ARCHITECT.

The Religious Destiny of America.

From the American Catholic News.

A Prostestant journal of Boston winds up a long and calumnious article on the Catholic church in the United States in the following language: "It is time for us as liberty-loving men and women to awaken to a full sense of the impending danger to our free America. The time may not be far distant when, wearied with endeavors to conciliate the Catholic church, we may at length draw the sword and repress by uncompromising measures the men who, under the cloak of religion, would disturb the peace of the world."

The admission that an attempt has been made to "conciliate" the Catholic church is a confession of weakness and decay, and an acknowledgment of the strength and growth of the church. As for drawing the sword itself, the Catholic church is not afraid. It is built upon and is the embodiment of truth, and truth is powerful and will prevail. We would kindly inform all agencies of evil and untruth that this country was designed by God for a great Catholic people. Catholics discovered it and Catholics explored it, and if we were to adopt the style of reasoning of Protestant publicists and preachers—which we do not—we would say that the sects are interlopers and like people who come in the night.

Tares grow among wheat and a great lesson is taught thereby. The weed points out by comparison the soundness and life-saving properties of the wholesome grain. So the weeds of heresy point out all the more clearly and forcibly the true and soul-saving principles and doctrins of the Catholic church.

The ten million of good and faithful Catholics of this country are fully alive to the importance of the mission before them, and they mean to carry it out with intelligence, zeal, and courage which springs from a consciousness of the right and holiness of their cause.

Already has Protestantism in this land proved itself a miserable failure and a soulless creed. It is a gilded corpse, and the gilt is supplied by men and women who want an easy code of morality. The stern, uncompromising code of virtue and honesty would be uncomfortable to them. Deacon Gilliland, who visited New York to purchase the counterfeit money with which to cheat his rustic neighbors, was a fair representativ of the hypocrit which false creeds produce.

The public schools, like Protestantism, hav also proved an utter failure. Not alone hav they taught no morality, but they hav not taught at all, for the census shows that there is a larger percentage of ignorance among nativ-born persons than among the immigrants who are so detested and maligned in certain quarters, and against whom the Congress of this alleged free and enlightened republic is now engaged in making proscriptiv and penal laws.

The conditions and requirements for Catholic teaching, secular and religious, are here, and it is here that the Catholic church will hav its fullest and most beautiful development. The intention of God in this matter is clear to any observant mind, and we would advise our sectarian friends not to fly in the face of God's omnipotent will.

A Cowboy Felled by Lightning After Rebuking a Blasphemer.

From the Kansas City Times.

"The average cowboy," said a cattle-dealer last night at the St. James Hotel, "does not bother himself about religion. The creeds and isms that worry civilization are as a sealed book to the ranger, who is distinctivly a fatalist. He believes that when the time comes for him to go over the range nothing can stand death off, and no matter what danger he faces previous to that time no deadly harm can come. The arch destroyer of the boys is lightning. More cowboys meet death from this source than from any other.

"One night, when a party of us were driving a herd across the Staked Plains, we had hardly made camp when a fierce storm, accompanied by terrific thunder and lightning, settled overhead. The crashes of thunder fairly shook the earth, and lightning seemed to dance from the tips of the cattle's horns. You see, when the cattle become wet, the steam arising from them forms a body of superheated air that rises upward two or three hundred feet. In the absence of a tree, mountain, or any better conductor, the lightning runs down this column of heated air. It is then almost sure to be attracted by the steel guns and trappings carried by the cowboys.

"Well, that wild night the whole gang were kept busy preventing a stampede. One of the party was Woods, as good a man as ever saddled a broncho. Jim had a premonition that his end was near at hand. All day he had been talking about his old mother back in the East and the girl he used to go with. It was a sure sign that Jim had the blues. Well, when the storm broke, Jim went about his work with a white face and listless manner. In the gang, and stationed next to Jim, was a young Texan, loud-mouthed and blasphemous. Every time a loud peal of thunder sounded and the lightning flashed unusually bright, the young bravado raised his clenched fist to the sky and muttered a volley of oaths.

"'Go on, yer old pelter, ye can't hit us. We're thunderproof, we air.'

"As quick as thought Jim pulled up alongside the sacrilegious scamp, and, pulling a six-shooter, shoved it into the blasphemer's face. His face was white as chalk as he screeched: 'Git around on the other side, ye miserable skunk, er I'll shoot ye full of lead. Ye can't include me in none of your defis. My time's comin' soon enuf without 'speshully invitin' it. Now stampede.'

"The Texan fairly flew, and not a second too soon, for the flash of lightning and the thunder crash that followed took the soul of Jim Woods along with it. One of the boys hurried to the spot, and found Jim and his pony stiff and dead."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

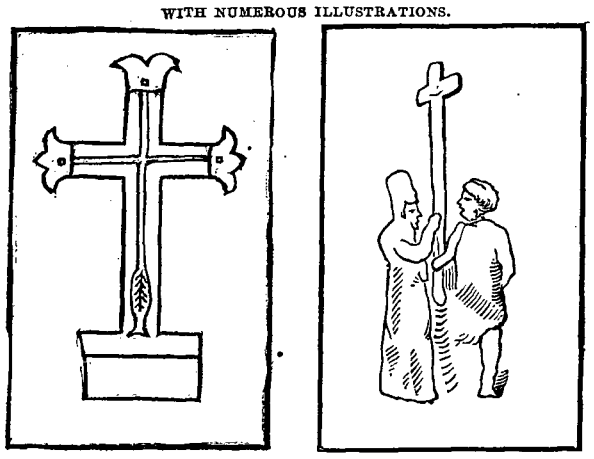
BIBLE MYTHS;



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiqnity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

News of the Week.

CLEVELAND and Hill seem likely to be the contestants for the Democratic presidential nomination.

SPAIN follows the example of the other powers by ordering new military supplies for 25,000 men.

THE Massachusetts legislature has passed a resolution to submit Prohibition to a popular vote in 1889.

LATER reports from Dakota and adjoining states place the number of lives lost in the late blizzard at 1,000.

LAST Sunday Socialists attempting to hold a meeting in Trafalgar square, London, were arrested by the police.

THE troops occupying the frontier provinces of Austria number 38,000; of Germany, 98,000, and of Russia, 315,000.

ENGLISH literary and other societies giv as a reason for neglecting to celebrate Byron's late centenary "his immorality as a man and as a poet."

OUR pensions excite bitter controversy, some clamoring for enlargements and some for reductions. They now require $80,000,000 yearly.

RUSSIA is projecting vast schemes for the development of her Asian territory, including the building of several railroads to and into China.

TEMPERANCE speakers affirm that "every respectable man has been driven out of the liquor traffic, which is now carried on by the lawless class."

MAYOR HEWITT in his official message to the New York aldermen exposes and denounces the extensiv corruption of police courts and political wire-pulling police justices.

THE number of New York saloonkeepers who did not pay money enough to the police in their negotiations for exemption from the excise law, and therefore were arrested last Sunday, was 96.

DISOLOSURE is made of a partnership between the contractors and storekeepers of the New York aqueduct now being constructed, for the purpose of oppressing and swindling the wretched employees.

MR. O'BRIEN says that "the action of the English government in prosecuting priests shows that the hope of muzzling them in their National League advocacy by means of intrigues at Rome has failed."

A DAUGHTER of Commodore Vanderbilt, Mrs. La Bau, who is a Spiritualist, denies the report that she has been swindled by two fraudulent Boston mediums, to whom she was reported to pay $1,000 a seance.

To celebrate the release of Mr. O'Brien, the imprisoned member of the Irish National League, meetings and bonfires were held throughout Ireland. At Kilrush the government proclamation prohibiting the meeting was publicly burnt.

AGITATION and violence prevail among the Scotch crofters, who are suffering destitution from overcrowding on their scanty holdings of land, and ask that part of the lands reserved for deer forests and sheep walks shall be leased to them for cultivation.

NATHAN MORRIS, proprietor of the museum at 21 Bowery, New York, on the 17th pleaded guilty before Recorder Smyth in the general sessions court to breaking the Sabbath by exhibiting monkeys on Sunday, and was fined $50. His monkeys will hereafter work six days a week.

EUROPEAN news of the day consists principally of a pleasing class of intelligence of which these may serve as samples: Russian troops are massing in Galicia; British cavalry, among recent new disciplin, are directed in the future to "cheer while charging;" Krupp is making some guns to be bigger than any present big guns—and so on ad infinitum.

A BILL introduced in the Kentucky legislature in the interests of heredity, well intended but loosely and unpractically designed, prohibits "marriages with an idiot, lunatic, paralytic, pauper, vagrant, tramp, drunkard, gambler, felon, feeble-minded person, or anyone rendered physically helpless and unfit for the marriage relation, any person with violent temper, or who has for one year previous been a frequenter of any immoral house, or has been divorced for such causes."

Odds and Ends.

IT isn't necessary for a man to know enough to go in when it rains, if he has an umbrella.

PULLING weeds is not so unpleasant work, particularly when they grow on a pretty little widow's bonnet.

"DAN, what wud yez call a man who stole a gallon av whisky and drank it, and got the jim jams?" "Begorra, I think I'd call him a snake-thief."

HE (in a Chicago restaurant): "Why do you say rawr oystahs, my dear, for raw oysters?" She (who has been visiting friends in New York): "So that people will take me for a New Yorker."

"LET'S play mind cure," said little Tom Bigbee the other day. "What's that?" inquired little Jack Plane, his playmate. "Why, I butt you in the mouth and you make believe it doesn't hurt."

MORNING COMPLIMENTS.

A light little zephyr came flitting,
Just breaking the morning repose.
The rose made a bow to the lily,
The lily she bowed to the rose.

And then, in a soft little whisper,
As faint as a perfume that blows:
"You are brighter than I," said the lily;
"You are fairer than I," said the rose.

"No," said the deacon, when he got back to Beanville after his New York trip; "you folks up here seem to hev got a wrong impression altogether. I might 'a' said I wuz goin' down to York arter green goods, but garden seeds wuz what I hed refrunce to. And that there house o' detention, why, that's a sorter public hotel, ez it were, where they put straugers so's't designin' people can't git at 'em. Them noospaper fellers do git things mixed up dreffle. Noo York's a mighty wicked place, Brother Sawbuck!"

HIS chum came in and found him slipping a lock of hair into an envelope—not furtivly, or surreptitiously, or hurriedly, but just jabbing it under cover in a calm, business-like way. "Hello!" said the visitor, "what's up?" "Nothing," he answered; "I'm only sending back Miss Hamilton-Highlow's hair, that's all." "Engagement off again?" "Yep." "How many times does this make?" "Five. It's final this time, though, one way or the other." "Does she say so?" "Oh, she always says it's final. I'm fixing things just now. It's on forever, or cards out before Lent!" "How do you do it?" "Little scheme of my own. You know the color of her hair, don't you?" "Sorter brown, isn't it?" "Warm brown, with a little raw umber in it." "Well?" "Well, this sample of hair I'm doing up is red—good, regular, standard red. I tell you, we're going to get down to hard-pan emotion this trip. She'll know whether she loves me or not; and if she does, she'll walk me in by the ear and go gunning for white horses."

A LITTLE girl had the misfortune to dearly love a cat which was not altogether esteemed in her household, and which a cruel joint decree of the little girl's parents had condemned to death. One morning the child's father took the cat out to the river to drown it, unknown, as he supposed, to the little girl; but he discovered, to his regret, that the child's watchful eyes had followed him, and that she had seen the murder perpetrated. She was inconsolable and could not understand it; and that evening, when her mother was putting her to bed, she insisted upon fixing her thoughts upon the cat's hereafter. "Hasn't kitty gone to heaven?" she asked her mother. The mother thought that here was a suggestion, perhaps, for the little girl's consolation. "Yes, my dear," she said; "no doubt kitty has gone to heaven." The child was silent for a few moments. Then she asked: "How did she get up to heaven out of the river, mamma?" Here was a puzzler. But the mother was in for it, and she replied: "I suppose God took her up, my dear." "Well," said the child, after another moment of reflection, "I guess he got his coat-sleeve pretty wet when he did it!"

WATER—A WAIL.

Water is Dame Nature's most characteristic blunder. It is a thoroughly feminin creation. As a fluid, it is unnecessarily wet; as a solid, it is perniciously slippery; and as a vapor, it is unreasonably explosiv.

But Nature is proud of it, and revenges herself for any slight upon it. The antediluvians refused to believe in it, and were nearly all drowned. And ever since that time, the bad weather has been 99 per cent water.

Man has sought out many inventions to mitigate the evils of water. He has tried wine, but never gets it dry enough. He adopted milk. She invented milkmen. He built houses to protect himself from the obnoxious element. She follows him up with plumbers.

She lies in wait for him with it. The sunshiny and seductiv cucumber, which doubles him up, and the melancholy watermelon, which flattens him out, are made almost wholly of water.

When a boy, she tempts him to go swimming, and he gets flogged; when a man, he goes sailing for pleasure and she makes him seasick. She lures him into the exasperating occupation of fishing, and straightway he destroys his moral character with fish stories.

Each season torments him with a watery woe of its own. In beautiful spring the freshet sweeps away his property; in summer, the tornado blows him from the face of the earth; in winter, he sits down hard upon the ice.

He digs himself a well, and his neighbors become a visitation upon him. He makes a cellar beneath his house, and the floods prevail against it.

He comes into the world—to be washed; he goes through life carrying an umbrella; and when, disgusted, he dies, his friends think it necessary to weep more water over him before he is left to sleep with his fathers.

Verily, all is vanity and—water.—W. W. Warner, in Texas Siftings.

Gems of Thought.

"THERE are plenty of happy faces here," said Dorothy. "Your own the happiest," said Josslyn, earnestly; "yet, even you hav had sad hours, I fear. I often think," he went on, not aware of her effort to look a negativ to his last surmise, "of that caliph who was blessed with heaven's choicest gifts—riches, pleasures, friendship, success—all that men desire—yet had counted the days on which he had been happy, and, through fifty years, they had been fourteen."—Dorothy's Venture, by Mary Cecil Hay.

MATERIALISM [Secularism and every form of Freethought, etc.] teaches: that man should attend to the affairs of this world, and, contrary to the notion of Jesus, should take "thought for the morrow;" that evil is due to natural causes, and that man can gradually remove the evils that afflict him by becoming acquainted with his nature, relations, and surroundings. Jesus, we are disposed to believe, was a reformer, a come-outer, an "Infidel" of his time. We can esteem him a benefactor without worshiping him as a God. Materialism, finally, teaches that the present is better than the past, and the golden age of the world is in the future.—Underwood.

Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew ever to him both many of the Jews and many of the gentiles. He was the Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day.—Josephus's Antiquities.

THE literature of Judaism, or of paganism, will not help us here [i. e., as to the real facts of the life of Jesus Christ]. We hav contemporary Jewish writings of great interest, but they are as oblivious of the work, and even the existence of Jesus, as we are to-day of the great poets, statesmen, thinkers, who in the corners of the world are gathering up their strength in silence and obscurity, one day to mold the future with it after their hearts' desire. A passage in Josephus [that, I presume, given in the above extract], which for centuries was cherished as the unwilling attestation of a cultured Jew to the miraculous character of Jesus, turns out to be a miserable interpolation, one of a thousand and ten thousand [here I fear, Mr. Chadwick falls into Josephus's "swollen and stilparty" mode of setting down numbers!] instances of mendacious piety in the first Christian centuries, and not confined to these.—Chadwick's Man Jesus.

THE influence of Greek philosophy and learning is visible in all Josephus's writings, and, as far as biblical history is concerned, infused into it a tone of "rationalism." He speaks of Moses as a human, rather than as a divinely inspired, legislator; he doubts the miracle in the crossing of the Red sea; the swallowing of Jonah by the whale; and, generally speaking, whatever is calculated to teach that there was a special miraculous providence at work on behalf of the chosen people.—Chambers' Encyclopedia.

As for myself, I hav delivered every part of this history [of Moses, and particularly his passage through the Red sea] as I found it in the sacred books; nor let anyone wonder at the strangeness of the narration, if a way were discovered to these men of old, who were free from the wickedness of the modern ages, whether it happened by the will of God, or whether it happened by its own accord; while for the sake of those that accompanied Alexander, king of Macedonia, who yet lived comparativly but a little while ago, the Pamphylian sea retired and afforded them a passage through itself, when they had no other way to go—I mean, when it was the will of God to destroy the monarchy of the Persians; and this is confessed to be true by all that hav written about the actions of Alexander; but as to these events [i. e., the passage of Moses through the Red sea, and the passage of Alexander through the Pamphylian sea—both equally] let everyone determin as he pleases.—Josephus's Antiquities of the Jews.

"IT is strange," a judicious reader is apt to say, upon perusal of these wonderful histories, "that such prodigious events never happen in our days." But it is not strange, I hope, that men should lie in all ages. You surely hav seen instances enough of that frailty. You hav yourself heard many such marvelous relations started, which, being treated with scorn by all the wise and judicious, hav at last been abandoned even by the vulgar. Be assured that those renounced lies, which hav spread and flourished to such a monstrous hight, rose from like beginnings; but, being sown in a most proper soil, shot up at last into prodigies almost equal to those which they relate.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

THE proverbial oracles of our parsimonious ancestors hav informed us that the fatal waste of fortune is by small expenses, by the profusion of sums too little singly to alarm our caution, and which we never suffer ourselvs to consider together. Of the same kind is the prodigality of life; he that hopes to look hereafter with satisfaction upon past years, must learn to know the present value of single minutes, and endeavor to let no particle of time fall useless to the ground.—Dr. Johnson.

IT is a pity one had not twenty minds and forty hands; double pity one did not faithfully employ the mind and hands one has. The sweat of the brow is not a curse, but the wholesomest blessing in life.—Carlyle.

REASON must be our last guide and judge in everything.—John Locke.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

SUGGESTIONS FOR COMSTOCK.

Notes and Clippings.

STATISTICS show a striking decrease in the number of marriages in Europe and America.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Pittsburgh declares that no professional base-ball players shall enjoy the comforts of their institution.

IT is reported from Kansas that workmen sinking a coal shaft near Belleville came upon a petrified buffalo in a remarkably good state of preservation and completeness.

THE Electrical Review says that the lightning rod is a relic of superstition, and that the day will come when a lightning rod on a house will be regarded in the same light as a horseshoe over a door.

PROF. E. STONE WIGGINS, the earthquake sharp, has been heard from again. He says that a great earthquake period in North America will begin in 1904—on August 19th, to be exact. Meanwhile, he will not bother with small shakes, like those which hav taken place recently, which are merely "the negativ or reflex action of an earthquake, the position being located south of Cape Horn."

A BOSTONIAN D.D. has written a book endeavoring to show "Why Priests Should Marry." We don't think priests should marry, and the church is quite right in discouraging it. The church might discourage some other things, too. No; priests should not marry, for it is bad enough for the poor, deluded people to hav to support the priests without the additional burden of supporting their wives. The church is a sufficient bride. —Workingmen's Advocate.

OMAHA girl: "I notice many references in the papers to Anthony Comstock, of your city, and——" New York girl: "Horrors! Don't mention him." "Is he so very bad?" "Awful! In polite society it is considered inexcusably vulgar to refer to that creature's diseased imgination."

MRS. HELEN M. GOUGAR, says the Chicago Tribune, has developed the most elaborate case of mugwumpery on record. She says that in Kansas and Iowa she is a Republican, in Georgia a Democrat, in Indiana a third party Prohibitionist, and in religious matters she is an admirer of Charles Bradlaugh, the English Atheist orator.

THE Episcopal Recorder remarks: "That the cathedral is not needed is well known, as St. Thomas's and Grace church are the only two churches of the Protestant Episcopal denomination that are full, while nearly all the others are poorly attended, except on high days and occasionally on Sunday morning." The Episcopal Recorder is "Reformed Episcopal," and opposed to the regulars.

THE young people who are warned at this revival season against theaters and balls as ungodly are having lots of fun in coasting down the hills and holding on to one another. The girls of the Willett Street Methodist church coast down the steep hill in Willett street, between Grand and Delancey, and the damsels who sit under the elocutionary gyrations of Parson Talmage, in Brooklyn, go coasting down Fort Greene hill held in close embrace by the stalwart young men of the congregation. The sport is good and the spills are many, and the amount of hugging accomplished by the lads and lasses is appalling. But hugging and kissing in the name of the Lord is a very different thing from going to the wicked theater and the immoral dance.

IN consequence of a fight in the Republican caucus on the nomination of a chaplain for the legislature, different clergymen are invited by members with a "pull" to open the proceedings with prayer. Some of these gentlemen are paid three dollars and some five. By what gage the prayers are valued is not made known, but the clergy are anxious to know, because they all want to earn the biggest price.

"MY beloved brethren," said a Western minister, "it fills my heart with joy to inform you that the mayor of our little city has experienced a change of heart, and hereafter will labor with us in advancing our great and glorious cause." Murmurs of approval among the congregation. "And as a mark of the respect and esteem we hold for him, and the high confidence we repose in our new brother, the taking up of the collection will be intrusted to his care on this blessed Sabbath morn."

Is it left for a Boston man to discover and announce the sacred antiquities of Chicago? Edward Everett Hale writes to Unity: "Is it a matter of common talk in Chicago that La Salle called the Chicago river the divine river? His text is, 'Pour aller vers la rivière divine, appelé par les sauvages Chicagou'—in order to approach the divine river which the savages called Chicagu." We fear that the Chicagoans are not fully alive to the sacred traditions of their local Jordan; but in this respect they are not much different from their fellows in other parts of the world. It is high spirituality that discovers the sanctities of things near.

THE Freeman's Journal says: "An afternoon spent near Calvary cemetery on any day when the funeral trains come pouring in will fill any Christian man with unspeakable shame and indignation. Perhaps the flask plays as prominent a part in the funeral trains that go to Greenwood. It may, but that does not concern us just now. Before we fling stones at our neighbors, we may as well put a strong roof over our own glass walls. And we can best do that by reforming funeral customs unworthy of pagans."

PROF. E. P. GOULD says in the Andover Review: "Anyone familiar with the rural communities of New England knows that a marked feature of them is the meagerness and poverty of the churches. And the cause is not far to seek. The effect is as natural and inevitable as in any case of overcrowding and excessiv competition. You cannot hav six stores in such a place, and for the same reason you ought not to hav a church for each of the leading sects. A large community may afford the luxury of denominations with churches to correspond. For a division into congregations for purposes of worship is necessary in any such community. And this division may be on denominational lines as well as otherwise on merely economical grounds. But in a small community, such as a country village, no division is possible consistently with prosperity, and consequently the present state of things—several churches instead of one—is a sacrifice of Christianity to denominationalism. Denominationalism is itself a crime, but this sacrifice on its altar is worse—it is a blunder."

The Distribution of Wealth.

Among the costs of being dominated by the value sense or wealth-getting faculty in the degree that conduces to the highest success must be noted the frequent loss of friends, loss of respect, loss of love, loss of sympathy, and loss of character, which grow out of the chicaneries, knaveries, cheats, ingratitudes, and frauds which men of this kind who hav perhaps grown up together from youth will practice on each other when a crisis in their lives comes at which the choice lies between wealth and knavery on the one hand, and honest poverty on the other. I hav in mind the case of a wealthy man who is accounted liberal in his own way, who has, out of his own purse, sent missionaries to foreign lands, but the supreme court of his state solemnly certifies in its judicial reports that the basis of his now ample fortune was laid in the falsification of the books of account between him and the benefactor who has given him his start in life. Think of the damning burden of scorn which goes with such a record, and how impossible it is by any acts whatever to wipe out its reproach. Before you account any man blessed through his wealth, therefore, find out whether he holds the esteem of his early associates, benefactors, and partners. If he has slaughtered these on his way up to wealth, our faith in the doctrin that the universe means rectitude compels us to hope that he has but climbed the craggy mountains of success to get nearer to the avenging lightnings of retribution.

Other costs of getting wealth, the fever of the gambling mania which is inseparable from its constant losses of value and fluctuations, the frequent loss of the wealth itself whereby poverty is made more painful by contrast with recent riches, loss of health, and a thousand other costs are familiar as household words. Not even these evils, nor any flaws or frauds in the title by which wealth is got, can lessen the utility of its effects on society. They can only mar the enjoyment of its possessor.

All that portion of society who are in any close relations to a capitalist, as his employees, associates, customers, and neighbors, are interested in having him devote the largest possible portion of his income to reproductiv purposes, for the more rapid the growth of his reproductiv means, the more useful is he to all these persons. Those close and self-denying, or, as his enemies will always say, those mean and sordid qualities which cause a man, whatever his wages, or however small his income may be, to make his consumption so much less as to insure him very speedily a capital to work with, are as essential to the future wealth of the poor man, as obedience in the private soldier is to his rising from the ranks. Hence the class who are dominated by animalism, love of fun, love of learning, generosity, ostentation, religion, or the desire to help their friends, can never become capitalists. Very few persons who, from twelve to twenty-two years of age, are diverted from money-making to classical studies, theology, vice, philosophy, or who like learning for its own sake, or art for its sake, or beauty or religion supremely, can ever after, by any possibility, make money. For all these divide the worship, teach a contempt of money, inculcate habits of dispersion and not of accumulation. A little stock of learning, and a trifling stock of piety, just enough to make a man feel satisfied in his own mind, so as to stop his thinking about it, and to bring him into outward harmony with the powerful corporate organizations formed ostensibly to promote piety, are favorable to a man as a money-getter. But to win success most surely his worship must be undividedly directed all the time toward money.

The great money-making qualities are meanness and sagacity, the capacity to button up one's pocket against indulgence, charity, learning, religion, art, beauty, and enjoyment, and open it only to a good investment. This reserves from consumption the largest possible portion of capital, and devotes it to reproducing wealth. The more persons of this kind there are in a country, the sooner and faster it gets rich, the higher the wages it pays, even to the improvident, the insubordinate, the intractable, the incompetent, and those who lack health, temperance, or economic sagacity. But no system the wit of man can devise can ever make capitalists out of men whose thoughts are preoccupied with religion, or vice, or philosophy, or learning, or field-sports, or amusements, or indulgence, or with trying to help their friends, or to lift up all mankind at once, or to revolutionize society, or to relieve the poor, or reform crime, or master the fine arts, or any other absorbing passion but that of gain. Whoever goes off on these other shutes will stop short on the road to capital, and will work for wages for life. At present, so large a portion of the wage-working classes are dominated by these obstacles to their emergence from the wage-working condition that, though it is theoretically possible for them all, and one as much as another, to become capitalists and self-employers, it is practically impossible to the mass. Still, wage-workers hav no right to lose sight of the fact that from among their ranks the enterprisers and capitalists are always emerging and must emerge to the end. For nothing is so difficult as to create a successful enterpriser or capitalist by inheritance, or to make wealth last to the grandchildren of the first successful fortune-maker. Very few who inherit wealth hav a tithe of the skill of the man who arose out of the wage-working class and first created it. As a rule, no man can handle more wealth than he has himself accumulated. All the great capitalists America has produced, with a very few exceptions, began as wage-workers. The first Vanderbilt rowed a ferry-boat between Staten Island and New York. A. T. Stewart was a school-teacher, and only by accident found out that he had the gifts of a trader. Hiram Sibley, of Rochester, worth $20,000,000, was a blacksmith. And so of all the others. Two pernicious falsehoods hav poisoned the minds of many wage-workers, and caused them to abandon the hope of ever getting ahead in the world. One is the teaching that, in past times, when industries were in their infancy, men could emerge from the wage working class into the self-employing or labor-employing class, but that this epoch has gone by, and that in the future this will not recur. It is recurring at this moment as often as it ever was, but in some new phase of enterprise. Profits migrate into new employments, and men migrate in pursuit of them. Anyone who knows New York well could enumerate hundreds of the first capitalists of New York who, twenty-five years ago, were wage-workers without capital. The woods are full of them! Every group of workingmen contains them. It will not do, therefore, to tell American workingmen that any legal, or social, or artificial bar, or any bar outside the qualities of their own character, has been erected between them and fortune. It is not true.

Another false notion was started by Malthus, and has been undergoing repetition by nearly every English economist, and is now made the basis of the complaint against the existing order of society which is made by Karl Marx, Lassalle, and the Socialists and Anarchists. I quote it as I find it, briefly and cogently stated, by Edouard Von Hartmann, in his "Philosophy of the Unconscious." He says:

> This increase of national wealth is essentially to the advantage of the possessors of capital alone, since that part of it which falls to the working classes is immediately followed by a numerical increase of the laboring classes, which in the redistribution always keeps the share falling to each individual at the level of the usual indispensable minimum for maintaining life.

This is not true theoretically, because the share of profit that comes to the capitalist is under the same laws of competition as the share of wages that comes to the laborer, i. e., there is the same tendency of outside capital to rush into every profitable business, and reduce profits of capital in that business to the minimum which will sustain the plant, or works, or machinery, or stock, and support the family of the capitalist, as there is of outside labor to rush in and reduce wages to the minimum which will support the worker. The competition of competing capitals is as severe as that of competing wage-workers.

Nor practically, in a specific instance, is it true that at the moment when Cornelius Vanderbilt, or John Roach, or A. T. Stewart got into a position where they could save money, so as to emerge from the wages class into the capitalist class, the families of each of these workers forthwith increased so rapidly that the share of their income falling to each member of their family was kept at the lowest point that would maintain life. The so-called economists who hav palmed off such nonsense on the world as economic law hav not stopped to think. Its original author, Malthus, was a clergyman of the English church, and had eleven children. Possibly his salary may hav been graded according to the increase in his family. But any business man who should be told that no benefit could come to him from an increase of income, for forthwith his wife would bear children at a rate which would always keep the per capita income down to the lowest point at which life could be maintained in the children, would be sent to an asylum. It is idle, therefore, to inveigh against that economic law which confines the accumulation of capital to those who possess the economic virtues. It is better for society that it is so. For it is this mean force, this force of abstinence, that resolutely resists indulgence and luxury, which builds up the great accumulations of reproductiv wealth wherein Britain and America differ from Africa.

Stanley found, when on the Congo, that Portuguese muskets, exchanging for ivory, from fair to fair, each two fairs a few days and miles apart, would travel from the mouth of the Congo to Stanley Falls, fifteen hundred miles up the river, in three and a half years. There there was no wealth but the consumable, no large fortunes of reproductiv capital, no railroads, no banks, no factories, no monopolists, boards of trade or of stocks, no private ownership of land, no rents, no interest on money, no money, no capitalists, except as one man owned his fellow-men in less or greater numbers. There was none of the mental power essential to the reign of capital. There was no power of abstinence. They could not understand how a man having whisky could abstain from staying drunk till it was gone; how a man having power to get ten wives could stop at nine; how a man meeting a stranger could abstain from eating him. There was no credit; no power to comprehend the notion that a man would not lie, when by a lie he could make a better story; no power to avoid stealing, except from fear and so on. Notice now the power of capital. Stanley came with only three English friends and two bulldogs, but with a trading capital of about $200,000, and with this he carried a force, varying from 240 to 100 men, holding them together three years and eight months, paying their way even where they had to fight for leave to trade, but bearing them finally through from Zanzibar to the mouth of the Congo. A sufficient capital would organize even Africa into civilization.

But the quality of character which makes capital prolific in utilities to the neighborhood and country in which it is employed is the hoarding quality—which reserves it from consumption and devotes it to constantly more and more reproductiv uses, and the enterprise and courage which sees new channels of profit, and dares to employ it in them while yet their profitableness is in doubt. For profits are not stationary, but migratory, ever going out of the old art into the new, at the same place, or out of the old place into the new, in the same art. A. T. Stewart made his fortune by bringing twenty new arts into merchandising, all of which made the business more honest, and sold the goods more equally to poor and rich. He introduced the checks on the cash and goods which stop stealings. He stopped the drumming system, which demoralizes clerks and debauches buyers, and makes sales expensiv. He stopped lying at all his counters, forbade his clerks to praise his goods at all, and required them to point out the defects in the goods if they were inquired for, and even if they were not. He saved the commissions other employers paid their salesmen for the trade they commanded, and commanded his own trade, so that his clerks, in order to sell goods, did not need to become steering committees for houses of assignation. By these new arts in trade he rose to the command of forty five factories and twelve leading commercial houses. To his last hour he could not see workmen pile brick without stopping to show them how they could save time and labor.

When reproductiv investment has done its benefits to a somewhat larger number, every block the capitalist erects lowers rents to those who cannot own, every competing railroad cheapens fares. But these benefits are near. Wealth cannot be economically sent to Alaska, except by buying a sealskin sacque, or to Ceylon except by buying pearls, or to the central celestial flowery country, which western barbarians call China, without buying silks, teas, and ginseng; or to Java without buying coffee, to Peruvian mountaineers and Parisian cutters without buying diamonds, to Timbuctoo and Quango without buying ostrich feathers, to the peasantry of the Apennines without buying Spanish wines, to the needlewomen of Paris without buying fine lace, to Mexicans without purchasing costly dyes and colors; to Bulgaria without buying ottar of roses. Luxury and ostentation are the bent bow which speeds the arrow of fortune, barbed with a price but feathered with a charity, upon its highest and farthest flight. Those who draw the bow never see the quarry, and those who stand where the feathered arrow falls know not whence it comes. For the great charities which bless the poor without insulting them hav to travel incognito under the name of Luxury, as the great utilities which enrich mankind all put on the garb of sordidness.

I hav endeavored to show that human society, as now organized, is the product of an all-pervading will, which, whether unconscious or conscious, is humane in all its parts. It would extend my theme too far were I to attempt to show that even where men and women prefer the methods of barbarism, crime, and vice to those of civilization, the limitations on their development being such that they can prefer no other, natural law or society's unconscious will makes use even of barbarism, vice, and crime to carry financial relief from the fortunate to the unfortunate, and from the more successful in civilization to those that fail except as they resort to vicious and barbarous methods. Throughout society sensibilities are so adapted to condition that the actual enjoyment of happiness by all men is like their daily consumption of food and wear of clothing—nearly equal. The attempt to prove oneself peculiarly miserable soon degenerates into hypocrisy, and the attempt to prove oneself extraordinarily happy is never believed by any listener. All men believe in the democratic equality of the happiness that exists in the world, however fiercely they may denounce the aristocratic inequality in the distribution of the means.

I hav not covered the whole field, and cannot hope to do so in this essay. I hand you these few pebbles of unfertil thought as I find them washed up to my feet by the vast heaving, unfathomable ocean of human industry, economic interchange, and mutual toil. If they seem hard, it is because they were coined in the smelting furnace of experience, and cannot escape the seal of their igneous origin.

If they seem smooth and cold, it is because they are worn by long attrition with facts that would not yield. If they glisten with something faintly, like the momentary richness of gems, but which will soon dry off and leave them lusterless, it is because they are still wet with those surging billows of human sympathy and endeavor from which they came, and part of which they are, and in which, if you cast them back, they will shine again.

VAN BUREN DENSLOW.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

WARRENSBURG, Mo., Dec. 29th, 30th.—The very disagreeable weather and the strenuous efforts of the Christians who united in the "stay-away argument" resulted in the Opera House being only about two-thirds full the first night; but on the next, although the weather was even more unpropitious, there was a much larger attendance to hear on "The Bible in the Public Schools." I exposed the subtle schemes, not alone of the Roman Catholics, but also of the Protestants, to destroy our public school system, the sole bulwark of our republican institutions, and how each and all indorse the declaration of the bishops of the Episcopal church in their pastoral letter of 1886 "that, with the enlargement of knowledge, scientific discoveries, and activity of the press, it is no marvel that unbelief should be rife and widespread. Whatever others may do, the church cannot, without protest and resistance, allow the salt of Christ's gospel to be cast out, little by little, from the education of the children of this land. The task set before us, as a part of the church of Jesus Christ, is to extend his reign over this fair, broad land, and to make this American republic submissiv to his sway."

I had the satisfaction of being assured by many intelligent persons that my lecture had aroused them to a sense of the danger and the need to heed the admonition of Washington, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

That sturdy old hero, A. T. Bolton, and his son, O. C. (Chris.), are made the especial targets for the fiery and malicious darts of the devoutly pious. The dear Christians set such a noble example of believing the Bible and obeying the precepts of Jesus, "Love your enemies; do good to them which hate you" (Luke vi, 27)! But the lectures hav opened many eyes to the fallacies of the Bible, and many mollusks are gaining courage to avow their convictions.

OLATHE, KAN., Jan. 1st, 2d, 3d.—Kansas is a beautiful state—speaking after the manner of Paul (Rom. iii, 7). It is unsurpassed in booms and blizzards. Suffering some from asthma, the sudden, intense, marrow-searching winds gave me severe cold, and the atmosphere, poisoned with the accumulated filth of the streets and the dirt of the hotels, added to the ever-prevalent malaria abounding in Kansas, resulted in my spending the greater part of New Year's day in bed. I was very sick; toward evening, I determined to remove to the other hotel. Olathe has two best hotels, unequaled on earth, save by each other for dirt and shiftlessness. I would offer daily petitions to the throne of grace, or any other fellow, for the speedy release of my worst enemy doomed to remain in either of them. Olathe is a city of paradoxes. The suburbs are neat, picturesque, with broad avenues and handsome residences; the business part abounds in banks and muck; one side of the public square looks like a row of abandoned pigstys. So much for the bad; but there is much of good in Olathe. They hav a most magnificent brick building—the coöperativ store of the Grangers; immense stores for every department, supplying every need from a shoe-lace to Brussels carpet, carpet tacks to mince-meat. In the second story is a very fine, commodious opera house and a large, handsome Grange lodge-room, where I delivered the lectures. And I hav never had the honor of addressing more intelligent and attentiv audiences. It was only will-power that enabled me to keep my appointment, but the interest evinced gave me strength. New Year's night the attendance was not large, but the two succeeding nights standing room was at a premium—even the ante-rooms was crowded with eager listeners trying to peep over each other's shoulders.

I had the pleasure of meeting many right royal Liberals. Good old Dr. Peter Julien, friend Everitt, and young N. M. Dewees, are in the lead and shoulder the responsibilities.

The State Deaf and Dumb Asylum is located at Olathe; they are erecting a center building between the two buildings first erected; they will be wings to the main building. The whole, when finished, will make a very large and imposing structure. There are about one hundred and fifty male and sixty female pupils, varying in age from eight years to twenty.

Oh, how piteous their affliction! One bright little fellow about nine years old, with the finger language asked one of the teachers, "O sir! do please tell me why, oh, why did God make me deaf and dumb?" Think of the joy, the delusion of happiness to the poor afflicted ones; think of the delight naught else could equal that the parents and relativs would experience, if those poor unfortunates could go home able to hear and talk. Who, that by any possibility could, would not gladly giv them power of speech and hearing?

The Christians say their God could. Their God could, but will not. The teachers spend hours each day teaching those poor deaf-mutes to be grateful to God. "God is love." "God is all-powerful." "God is a tender, loving father." And all the poor deaf-mutes are made to worship him. Instead of the motto, "God is love," why not hav, in the same large type, the pet text of the Presbyterians, Isa. lxiii, 3: "I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment, for the day of vengeance is on mine heart?" This would enable the poor deaf-mutes to at least realize the consistency and harmony of the character of the Christian God.

O that Liberalism would fulfill its mission, and in every neighborhood establish science schools on Sunday, so that young and old alike might learn the truth: God did not make us; we are just what our parents or grandparents hav made us, and every so-called affliction, every malformation of brain or body, is the consequence of violation of nature's law, from the dread penalty of which no vicarious atonement can save us or our children!

BURLINGTON, KAN., Jan. 4th, 5th, 6th.—This is quite a pretentious village (city, in Kansas). Those who sold out three years ago did wisely. The place, like almost every little huddle in the state, has been boomed, and now suffers the inevitable consequent paralysis.

I wish it distinctly understood that no amount of good or ill treatment will induce me to swerve from the truth in my account of places I visit. I giv facts, without fear or favor—"nothing extenuate, nor aught set down in malice."

TRUTH SEEKER readers are anxious to learn the actual condition of things, and this it is impossible to obtain from interested parties, many of whom are unscrupulous in misrepresentation. And then, too, it is quite possible to giv glowing descriptions of Kansas, its climate and products, and, while speaking the truth, yet grossly deceive.

The climate of Kansas is execrable; intense heat and cold, with sudden changes from one extreme to the other. Kansas is situate about the center of the United States, and it has all the disagreeables of every section. Old settlers, who hav no interest in real estate booms, admit that in thirty years past Kansas has only averaged one crop in three years. Two failures to one success, but the malaria is always a full crop. I am informed that by taking whisky and quinine enough, one gets so he doesn't mind it much, only in cold, damp, foggy weather.

Kansas produces mammoth corn, pumpkins, and cabbage semi-occasionally, and acres and acres of sunflowers that grow very large, rank, and strong; this tiresome pest is always a dead-sure crop.

Kansas land is all ready for the plow. You can go right on and put in your crops. There are no trees to fell, no stumps in the way. Oh, no! it is open, bleak prairie; a dreary wilderness of dismal sameness, where the blizzards hav full sweep, and are as pitiless as the railroads. Hard coal costs $15 to $17 per ton; soft coal, $5. Burning wood is out of the question; it is unattainable.

It would be a good country for hogs, only the cholera kills them off oftener than the drouth does vegetation. Despite the frequent cruel blizzards, ten to twenty degrees below zero, barns are rarities, very few and far between. I at first supposed it was cruel indifference to the terrible suffering of stock that left them with nothing but wilted cornstalks for shelter. But I did the people injustice; they would gladly put up barns if they could, but poverty prevents. There is scarcely a farm in Kansas without its mortgage, and the interest is from twelve to thirty per cent. In great cities the pawnbrokers' shops are found in the most squalid, poverty-stricken neighborhoods; they could do no business only for the helpless poverty of the people in their vicinity. In every place in Kansas I hav visited there are everywhere staring you in the face large signs, "Money to loan." Every such sign tells of blighted hopes, failure, poverty, and ruin.

Why people pass through Missouri to settle in bleeding Kansas can only be explained on the principle of intelligent persons clinging to the Christian religion; one fool leads the way, and all, like sheep, blindly follow their leader. It is easier to go with the unthinking crowd—so much less trouble to take the say-so of others than to investigate.

Burlington is fortunate in that she has a noble band of truth seekers—men and women of intelligence, genuin Liberals. I had a glorious good time, large attendance, and real, earnest interest at all three lectures, and organized the Burlington Liberal Union: president, C. K. Lefering; vice-president, Mrs. E. Storrs; secretary, O. E. Sandford; treasurer, John Hollywood; vigilance committee, Guy Watt, O. C. Horton, and H. W. Anderson; educational committee, W. H. Bear, R. P. Douglass, and Mrs. Guy Watt; social committee, John Hollywood and wife, Guy Watt and wife, C. K. Lefering and wife, and O. E. Sandford and wife.

FALL RIVER, KAN., Jan. 7th, 8th.—I arrived at this place Saturday at 5 o'clock P.M. Blizzard was in full blast. Thermometer indicated seven degrees below zero and rapidly falling. I took up my abode in the pigsty they called a hotel. It is run by a biped. A sense of justice to the swine prevents my grossly libeling them by calling him by their name.

At 7 o'clock I repaired to the Opera House, a very large, handsome building, stores below, Opera House above—a fine, large hall, high ceiling, large stage. Behind the curtain the walls were unplastered, windows broken out, so gentle Boreas swept in. There was but one stove, fire just started, and the entry-doors would not shut close. I lectured with my overshoes, overcoat, and muffler on, and suffered terribly from the cold, and contracted neuralgia that will last me to my grave. Many of my audience sat with overcoat collars up and heads shrunk down, breathing on their benumbed fingers to keep them from freezing. That so many stayed in such misery, for the sake of hearing what Liberalism taught, was the reason I delivered the lecture despite severe suffering. Promises were made me that the fire should be started at 9 o'clock in the morning, and the stove be kept red-hot till the lecture at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. On Sunday, a few minutes before 3, one of the friends called on me, and asked me if "I had not better go light the fire in the hall." At half-past 3 I arrived at the Opera House and found a small boy trying to start a fire. Ten degrees below zero, and a gentle Kansas zephyr, with a velocity of sixty miles an hour, fanned the brow of those who ventured into the streets. I bribed two small boys to keep fetching coal and fill the stove. I would hav hired some men to clean the floor, but it had not been even swept in some years and pick-axes and shovels were frozen up. At 4 o'clock I delivered my lecture—stood near the stove, so only the rear half of me froze.

Sunday night attendance was not larger than at the first lecture. It was slim; people had been frozen twice, and declined to risk consequences a third time. A parson preaching hell-fire for sinners in that hall under the circumstances would hav induced even good Liberals to become wicked, in hopes he spoke the truth and that they might eventually get warm.

With the exception of good friend Hall, a more shiftless set I never had the misfortune to meet than the Fall Riverites. From all such places and such Liberals, in the future, I pray kind Fortune to deliver me.

That Voice From the Tomb.

In a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is an article entitled, "A Voice From the Tomb." It givs a short life-sketch of the Rev. James H. Thornwell, D.D., of South Carolina, and an extract from a sermon delivered by him in Columbia just one month before the secession of the state.

The subject is, or rather was, slavery then; but it is broader now even in the North. It always was a broad subject in the South, and was not considered in the narrow limits and spiteful style peculiar to the North. The subject now is forced upon us under various heads—Anarchism, Communism, labor organizations, Anti-Poverty unions, etc.

The complaints about the lash and bloodhounds are only twisted a little, and duplicated into cries against the wounds and sores made by capital. The Rev. Mr. Thornwell said the North was blind. Was it not? Who admits that his sermon is now a "Voice From the Tomb?"

I would hav been glad to hav read your opinion on it—on this manifold subject which some fools—a good many fools—hav thought the war settled. What frankness and clearness in language! what logic! what comprehension and thought! It is so like the great Carolinian who was his close friend!

Our Ingersoll has answered Black, and left a little of the Rev. Mr. Field. He never omits a chance to run a tilt against the form of slavery peculiar to the South a few years ago. The Rev. Mr. Thornwell has not challenged Ingersoll, or sought to dethrone him in the view of his friends. But he has left a record—a few texts briefly written, containing his own views about slavery, labor, and capital, etc., which show evidence of a powerful and masterly intellect.

I would be glad to read what Mr. Ingersoll may feel disposed to say concerning the positions of this Carolinian. By the way, they vary only in form of expression from those entertained by Hammond, Calhoun, and others of that state. If he can refute them as completely, and in as knightly a spirit, as he has answered his assailants in the North American Review, I will forgiv him for the many ungenerous things he has said heretofore about the men of the South.

Refused Communication.

J. R. MONROE, M.D., Editor Ironclad Age, Dear Sir: By request of a majority of the board of directors, I am instructed to forward you the following communication, with the understanding that I retain the original, and they respectfully ask that you giv the same publicity to this that you did to the accusations. Fraternally,

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. Board of Directors.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Ironclad Age: As there has been more or less correspondence in your paper as to the financial relations between the former secretary (now president), Mr. S. P. Putnam, and the American Secular Union, we deem it necessary and honorable to Mr. Putnam to make the following statement:

We first affirm that Mr. Putnam has been in all ways strictly fair and generous in regard to compensation for his services to the Union, and no one who understands the matter can view it otherwise.

Last year Mr. Putnam surrendered his rightful and legal claim to $600, due him by the Union for services performed during 1885–6. In view of this and the uncertain financial prospects for the year of 1886–7, the board of directors did not guarantee a fixed salary. It was, however, mutually agreed by them and Mr. Putnam—the treasurer, Mr. Eckhard, cordially coinciding—that Mr. Putnam should take the lecture field as the representativ of the Union, and that all moneys received by him he should retain in payment of his services; also that he should be entitled to all such money as might remain in the treasury after all the liabilities should be paid.

In accordance with this understanding Mr. Putnam has received during the last year about $2,137. Out of this sum he has paid nearly $700 for traveling expenses, leaving him for that year's work, in lieu of his fixed salary which he had relinquished, something over $1,400, according to the report of the treasurer. Of this $2,137, $1,887 was collected by Mr. Putnam as lecture fees for services in the field, and this amount would hav been justly his due under any circumstances, because it was received in payment of services performed, and not as a donation to the Secular Union general fund. Out of the actual donations to the general fund, Mr. Putnam has received only $250 for two months' legitimate office work performed in New York city, and for his services as secretary of the Union in connection with his ten months' labor in the lecture field.

The donations to the Secular Union general fund amounted to about $625, and besides the amount paid to Mr. Putnam $175 had been paid for debts contracted for the exclusiv benefit of Chas. Watts. The balance has been used for necessary expenses—books bought and distributed, and donations to other lecturers. It would not hav been fair to hav taken the money earned by Mr. Putnam to pay other speakers who hav undoubtedly received their regular fees. In order to avoid misapprehension the treasurer should hav stated in his report the understanding that Mr. Putnam should retain the $1,887 collected as lecture fees. The only possible question, then, that can arise is as to the payment of $250 to Mr. Putnam for office work as secretary, which payment makes the actual amount received, when expenses are deducted, less than the fixed salary the Union had agreed to pay Mr. Putnam for the two preceding years. All other amounts were his own earnings, as per agreement with the board of directors, and the only reason they had to be accounted for by the treasurer was that the Union had to hav a representativ secretary and such funds collected by that representativ necessarily needed to be acknowledged by some one. Therefore it was thought best for Mr. Putnam to account for his lecture fees as contributions to the Union. All misapprehension would hav been avoided had the treasurer stated this in his report and distinguished between "lecture fees" and "donations to the general fund by friends."

In reporting the payment of certain sums to the Truth Seeker Company, C. P. Farrell, and other parties the treasurer entirely exceeded his duties. These payments had nothing whatever to do with the American Secular Union. They were Mr. Putnam's private and personal matters. As treasurer, Mr. Eckhard accounted for Mr. Putnam's salary (or what was accepted as such). This was all that concerned the Union. When Mr. Putnam gave Mr. Eckhard vouchers for salary, the treasurer should merely hav acknowledged the voucher. Mr. Putnam asked Mr. Eckhard as a friend—not as treasurer—to pay part of his salary to certain parties. It was an error on the part of the treasurer to include these private transactions in his public report.

It was not understood by the board of directors that Mr. Putnam sold books for the benefit of the general fund, except those donated for that purpose. It would hav required the services of a clerk to hav traveled with Mr. Putnam in order to hav kept a strict account of the sales, with postage, freight, and excess rates; books lost, stolen, injured, etc. As Mr. Putnam took the entire responsibility for payment and care of books, he certainly was entitled to whatever profit might accrue. Any other payment would hav been oppressiv and unjust.

The charge, therefore, that Mr. Putnam has in any case taken what does not rightfully and fairly belong to him falls to the ground. He acted in good faith with the board of directors and in accordance with their agreement. He has worked hard, and has been paid no more than is justly his due. He has taken nothing from others, and it is hoped that, hereafter, no friend of the Union will help defeat the cause by creating groundless suspicions against its officers.

The board of directors unanimously agreed that Mr. Putnam should hav all he could earn, and also agreed, if possible, to pay the $600 he gave the Union. This has not been paid; but Mr. Putnam is as enthusiastic for the Union as ever. In view of his generous and self-sacrificing spirit, we cannot but regard the recent accusations and insinuations in your paper against Mr. Putnam as cruelly unjust.

COURTLANDT PALMER.

NOTE.—Not being a member of the board at the time of the aforesaid arrangement with the board of directors and Mr. Putnam, but being elected to the chairmanship of the finance committee shortly after, I hav all along understood that such an agreement as above outlined was then made, and so far as I am aware Mr. Putnam has faithfully adhered to the same. E. A. STEVENS, Ex-Chairman Fin. Com.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a transcript of the document forwarded me to copy, with the request that I retain the original and attach the seal of the Union to this copy.

Mayor Roche's Moral Reform.

The political accident, of large body and abbreviated intellect, who holds down the executiv chair of this corporation for his political bosses, the two Georges, was afflicted with an acute spasm of moral "rheumatics" a few days ago, and he revoked the license of the only bill-posting firm in the city, renewing it next day, however, on condition that certain "objectionable" posters should be covered inside of twenty-four hours; the occasion for this sudden rush of righteousness to the brain being the posting of bills for a novelty company playing at the Casino—a company which has performed in Chicago at least four times since Roche has been proxy-mayor of the city, and displayed the same posters. The bills are no more indecent, immodest, or objectionable than scores of performances of that class, and probably not so much so. They represent girls dancing in the ballet, the chief point about their dress being that they hav none to speak of. However, they had plenty of tights, but were not rigged out to brave a regular Dakota blizzard, by any means—ballet girls seldom are. Several old deacons observed these statuesque figures defying the elements, as it were, and I presume the sight of their unseasonable attire set their shins a-shaking and their teeth a-chattering at the management's apparent cruelty to animals in producing such an exhibition in below-zero weather, and sympathetically wished it suppressed. However, evil-disposed persons do say that what scandalized the deacons and excited their ire was the representation of a long array of the bald-headed fraternity anxiously trying to obtain admission to the theater to witness Alice Montague's performance of the "Little Devil's Ravels," and they did not like to be "given away" quite so freely; so they sought out Roche—John A. Roche—Mayor John A. Roche, I mean—and as a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind, he compassionately complied by, so to speak, placing his No. 13's on the posters.

The Lily Clay company hav thereby gained some valuable advertising, but this has not deterred our doughty Chicago "cock" Roche from declaring that he is going to make this a "clean city." If he will only remove the heaps of filth from the alleys he will do a worthy work, but it seems as though he imagins that morals is his mission, not sanitation. There he is likely to make a great mistake. Now understand that Roche is busily engaged in perusing Anthony Comstock's latest attempt at literary fame, "Morals vs. Art," with the end in view of becoming an accomplished moral scavenger. Possibly his presence in New York is to get a few more "pointers" from Saint Anthony. If Anthony Comstock will only keep on writing books, his reign will be brief indeed. For his enemies, he has selected a most fortunate title, "Morals vs. Art," which at once places these two agencies in direct antagonism, and at once suggests that the writer is an idiot. Keep on writing books, Tony, for they show your conceptions of art to be those of a low-bred, vulgar minded egotist who discovers in pictures

An amount of vigorous salacious pith
That your writings hav not.
They're the cussedest rot
You could bore an editor with.

If the above specimen of municipal interference is not quite an illustration of orthodoxy in the state, it shows the disposition of orthodoxy to become the moral censor of the community; and it is one of the duties of the American Secular Union to stop the onward march of this sort of dictation; and I am pleased that our energetic and enthusiastic president, Samuel P. Putnam, has chosen as his subjects for this year, first, "Universal Mental Liberty," "The Dangers Ahead," "American Democracy," "The Bible," and, as a contrast, "The Glory of Infidelity," and "Priest, King, and People." Mr. Putnam will flash the torch of freedom during February and March through southern California. It is hoped that our friends in San Diego, Del Mar, San Jacinto, Los Angeles, Santa Ana, Anaheim, San Bernardino, and the points where lectures are not yet arranged, will speedily make engagements.

Dispatches from Indianapolis state that the Christian community is greatly agitated over a clerical scandal. Rev. D. R. Buskirk of the Third church is alleged to hav been very sweet on the wife of another divine (?), Rev. C. W. Mertz. As the trial is being pushed forward by members of each of their congregations, and as it is expected to be sensational, it will be secret. Mr. Mertz seems to be a philosopher. He doesn't worry about a little thing like that, and isn't taking any hand in the prosecution. Possibly he knows how it is himself.

Several Freemasons, who had aroused the religious ire of the bigoted clericals in the state of Pueblo, Mexico, hav been foully murdered by the fanatical followers of Rome, and they promis to murder every Mason. If the Masonic order is worth a rap, it will help to destroy the influence everywhere of the teachings of this gospel according to blood, instead of catering to it, for it will certainly be put in practice whenever an opportunity presents itself.

Judge Ermentrout, of Pennsylvania, has affirmed the decision of the lower court fining the gate-keeper of a camp-meeting association for taking money on the Sabbath. This prosecution was brought by the Philadelphia Sabbath Association. Good! When Christians get fighting among themselvs over laws they hav put on the statute books, there is a good time coming for the rest of the people. We can afford to wait a little longer.

The Chicago Secular Union will suitably celebrate the author-hero's natal day. Dr. Juliet H. Severance will, on Sunday evening, make the oration at our regular meeting, and will be followed by an original poem by Prof. Wm. C. Wilson, and speeches by Gen. M. M. Trumbull, Mrs. Freeman, Dr. E. S. McLeod, Prof. W. S. Bell, C. Orchardson, and others. A splendid entertainment is arranged for Monday evening. A chorus of twenty voices of one of the German singing societies; some leading vocalists; organ, cornet, and zither soloists; an original poem by Dr. Severance, and a short address by the writer will constitute the first part of the program, and we shall then trip the light fantastic till early in the morning.

E. A. STEVENS.

All About John Wesley.

The "information wanted about John Wesley" will be found in Vol. II., pp. 602–5, of Lecky's last work, "England in the Eighteenth Century." It was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER in 1880. Wesley was not indicted in Georgia for adultery. He was then a High churchman of a very narrow type. He insisted on baptism by immersion, and refused to baptize a child whose parents objected to that form. He would not permit a non-communicant to become a sponsor; repelled one of the holiest men from the communion table because he was a Dissenter; refused, for the same reason, to read the burial service over another, and succeeded in inducing Oglethorpe to issue an order forbidding any colonist from throwing a line or firing a gun on Sunday. His sermons were all satires on particular persons. He insisted upon weekly communions, desired to rebaptize Dissenters who abandoned their non-conformity, and exercised his pastoral duties in such a manner that he was accused of meddling in every quarrel and prying into every family.

A connection, which was at first purely religious, between himself and a young lady of his congregation, led to a proposal for marriage, but its consummation was forbidden by the Moravian church, whose judgment he accepted as the command of God. The lady soon married a Mr. Wilkinson, who was disliked by Wesley. The pastoral visits were kept up; he forced himself repeatedly into her presence in spite of her husband's express command, and ended by expelling her from the communion.

It was said among his followers that she made the first overtures to him, and feigned a greater devotion than was real in order to attract him; but the only specific charge alleged against her was that she had not communicated more than three times in three months, and had not intimated her intention to the clergyman before coming to the sacred table. Her incensed husband brought an action against Wesley for defaming her character.

The grand jury were divided in their opinions, but the majority pronounced his conduct wholly unjustifiable, and took the opportunity of censuring the ritualistic innovations and severities he had introduced. A trial was impending, and, in spite of his desire to meet it, was repeatedly postponed. At last, by the advice of friends, he fled to England.

This was in 1738, when Thomas Paine was one year old. In less than four months after his return to England, Wesley got converted to Christ through the instrumentality of a Moravian priest. Therefore, all that he did in Georgia was the work of an impenitent sinner.

It is perhaps unjust to stigmatize John Wesley as an adulterer. Doubtless, like most pastors, he was tempted, but let us hope that he withstood the temptation better than the average preacher.

But, in spite of the grace of God, John Wesley was a bitter Tory. He wrote a pamphlet against the complaints of the American colonists, entitled, "A Calm Address." This was reviewed by Thomas Paine, as "Casca," in the English Crisis, No. LXII. of March 23, 1776. In that review Paine said, "Governments are instituted, not for the sake of the governors, but of the governed"—a sentiment that is repeated almost verbatim in the Declaration of Independence. This, said Paine, is "an eternal truth," but "Wesley is not ashamed to assert the contrary." BURR.

Advice to Workingmen.

Stand by the tariff! It was framed for you by your best friends, who are always on the lookout for a chance to raise your wages. Congress has made tariff after tariff at the precise figures which were asked for by your employers. They did all the lobbying; but it was entirely for your good. They were not trying to protect themselvs. Oh, no! All they wanted was to protect you against British books, blankets, carpets, hardware, stockings, flannel, and woolen cloth. How shocking it would be for you to hav to buy such articles for one-half the prices you are paying now! How kind it is of your employers to keep any such temptation at a safe distance! This is so great a blessing that your getting no protection against the competition of laborers from Europe and Canada in your own homes is not worth talking about. Your guardian angel, James G. Blaine himself, said, while secretary of the treasury, in his report to Congress, that "undoubtedly the inequality in the wages of English and American operativs is more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter, and their longer hours of labor." You hav the word of Truthful James himself for believing that a lower tariff would giv you just as much money for the same amount of work. There would, at all events, be no fall of wages to offset the certainty that your money would go twice as far. How could you stand having the surplus taken out of Uncle Sam's pockets and put into yours? You don't want that, of course. You would much rather let the tariff be raised higher and higher by millionaires and monopolists, until it protects your wages way up to what they are in protectionist Germany, where the highly protected workingman earns about one-half as much as in free-trade England, and is actually able to eat black bread every day, and meat once a week. That is the protectionist millennium!

How kind it is of the wealthy philanthropists, who now tax your clothing twice as high as their own, to offer to hasten the coming of this golden age, by giving you cheap tobacco and whisky! Believe all these saintly men tell you. Hav full faith that all your prosperity before the war, and the whole nation's, is due to the tariff which was arranged to suit the protectionists between 1824 and 1833, and again between 1842 and 1846, though it did not even then reach its present hight. Feel sure that your present prosperity, with which every one of you is perfectly satisfied, is all owing to the tariff, and that none of it is due to our free institutions, or to your own skill and vigor. It is not of the least consequence how much you are ahead of men in other lands. The only point of superiority worth talking about is our high duties on almost every necessary of life which we can import. Great is the tariff of your masters. The tariff was made for man, and man was made for the tariff.

Colonel Ingersoll in Court.

From the Evening Sun.

Colonel Ingersoll is a big man wherever he goes, but he has seldom been such "a big toad in the puddle" as at the little shire town of Dedham, Mass., the past week. He was the leading counsel for Alley, the defendant in the suit to recover $150,000, the value of one hundred and fifty bonds of the Postal Telegraph Company, which the plaintiff claimed had been given to Mr. Alley upon conditions which the latter failed to carry out. The news that Colonel Ingersoll was at the court house spread rapidly through the country town and crowds flocked to the place. So great was the rush that deputy-sheriffs were sent to guard the stairways and prevent accident. All eyes were centered upon "Bob." He sat in an armchair, and his ample proportions completely filled it. His smooth-shaven, round face was continually wreathed in smiles, and he frequently joined in the laugh that followed his witticisms. He thought he made a good impression on the jury, and he kept it up. At one time he was quizzing Mr. Snow in regard to the condition of his finances at a certain date. Mr. Snow tried to explain, but was interrupted by Colonel Ingersoll, who said: "I asked you if you were not substantially out of money. I hav a friendly feeling for you on that account, because I hav often been in that condition myself." Mr. Snow looked embarrassed.

Later in the trial Mr. Snow testified that on a certain Sunday he had remained at home and had not gone to church. Colonel Ingersoll ejaculated, "Well, you were a sensible man for once in your life." Several old ladies who were in the court-room looked horrified and glared severely at the noted Agnostic. The younger ladies joined in the laugh that followed, and even Judge Pitman's face broadened into a smile.

The next incident that broke the monotonous course of the trial was when Mr. Snow testified that Mr. Alley had a tremendous influence with great men, "both living and dead."

"What's that?" promptly asked Colonel Ingersoll, who was conducting the cross-examination. "How many bonds did you giv Mr. Alley on the strength of those dead men? How many cemetery considerations did you issue?"

Mr. Snow shifted his position and remained silent.

"He thought he'd look a little bigger perched upon the tombstone of a friend, did he?" sneered the colonel.

Colonel Ingersoll enjoys a joke, even if it is turned against himself. On the first day of the trial the colonel left the court house by the rear door and undertook to find the restaurant. He had never before tried that route, and soon noticed that he was walking away from his dinner. Meeting a lad who had spent the morning in the court house, he asked, "I say, young man, where in —— is that eating-house?"

The lad was equal to the occasion. "Why, Mr. Ingersoll, I thought you didn't believe in a hell?" he responded.

Colonel Ingersoll laughed heartily. "Well, that's a good one on me. But where is it, anyway?"

He followed the direction pointed out by the lad, and in a short time he was placing himself outside of a juicy piece of steak.

An evening Sun correspondent sat at the table with him and found the great lawyer one of the most congenial companions. He threw off the cares of the case which he was conducting and was the life of the little company. As he entered the room he exclaimed: "Hello! here are the reporters. If we keep by them we'll get the best there is."

During the dinner, the conversation turned upon pugilism, and Colonel Ingersoll remarked: "I've always been dead set against boxing, or sparring—or fighting, for that's what it really means. It's brutal and low-lived. If a man wants exercise, he can get it in a more respectable manner. It's a disgusting sport."

"The English don't seem to think so," remarked one man.

"Humph! Sullivan finds himself in congenial company," snorted Mr. Ingersoll. "I never thought much of the prince of Wales and all the lords and dukes over there, and I don't think any more of them now."

Two gentlemen began to talk about a little game of poker on the preceding evening, and the conversation became general. Colonel Ingersoll said: "I think that poker is one of the most interesting games in existence. The ministers talk about the sin of gambling, but in all that they say, the sin is always in the losing. Now, in my opinion, the sin of gambling is in the winning. It's no sin to lose money. If I'm such a fool as to lose my money, where is the sin? It's mine, and I can do what I like with it. But when you come to win, that's a different thing. If I play with, and win money from, a man who cannot afford to lose it, I am doing wrong. But if I should win a million of dollars from Mr. Vanderbilt there would be nothing wrong in it. He could afford to lose it, and I'd collect it, too, if there was any power to make him pay it."

Dr. McGlynn on the Church Machine.

From his speech before the Anti-Poverty Society, January 22d.

Our quarrel is not with the church, for we wish to preserve it in its purity for those who are to come after us, but with the abuses of the ecclesiastical machine, and we oppose that machine chiefly because its abuse must always injure the cause of true religion. The priest or bishop who will refer the most trivial questions to Rome for settlement, as whether gas can be burnt in church, is the most certain of advancement, and so toadying of all kinds is developed. The remedy for many abuses arising out of such toadying is to decentralize, and to allow the church to elect its own bishops. There is a serious danger that in this country a man to become a Catholic must become almost a foreigner—just like that monsignor whose ancestors came to this country two hundred years ago, and yet who recently denounced as no true Catholic a man who would refuse to take his politics, as well as his religion, from Rome. Why, it has gone so far that a parent cannot remove his child even from one Catholic school to another without the consent of the bishop, and it has actually been declared that it is better that a child should hav no education at all than go to the accursed public school. If this country should ever become entirely Catholic, the parents of the country would then hav no voice whatever in deciding upon what sort of a school their children should attend. They would make the very ministry of Christ subordinate to their wretched schools. And to bolster up that false doctrin, they are bedeviling the politics of the country to secure what they call "their share" of the school taxes, to be expended without the people having any say as to how it is done. Why, it has come to be that the chief qualification of bishops is that they are "good financiers," not piety or godliness.

Through so-called charities, another danger threatens the state, for many of these charities are really supported by the state. It has actually become profitable for certain religious orders to establish these charities. For the support of these institutions, corrupt political bargains hav been made, especially with the Democratic party, and more particularly with that most ill-smelling portion of that party, Tammany hall.

A number of years ago, a number of priests determined that they would get the support for their parochial schools from the state. They were warned that such a course would bring the church into discredit. And at Archbishop McCloskey's palace a bargain was made with Peter B. Sweeny, and at the next election the fearfully corrupt Tammany machine held its power through the assistance of the ecclesiastical machines. The Sunday before the election, many priests exhorted their flock that they should vote for those who would help the church. I am glad to say that the agent of the machine did not visit the pastor of St. Stephen's. Even to-day it is not well for a priest to be unfriendly to that same Tammany machine. To get money for their schools, they were willing to enter into an alliance with that infamously corrupt ring. And years afterward, when Tweed was in prison, a high ecclesiastical dignitary regretted his fate, because he was "our friend." It is lucky that there was not a brass tablet in the new cathedral giving the names of some of those who gave money for it, for there you would find the names of Tweed and the rest.

But the ecclesiastical machine was willing to condone the thieveries of the most gigantic band of public swindlers that ever, perhaps, existed, because those swindlers befriended this machine. Through them the Catholic Protectory has been endowed by the state, and weak institutions hav been made prosperous by similar endowments. It has become a matter of business, not of charity.

The vow of poverty has become a very comfortable thing. It means that so long as you liv you shall hav three square meals a day and a good bed and comfortable home. Those who take the vow of poverty never suffer real poverty. And it is a very pleasant thing for monks and nuns to hav the treasury of the state of New York to rely upon. Because Governor Cleveland vetoed a further appropriation to the Catholic Protectory he was fought by the ecclesiastical machine in 1884. Mr. Cleveland is a wise man, is a statesman, but he is also learning to become a practical politician, and so he sent a present to the pope, and one of the papers of this city said that was an especially wise thing to do, in view of the fact that the pope had some 8,000,000 subjects in this country—"subjects," mind you. And a year ago the head of the machine here had the hardihood to write to me forbidding me to attend any more political meetings without the consent of the Propaganda.

The ecclesiastical machine, whether in Rome or America, favors authority, aristocracy, even monarchy, as against liberty, democracy, republicanism. The public maintenance of Catholic charities has but begun, and if permitted to go on, there will be a union of church and state that will result in the destruction of both church and state. What business is it of that old man way off there in Rome to tell whether certain property shall be mortgaged off in Tacoma? This foreign control has almost destroyed the initiativ of the church and made children of the men and women in it. The test of Christianity is no longer piety, but submissivness to the authorities of the church.

A Pious Industry.

From the London Truth.

Are clergymen of the Church of England really unable to write their sermons themselvs? That many cannot do this is to be presumed, otherwise it would pay no one to send round circulars offeriug sermons. Here are some which hav just been received by a clergyman. The ten per cent commission on persuasiv charity sermons, with two men to collect the money, is, I think, a new feature in this business:

SMITH & Co., WASTE-PAPER DEALERS,
Plymouth, Exeter, Liverpool.

SERMONS! SERMONS!! SERMONS!!!

PREACHING MADE EASY TO ALL.

Messrs. Smith & Co., of Plymouth, Exeter, and Liverpool, beg to inform the evangelical clergy of the established church that they hav again purchased for cash another large quantity of old sermons, both in manuscript and lithograph.

It is well known that S. & Co. are by far the largest and cheapest dealers in waste-paper, etc., in the world.

SPECIAL PRICES.

Lot A. Suitable for ordinary purposes. Slightly damaged. 28 lbs. for 1s. 6d., or 5s. per cwt.

Lot B. Assorted. Clean, readable, good value. 28 lbs. for 2s., or 7s. per cwt.

Lot C. Handpicked. Strongly recommended as cheapest and best in the end. Splendid value. Durable. 28 lbs. for 3s. 6d., or 12s. per cwt.

Cash must accompany order. Sacks, 1s. each, are returnable.

N.B.—Each sack contains 56 lbs., therefore 1s. must be added to remittance for every ½ cwt. ordered. Orders for the Sunday must reach us by Thursday.

SPECIALTY.

It will be remembered by our patrons that last year we advertised charity sermons at a nominal price, and guaranteed to be written by eminent men of the evangelical school. These were guaranteed under certain conditions to produce at least, with a middle-class congregation of say 600, £30. This department has been eminently successful. It is under strict personal supervision. On receipt of letter or telegram we dispatch to any distance two of our own men of most persuasiv manners. Suitably attired, they make the collection in church, and at its conclusion at once hand over the proceeds, less our charge as commission of ten per cent and third-class railway fares both ways. No other charges whatever. S. & Co. take all risks. These small charges are far more than covered by the extra amount collected, aided by our men's system, experience, and pleasing, persuasiv manners.

Letters received almost daily from delighted incumbents. We guarantee to double the usual collections in the agricultural districts. Telegraphic address, "Persuasiv," Plymouth.

FUNERAL SERMONS.

Messrs. Smith & Co. call the attention of their numerous customers with melancholy satisfaction to this new and important department. These sermons are supplied at 7d. each, post free, with suitable blanks at intervals for filling in by the purchaser, sex, age, incidents, characteristics, etc., of the deceased.

If required, Smith & Co. will undertake to prepare special sermons for these sad occasions at 2s. 6d. each. In ordering these giv all and minute particulars on the order forms specially supplied for this purpose. Smith & Co. cannot be held responsible for errors arising from the absence of these necessary instructions.

Sunday Laws.

Sunday laws are founded upon these assertions in the Bible: "And on the seventh day God ended the works which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which he had created and made." On the sixth day God created the first man, Adam. By tracing down the descendants of Adam, theologians clearly proved that the world was about eight thousand years old. Early in this century geologists, after studying the earth, came to the conclusion that the world was millions of years old, and published articles to that effect. These articles excited the indignant wrath of preachers in every land. They declared that geologists were Infidels, and that geology should not be studied in our schools and colleges. They laughed and sneered at the geologist. "The idea," they said, "of a puny man setting up his insignificant wisdom against the wisdom of God as revealed in his holy book!" Geologists, however, went quietly on their way, and paid no attention whatever to the preachers. They piled fact upon fact, proof upon proof, and argument upon argument until they convinced all intelligent men that they were right in their conclusions. What, then, did the preachers do? They opened their Bibles and made a wonderful discovery. They found out that a day does not mean a day at all, but means millions of years. But the Bible itself defines the meaning of the term, day. It says, "The evening and the morning were the first day." How can this definition apply to millions of years? Ordinary days are distinguished from each other by the rising and the setting of the sun. How were these long days marked out or separated from each other? When did the first day end and the second day commence? On the third day the earth brought forth grass and herbs yielding seeds and trees yielding fruit, and on the fourth day God made the sun and the moon. Are we to be seriously told that the earth was bright and beautiful, and adorned with countless trees and plants, for millions of years before it started out upon its first annual journey around the sun? The idea is perfectly absurd. Our preachers jump from the frying-pan into the fire, and, by saying that a day means millions of years, get into a worst predicament than when they maintained that God created the world in six ordinary days.

When Jesus was crucified, according to the New Testament, he arose from the dead and ascended into heaven. The people then believed that the earth was perfectly flat and that heaven was arched over the earth only a few miles high. Consequently, they could easily believe in the ascension of Jesus. We now, however, know that the earth is a globe, and that it revolves around the sun at a distance of many millions of miles. Hence it is hard for us to believe that a material body weighing a hundred and fifty pounds or more ever ascended up from this earth. Where, in the name of astronomy, did it go? What possible use can Jesus hav in heaven for the mouth and stomach, heart and lungs, arms and legs, and organs of generation of a man? Christians for about one hundred years observed two days—Saturday, because they were commanded to do so by the Old Testament; and Sunday, in memory of the resurrection and ascension of Jesus. In the course of time, however, they concluded to observe only Sunday. Our Sunday laws, then, are founded upon two propositions: that God made the world in six days, and rested on the seventh, and that Jesus was resurrected and ascended into heaven. The great majority of intelligent men throughout the world now believe both these propositions to be false. These fables cannot bear exposure to the light of the intelligence of the nineteenth century. Our Sunday laws, then, are founded upon false ideas, upon two absurd old fables, and are not entitled to the least consideration on the supposition that they are holy and divine, and hav been established by the almighty. We should regard them exactly and precisely as we regard all other human institutions.

In a republic, every man should be allowed, as far as practicable, to pursue happiness in his own way—in other words, he should hav the right to do anything he wants to do, anything he may think calculated to promote his happiness, provided he has due regard for the rights of other people. This seems to be a self-evident proposition. The advocates of Sunday laws, however, do not seem willing for us, who do not think as they do, to pursue happiness in our own way. They want to compel us to regulate our lives by their ideas of what is right or wrong. We naturally resent this interference on their part. We are perfectly willing to let them regulate their lives to suit themselvs, so long as they do not interfere with us, and we merely ask them to let us regulate our lives to suit ourselvs, so long as we do not interfere with them. This seems to be a very modest request on the part of some republican citizens to ask of others. Let us keep hands off each other; let them attend to their business, and we will attend to ours. We do not propose to interfere with them, and we are not willing for them to interfere with us. We are perfectly willing to let them spend Sunday to suit themselvs, and we merely ask them to let us spend Sunday to suit ourselvs. If they wish on a Sunday to listen to a Calvinist minister, who will prove to their satisfaction that they hav been selected by the almighty to be perfectly happy in heaven while untold millions of their fellow-creatures—their brothers and sisters—are suffering the torments of the damned in hell, we hav no objection. We do not propose to prevent them. We merely wonder how they can take any pleasure or satisfaction in listening to such a detestable, inhuman, blasphemous doctrin. If they choose to listen to a Methodist parson, as he tells them that their only chance to get to heaven is to wash themselvs clean in the blood of Jesus; that they must not depend for their future happiness upon leading clean, honest, useful lives, but must depend exclusivly upon the merits and atonement of their crucified savior, we are perfectly willing for them to do so. If Baptists wish to go to heaven by being dipped completely under water, let them be dipped and dip others to their hearts' content. If Catholics choose to go to church and bow down and cross themselvs when their master, the priest, shows them a little image and mutters a few Latin words which none of them understand, it is none of our business. If, on the other hand, we wish to go to a beer-garden and listen to a band of music and drink a glass or two of beer, or go to a theater, we ought to hav the right to do so. They hav no more right to dictate to us how we shall spend one-seventh of our time than we hav to dictate to them how they shall spend one-seventh of their time.

A great many advocates of Sunday laws pride themselvs upon their Puritanical descent. For my part, I hav very little use for Puritans. They are very apt to be narrow-minded, conceited, and bigoted. It is almost impossible to get the idea into their head that other people may be as intelligent and religious as themselvs. They came to this country to avoid persecution, and ever since hav shown a desire to persecute others who do not think as they do. They seem to be the lineal descendants of the priests, scribes, and Pharisees who persecuted and crucified Jesus because he was, as they said, a wine-bibber and gluttonous man, a friend of publicans and sinners, and a Sabbath-breaker. If the priests and Pharisees had not accused Jesus of being a Sabbath-breaker, they could not hav excited the multitude against him. The Jews were in the habit of stoning Sabbath-breakers to death, hence this particular charge greatly excited and enraged them. History teaches that there should be a separation of religion from government. All educated men know about the reign of Bloody Mary, the massacre of St. Bartholomew, of the tens of thousands of people who were tortured to death by the Inquisition, and of the hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children who were butchered by Charles the Fifth of Spain. There is still a close connection between the government and the church of England, and it is attended with great and obvious evils. When the prince of Wales becomes king he will be at the head of the church. He is a nice man to be at the head of a church, is he not? A certain nobleman is so contemptible that he has been expelled from the race-track by his fellow-gamblers, still he has at his disposal eleven livings in the church of England. We should profit by the lessons of history and the experience of other countries, and sever completely and forever this connection between government and religion.

In consequence of our Sunday laws, young men, mechanics, and clerks, after working hard all the week, are often compelled to spend their day of rest in a dull, gloomy manner in their rooms or in their cheap, unattractiv boarding-houses. I once heard a young man sadly exclaim, "A fellow can spend two weeks in Philadelphia any Sunday afternoon." A wealthy advocate of Sunday laws, after eating a luxurious dinner—to provide him with a rich, hot, luxurious dinner is of course an act of necessity—goes to his parlor, takes a nap, and then reads his paper, magazine, or novel, and so passes his time quite pleasantly. But young men, whose blood flows rapidly in their veins, need, and after a week's hard work are entitled to, more lively amusement. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. Our preachers want Jack to work hard all the week, and then on Sunday to come to church and hear them preach dull, prosy sermons in favor of a doctrin which for the last fifty years has been rejected by the most intelligent men of the world. "Every dog has its day," and the day of the orthodox Calvinist preacher is nearly over. The bright star of Socialism is rising in the East, and the preachers of the future will be Socialists, and will not worry themselvs about life to come, but will greatly concern themselvs about the earthly happiness of their fellow-men.

The advocates of Sunday laws predict great evils for our cities if these laws are modified. Are they justified by the experience of European cities in making these predictions? Paris is more than twice as large as Philadelphia. It is universally admitted to be the finest city in the world. Its citizens are noted for their intelligence and refinement. Medical students go from all parts of the world to study under the learned professors of that city. If you wish to find the most illustrious of painters, sculptors, and architects, you look for them in Paris. Where liv the most famous philosophers, lawyers, historians, novelists, dramatists, and actors? Where is the largest and best managed store in the world? What city can begin to compare with Paris in the beauty and brilliancy of its streets, the magnificence of its buildings, and the exquisit taste displayed in the squares and public gardens? Wealthy men and women travel thousands of miles to visit this charming city. Even our preachers who advocate so strenuously Sunday laws cross the ocean to luxuriate for a month or more in its beauties and pleasures. Are the Sunday laws as strict in Paris as they are in this country? Not at all. On the contrary, Sunday is the happiest and merriest day of the week. What nonsense, then, it is for the goody-goodies to predict the ruin of our cities if Sunday laws are modified, when Paris without any Sunday laws is the richest, most delightful, and most wonderful city in the world!

What is true of Paris is also true, in some degree, of Vienna and Berlin. Although these great and prosperous cities are not in a republic, they do not interfere with the happiness of their citizens by obnoxious and disagreeable Sunday laws. A German merchant on a Sunday will take his wife and children to a beer-garden and drink a glass or two of wine or beer, and never dream that he is committing a sin against his creator, and on a Monday will go to his store and be as honorable in his mercantil transactions as the great majority of the Puritans who shed tears over the desecration of the Sabbath. Indeed, there is many a man who shrieks and howls for Sunday laws whom I would not like to giv a chance to swindle me out of ten dollars on a Monday.

Advocates of Sunday laws tell us that nations that observe these laws prosper, and they exultingly point to the United States. It is time we are prosperous. But think of our resources; think of our expanse of country extending from ocean to ocean and from Maine to Florida; of our rolling hills and fertil valleys, our river bottoms, our immense forests, our vast prairies, and our incalculable wealth buried in the earth in the shape of gold, silver, iron, coal, and other minerals. With all these vast resources, how could we help being a rich and prosperous people? The idea, then, of attributing our prosperity to Sunday laws is not worthy of further notice.

Nations hav grown wealthy and powerful and prospered for centuries that never heard of a Sunday. Greece, under the rule of pagans, was a wonderful country, and produced many remarkable men. We hav no such men as Cymon, Pericles, Themistocles, Alcibiades, Aristides, Demosthenes, and a host of others whose lives hav been written by Plutarch, and we hav no such writers as Plutarch himself. The descendants of these illustrious pagans, after they hav enjoyed for centuries the blessings of the Catholic religion and the advantages of the Sabbath, are almost objects of contempt to the travelers who visit them. Look also at the republic of Rome. It started with a handful of men and conquered the whole civilized world. No Sabbath-observing country has ever produced more wonderful men than Scipio, Pompey the Great, Marius, Metellus, Cato, Cicero, Julius Cæsar, and Augustus Cæsar, to say nothing of Virgil and Horace, Sallust and Tacitus, whose works will last longer than the pyramids of Egypt. This great republic, it is true, became wealthy and corrupt, and was converted into an empire, but its decline was much more rapid after Constantine became converted and the Christian religion with its Sabbath was established. The Chinese occupy a country not as large as the United States and number 3,800,000,000, and their government has lasted for four thousand years. Forty million Japanese dwell upon a number of beautiful islands. They know and care nothing about Sunday, but are a quiet, peaceable, industrious, affectionate, and contented people, and for my part I think they are quite as religious and good as we Americans. These ancient and modern nations show that it is possible for people to liv, prosper, and be happy in complete ignorance of Sunday and its laws.

A day is caused by the revolution of this earth upon its axis. When we reflect upon the teachings of astronomy, and realize that all the stars are suns, many of them much larger than our sun, and that the number of the worlds in the universe is simply infinit, does it not seem absurd in our theologists to tell us that the ruler of all these worlds cares any more for the seventh revolution of this little planet upon its axis than he does for the other six? All nature works on a Sunday. The wind blows, it rains and it snows, water flows, trees grow, and animals become hungry and eat on that day. The sun is the source of all heat, life, and motion on this earth, and, I suppose, upon the other planets. It is the sun which makes steam-engins, wind-wheels, and water-wheels work. Coal, the motiv power of steam-en-gins, was once wood which grew under the influence of the rays of the sun. The sun makes the wind blow and raises the water from the ocean. The sun does more work in one day than the whole human race could do in centuries. The sun works right along, day after day, and does not care a tinker's damn for Sunday. Perhaps our theologians will tell us that the almighty makes the sun work six days, and that the devil steps in and makes it work on the Sabbath. The fact that nature has no regard for the seventh day practically givs the lie to the spirit that animates Sunday laws.

The Bible tells us that God rested upon the seventh day. This is evidently a human and not a divine idea. The idea of the creator resting and rejoicing in his day of rest, like a poor, weak, tired man, is not only absurd, but really blasphemous. Besides, the universe is not yet created. Matter is continually changing its form, and for all that human reason can see to the contrary, it will continue to change its form for all eternity.

Are Sunday laws just? Do they not infringe upon the religious rights of many citizens? There are a great many Jews in this country and a number of Seventh Day Baptists. They think Saturday is the day which the almighty requires them to keep sacred and holy, and that he absolutely commands them to work on Sunday and the other five days. Sunday laws prevent them from doing what their religion requires them to do, namely, to work on Sunday, and practically compels them to violate Saturday, which is their Sabbath. In these days of competition a Jewish merchant or manufacturer cannot afford to lose two days in the week, when his Christian competitor loses only one. The Constitution guarantees to every citizen the right to worship his creator in his own way, hence our Sunday laws violate the spirit of the Constitution, because they practically prevent Jews from worshiping their Jehovah as they would like to worship him. Admitting that the majority must rule, I still maintain that the minority hav some rights which the majority should respect. If the majority are not animated by the spirit of justice, they can be as cruel and tyrannical as a Nero or a Caligula. I read some months since a sad story of a Seventh Day Baptist. He was a young man, and had a young and delicate wife and a little baby. He went to Arkansas and bought a small farm, as he was quite poor. As his religion required him to do, he plowed his field on a Sunday. This act excited the holy wrath and pious indignation of his neighbors, who were good orthodox Methodists and Presbyterians. They had the young man arrested and thrown into jail, and the sheriff sold his only horse and cow to pay his fine. The poor young wife, being delicate and in a land of strangers, wept and lamented until the angel of death came to her relief, and her baby also died. When the young man came out of jail he sold his little farm for what he could get for it, and moved away to dwell, it is to be hoped, among people who had a little less religion and a little more charity. The Gospel According to Common Sense.

JESUS CHRIST.

Such extraordinary stories hav been handed down to us respecting this remarkable individual that, if I were requested to believe them with the alternativ of being damned, I should unhesitatingly reject the whole as fabulous. As it is, I am inclined to admit that there is a thin substratum of fact in the story given in the New Testament, and the fiction originated in an attempt on the part of the biographers of Jesus to explain and prove what he said and predicted, the result being a fable so utterly repugnant to common sense as to throw grave discredit on the story altogether. It cannot even be proved that these biographers were contemporaries and eye-witnesses, like Plato to Socrates, or Boswell to Dr. Johnson. The oldest MSS. known date two or three centuries after the events recorded, and it is strange that the church of Rome, who has carefully and religiously preserved sundry bones and pieces of wood that prove nothing, cannot produce a single scrap of the original handwriting of the Holy Ghost, which would at once settle the question of authenticity. We cannot admit the assumed testimony of Josephus to be genuin, for it evidently refutes itself. If Josephus had considered Jesus to be an impostor, he would not hav said that he was the messiah. If he had believed him to be the messiah, it is not likely that he would hav been dumped in a short paragraph and damned with faint praise.

When Jesus proclaimed himself to be the son of God and equal to his father, he quoted scripture warrant for the assertion, and it is impossible to disprove it. If we admit that Jesus was a legitimate son of Joseph, and not a byblow of the Holy Ghost, as generally believed, we read that Joseph was the son of so and so, which was the son of so and so, "which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God!" Now, if the first man recorded in history was a son of God, he was necessarily a God himself, for all living beings beget and produce after their own kind. It is said, moreover, that "God made man after his own image." The infant son of a Freethinker, a bright and intelligent boy of four years, whose religious education had been sadly neglected, was once asked by a pious maiden lady, "Can you tell me, child, who made you?" The proper reply, according to Dr. Watts, would hav been, "The great God who made heaven and earth." The parents of the child had been too discreet to tell him the truth, and too conscientious to teach him a falsehood, but he innocently blurted out, "Papa and mamma!" to the great confusion of his catechiser. It was evident the child knew intuitivly as much about the matter as she did, if not more. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings," etc. When I was myself a child, among my playmates was a half-witted boy, several years older than myself, who served as a perpetual butt for practical jokes. "Tom, what are your eyes made of?" I asked him one day. Tom reverently lifted the pupils and lowered the lids of the organs in question (he was a very pious boy), and gravely answered, "Dust." Now, if the scriptures be true, Tom's answer was correct, and it was considered a remarkable answer for an idiot, but, superstition apart, none but an idiot would hav made it.

If the biographers of Jesus had confined themselvs to a record of his sayings and doings, their work had been more respectable, for there is much in his conversation and behavior that commands the admiration and respect even of those who do not care to imitate him. But they unfortunately attempted a pedigree, and tried to prove too much. Here they failed, it may be said, ludicrously. The two genealogies do not agree, either in the number of generations or in the names of their representativs. And having taken the trouble to trace the presumed father of Jesus back to Adam, they gravely tell us that Joseph was not the real father of Jesus after all, but that the latter was "conceived of the Holy Ghost." Such a story would not do in the present day to account for the faux pas of a female saint. I hav known it tried on in more than one instance, but it did not succeed. It usually givs rise to scandal affecting the saint's spiritual director, and is not unfrequently brought home to him. I am inclined to think that Mary was a respectable woman, and did not originate the story herself, but that it was invented for the purpose of supporting an absurd theory, and borrowed from pagan mythology. But the pagan Jupiter was more discreet in his amours than the God of the Jews. He did not, as a rule, make cuckolds of his worshipers or meddle with married women. It is worthy of note that the Hebrew Jehovah broke two of his own laws, adultery and bestiality being punishable with death by stoning and burning. Jupiter assumed the form of a swan, but Jehovah that of a pigeon. The result of the amour was a lamb! It was high time there was a change in the breed of gods. Jesus, at any rate, had something human about him, but a more inhuman God than Jehovah never was known. He created the world for his own pleasure on purpose to damn it; repented that he had made man, and drowned nearly the whole of the human race in a fit of spleen. Ultimately, he chose a favored race, because their ancestor was willing to commit an unnatural crime at his bidding, and found in the long run that they turned out worse than the peoples he had dispossessed for their sakes.

The humanity of "God the son" was conspicuous from the first. He repealed the inhuman laws of God-the father, and his treatment of the case of the woman taken in adultery is the brightest chapter in his history. John the Baptist is reported to have said, "Behold the lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." This is, however, a mistranslation, as I will readily prove. It has been already shown that the serpent is a Hebrew idiom signifying common sense. The lamb is a Hebrew idiom signifying harmlessness. Whether John spoke in Hebrew or in Greek it is not our purpose to inquire. The Greek word given by the New Testament is an evident abbreviation of the word in that language signifying weakness, gentleness, and general harmlessness. John was no stranger to Jesus. They had met and talked the matter over before. What he said amounted to this: "Here is a harmless God, a friend of sinners, who promises to forgiv and forget the past if you will turn over a new leaf." The anthropophagical followers of Jesus chose rather to animalize their God and convert him into something good to eat. He was the antitype of the paschal lamb. "Christ, our passover, is sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast." Outis.

The Duty of The Truth Seeker Family.

One of my most valued possessions is a complete file of The Truth Seeker from the time of the attack upon Mr. Bennett. I first subscribed when Mr. Bennett was in prison, but I procured the prior numbers extending back to the "beginning of strife." I often look over these old numbers with interest and advantage, and a recent examination of them has shown me that Mr. E. C. Walker, one of the editors of Lucifer, was in those dark days a stanch and constant friend of Mr. Bennett's. Many a good letter from him and many evidences of his zealous effort are to be found in those old columns.

Mr. Walker and his associate editors of Lucifer are now attacked in the same way that Mr. Bennett was, by the same infamous gang, under the same infamous law, with as little fairness and reason, and for the same covert purpose. The object is to silence Lucifer now, just the same as it was the object to silence The Truth Seeker then. Had it not been for the fidelity of such men as Mr. Walker it is just possible that the designs of The Truth Seeker's enemies might hav succeeded.

I therefore ask you to call upon each faithful member of The Truth Seeker family to put forth some individual effort on behalf of the editors now assailed. "Those who make and stand the brunt of the test cases of liberty must never be deserted when under fire." If there be any such sentiment as gratitude left in the human heart, The Truth Seeker family ought now to prove their gratitude by returning with ample accumulation ten thousand fold the good will and good work that Mr. Walker generously and freely bestowed upon The Truth Seeker in its hour of peril. Lewis Masquerier.

Honor to him who, self-complete, alone,
Carves to the grave a pathway all his own,
And heeding not what men may think or say,
Asks but himself, if doubtful of the way.

One by one the aged reformers pass into the bygone eternity and leave us. All along the road by which we hav come lie the graves of the good and the true—none better or truer than our aged brother Lewis Masquerier. None hav ever worked more faithfully and unselfishly for the good of their kind.

To repeat, even in brief, all that he has done would take too much space. So I will merely say his special works were devoted to three ends. First, the idea of dividing the whole world up into farmsteads that should be inalienable, thus securing homes and food for every one of earth's children. His next great work was inventing what he called "the only perfect alphabet and key of all languages;" and then comes in his "Code of Rights and Wrongs." Probably the last will prove, in the long run, the most practicable of the three.

Like myself, he was interested in the subject of Spiritualism, and about as skeptical as regards the idea of a future or continued existence, so when he heard I was going North on a trip of investigation, he offered me a home with himself and Patience, and did all he could toward helping me find what proved to us unfindable—some real phenomena that should speak of the shadowy summer-land of souls; but we found nothing at all.

Yet I found a grand and noble woman in Patience, and a kind, good, honest, wise, and truly benevolent man in Lewis Masquerier, and he, too, must hav been favorably impressed with Elmina, as he proposed to make me his heir if I would bind myself to carry out his plans and wishes.

But I was lacking in comprehension, or there were flaws in the plans; for I would not feel that I was qualified to do justice to his generous offer.

I am truly glad his mantle has fallen upon friend Lant, who will doubtless prove a worthy successor, and will revere the memory of the good old man by working out conscientiously all that is practicable in those plans that were so near and dear to his heart.

Few hav lived so long, so pure, so blameless, and witbal so useful a life as Lewis Masquerier.

He was as guileless, innocent, and trusting as a child, and yet he was a shrewd, sharp, and philosophical thinker.

"An honest man has gone to rest," leaving the immortality of a good life and good works behind him.

In the romance of his farmsteads realized, we dream of Emerson's beautiful picture of Green orchard boughs

Fended from the heat,
Where the statesman plows
Furrow for the wheat.
When the church is social worth,
When the state house is the hearth,
Then the perfect state is come,
The republican at home.

Elmina Drake Slenker.

[In the notice of the death of Lewis Masquerier printed recently an error of statement occurred. Mr. Masquerier left his real estate to John A. Lant, presenting him with a deed of it before his death. His personal property amounted to but little more than sufficient to pay the funeral expenses. Mr. Lant has for many years been Mr. Masquerier's closest friend. He is the publisher of the Record of the Times at Tarrytown, N. Y., and will be remembered as one of Comstock's victims.—Ed. T. Education in Massachusetts.

Massachusetts, according to the Boston correspondent of the New York Herald, will get this winter, on the floors of House and Senate, such a rustling of her dry bones as she has not had since Butler ran for governor. The fight will be on the school question, precipitated by the legislativ committee on child labor, which, after recommending the passage of an act prohibiting the employment in shops of children under twelve years of age, and recommending their compulsory attendance at school, says:

"Either we must abandon our theory of compulsory education up to a prescribed standard, or we must determin, through our educational authorities, whether private schools come up to this standard, and must giv such authorities all necessary powers, and impose upon them all necessary duties, for the full accomplishment of this end. After full consideration the committee therefore recommends:

"1. That all private schools be required to register and return lists of their pupils, with a record of their attendance.

"2. That the school committee be required to visit and examin personally or by agent all such private schools, to pass a vote annually approving or refusing to approve each one.

"3. That after September 1, 1889, no such private school be approved unless taught by teachers holding certificates of qualification obtained from the school committee, as is required of teachers in the public schools."

The Protestants aver that in this third section is seen the trail of the Jesuit serpent. If teachers in parochial schools, they say, must hav certificates from the school boards, the state thus places its stamp of approval on what is taught in the Catholic schools, and it is but a short step from that to the granting of state aid to sectarian institutions. It is claimed that the Catholic opposition to the measure is hypocritical, and that the wily Jesuits hav made their first open move for the recognition of their religion by the state.

On the other hand, the Catholic legislators denounce the proposed bill as a blow aimed at parochial schools, for although parochial schools are not mentioned, it is asserted they are meant by the words "private schools." They urge that it would be an indignity not to be tolerated to force the nuns and sisters of charity to come publicly forward to be examined by the school boards—"something entirely opposed to their modest and retiring habits."

To an outsider it looks as though both may be right about the ultimate effect of the bill. If the state supervises parochial schools, and insists upon efficient instruction, the maintainers of the school may with some plausibility ask for financial aid to build the school up to the level demanded. The church will say that both she and the parents are satisfied with the minimum of secular instruction, and if the rest of the world desire more, why, the rest of the world can pay for it. And here, too, is where the bill hurts the parochial schools, for if the teachers are to be examined, and none but competent ones employed, the nuns and sisters of charity will hav to go. They hav, says Dr. McGlynn, no qualification but their garb; but a black dress and bonnet are not considered by most people a sufficient certificate of competency to teach school.

Neither ecclesiastics nor laymen would tell the reporter what they thought of the bill, and he concluded that this reticence "may or may not be significant." But certain it is that the school question is up for discussion in Massachusetts this winter, and it has come up almost entirely because of the universal action of the priests in carrying out the orders of the Baltimore Catholic council to establish parochial schools, which in very many instances hav had the effect of withdrawing a majority of the scholars from the public institutions. In this discussion there will be four parties—(1) the orthodox Roman Catholics; (2) the heterodox Catholics, who know the public schools to be good, and the parochial schools to be poor, and who desire their children to hav a real education; (3) the Protestant and Infidel upholders of the public schools, who wish to not only sustain the present mode of education, but to improve it by abolishing all religious instruction; and (4) the reactionary Protestants who follow the late Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, and consider that "education involves the training of the whole man and of all his faculties, of the conscience and of the affections as well as of the intellect," and "that it is absolutely impossible to separate religious ideas from the great mass of human knowledge," and therefore "every school must of necessity be either Christian or unchristian, and that there is no such thing as a neutral education. To be neutral in religion it must be imperfect and faulty—indeed, no education at all." This is essentially the orthodox Roman Catholic creed for schools, and the church insists upon the right to teach the children of the church, as religion is of superior importance to secular education.

The objects of the second and third parties are sufficiently plain. The first and fourth classes are in a muddle. The Catholics hav attempted to get out of the muddle by establishing parochial schools, but the expense of maintaining them is so great that they will never cease their efforts to accomplish their purpose through another method, which is outlined in a recent number of the Catholic World as follows:

"A plan by which religion could be introduced into the schools is the same which now is in use in the asylums, etc., the denomination starting and managing the school, and the state paying for results in the secular branches. If the state wishes to regulate the secular studies, another plan of compromise, although not as suitable, might be accepted by us. Let the state appoint Catholic teachers for Catholic children, and Protestant teachers for Protestant children, prescribing the present neutral system of education for certain hours of the school day, and giving also a fixed hour or hours for daily religious instruction. To do this the state need not recognize any church, but can and should take cognizance of the preferences of the parents. By doing it, it is not 'illogical or unjust,' since in other matters it does it continually. It is by the influence of somebody that teachers are now appointed.

"According to the plan in use in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., the teachers are Catholics in public schools Nos. 11 and 12, just as they are Protestants in the other schools under the same board. The following is the order of the daily exercises:

"8:45.—Morning prayers.
"9 to 12.—Regular secular course as in other schools.
"12.—Short prayer; then recess.
"1 P.M.—Religious instruction.
"1:30.—Regular secular course.
"3.—Closing religious exercises.

"The state school hours are from 9 to 12 and 1:30 to 3, and no child is compelled to be at the religious exercises unless by its own parents' desire. If a Protestant wishes to send his child to the Catholic public school he may do so, and it is taught in precisely the same way as it is now in the ordinary public school. There is no interference with it. At the same time the Catholic children hav teachers who are able to giv them the religious instruction and influence which their parents desire them to receive, and which they do receive outside of state school hours. In Poughkeepsie the way this has been managed was by the church letting buildings owned by itself to the board of education for their school hours only. Where the school-houses belong to the churches this could be done generally, so that the state may be exempted from all expense for religious instruction. Where, on the other hand, the state owns the school-house, the church could pay rent for its use, as for a furnished room, during the hours appointed for religious instruction only. The vital point is the teacher. A child is like plastic clay in the hands of a teacher, and learns its lesson not only with its ears but with its eyes also; what the teacher does it will do; what she omits to do it will omit; what she has no belief in or respect for the child will not believe in or reverence; or it will try to serve two masters, the parent and the teacher, and, serving neither, will emerge an Infidel from this unnatural process of training. For it will not regard as truth to be accepted and acted upon a doctrin about which two such great authorities disagree."

The principles of Dr. Hodge and his followers are much more briefly stated. They are that "the system of public schools must be held, in their sphere, true to the claims of Christianity, or they must go, with all other enemies of Christ, to the wall." Dr. Hodge held, and the Catholic church authorities now hold, that the people of the United States are going straight to the devil through the public school system. Dr. Hodge said:

"The infinit evils resulting from the exclusion of religion from the schools cannot be corrected by the supplementary agencies of the Christian home, the Sabbath-school, and the church. This follows not only because the activities of the public school are universal, and that of all the other agencies partial, but chiefly because the Sabbath-school and church cannot teach history and science, and therefore cannot rectify the antichristian history and science taught by the public schools. And, if they could, a Christian history and science on the one hand cannot coalesce with and counteract an Atheistic history and science on the other. Poison and its antidote together never constitute nutritious food. And it is madness to attempt the universal distribution of poison on the ground that other parties are endeavoring to furnish a partial distribution of an imperfect antidote."

The Catholic World concludes its account of the "Poughkeepsie plan" with these words:

"At present the people of the United States, Catholic and non-Catholic, are, no doubt unintentionally, lavishly spending their money in aid of indifferentism and Freethinking, and if it goes on much longer it must soon break up this free republic, which, founded by Christians, can only be perpetuated by Christians."

The reactionary Protestants and the Catholics would break up our public school system—as indeed the latter hav already done in many places—unless religion is taught in the schools. Both are, therefore, deadly enemies of the republic, and should be so recognized. If Massachusetts is destined to be the first state to face this danger and to attempt a settlement of the question, let us hope there is enough patriotism and wisdom among her lawmakers to pursue the right course, and to neither infringe personal liberty nor yield to ecclesiastical clamor because it is backed by the suffrages of ignorance.

Comstock Squelched.

It givs us unqualified pleasure to be able to report that Anthony Comstock has been sat down upon hard by a Philadelphia court. It seems that in January, 1887, after the Mueller conviction in this city, the Philadelphia Society for the Suppression of Vice sent for Comstock to visit that city and do some suppressing. He went. Pretending to be an artist, and giving the dealers an envelope with an artist's card upon it, he purchased several dozen copies of photographs, which he placed before a grand jury, who found indictments against several art-dealers. The cases were called last week before Judge Biddle. Comstock was the principal witness in each case. One man was discharged because he was an employee and not responsible for the sales of the indicted firm. As the next case was progressing, the prosecutor interrupted the proceedings to say: "I hav not had time to consult with the district attorney in this case, but I think I will be justified in not pressing it. I am here to perform a duty, and I am a moral coward if I refuse to do it, but it cannot be the wish of the state to destroy art. I believe in the Bible and God, and I know he made nothing imperfect. He made man in his own image, and by the fall of man alone came indecency. However, I cannot reconcile my mind that the pictures before me are indecent. They are of the highest state of art, and the man who says they are obscene ought to go to a less civilized community than Philadelphia. I cannot press the case, but will leave the matter in the hands of the court."

To this pretty plain intimation of the prosecutor that the cases were of a kind with which he wanted nothing more to do, Judge Biddle responded: "It is not very easy to define actually what the terms 'nude and obscene' mean. In every Catholic house in the country there is a nude representation of Christ, and the pictures of Adam and Eve are familiar to all. Nude pictures are not necessarily lewd or indecent. Where there is an intention to corrupt the public by the sale of indecent pictures there ought to be severe punishment, but this is not a case of that kind. It won't do and it seems absurd for New York detectivs to come over here and try to demonstrate that recognized works of art are obscene."

The jury found a verdict of not guilty, and Comstock arose in wrath. "I want to say," he went on, "that after the pictures were obtained they were submitted to the district attorney, and that under his advice, and in the discharge of my sacred duty, I had the indictments found. I will also add that these pictures are the same which the New York Court of Errors and Appeals decided to be obscene." Three more cases were called, two of which were dismissed without any testimony at all. The other defendant was discharged for irresponsibility for the sales made to Comstock.

The "New York detectiv" came back to this city a sadder but not a wiser man. He will never learn that he is an anachronism, a survival of puritanism, and if he could hav his way the scenes depicted by Mr. Heston in our first page would be realities.

Utah and India.

In the United States, as everybody knows, the Protestant church desires to punish polygamy by imprisonment. To do this it has caused laws of great severity of penalty to be passed, and scores of polygamous Mormons are now in jail expiating their religious offense against morality and their Christian brethren. It is no odds to the Protestant church that the man's wives are left destitute; that they are old and helpless; that they do not object to the plural partner; that the putting away of the subsequent editions of matrimonial joys would be rank injustice and cruelty—no excuse, in short, is accepted by the Protestant church which is now prosecuting the Mormons.

But how is it with these Paulists in other lands? Are they as rigidly moral in India as in Utah? The answer is given by the Rev. Edward A. Laurence in the Andover Review, in considering "what shall be the treatment of converted polygamists." He says:

"The opinion of missionaries on this subject is much divided and the matter has been discussed at various conferences. An excellent statement of both sides of the question is made in the Indian Evangelical Review of April, 1886, by the Rev. J. J. Lucas, who has taken pains to inform himself of the opinions of many leading missionaries. My own impression, formed from conversation with a large number, is that a majority of the missionaries in India, especially of those longest in the field, would decline to advise a man to dismiss one of two wives, and that many of them would baptize him in that state, while protesting against polygamy as unchristian.

"To more than sixty representativs of different missions Mr. Lucas sent the question: 'Would you, under any circumstances, baptize a convert with more than one wife, allowing him to retain his wives?' From the great majority there came back an answer in the affirmativ. Some of these hav baptized such converts; others hav been deterred only by the rules of their societies. Here is one case: A man professing to be a Christian requested baptism. He was deemed worthy to be received into the church. He had, however, two wives. His first wife, then an old woman, had no children. She, I believe, had urged her husband to take a second wife. By this last marriage he had five or six children. The first wife seemed as fond of the children as their own mother. Which of these wives, then, should be put away? We did not require him to dismiss either of them.

"The Rev. Dr. Bissell, of Ahmednagar, reports: 'The reason for taking the second wife is, in the majority of cases, because the first wife is barren, or her children are girls, or they hav died in childhood. In view of these difficulties I began to doubt whether I had a right to insist that a man should send away his second wife and all his children as a condition of baptism. To do this would be in effect a refusal to receive him to the church. I hav in two instances baptized men with two wives, doing this with instructions as to the nature of this relation and what is required by the teaching of Christ, so that it is understood that we only allow it under protest. Mr. Lucas himself opposes baptism in such a case, because of the apparent sanction given to polygamy, the temptation laid in the way of inquirers, the formation of two classes of Christians within the church, and the injury done to the church itself. Yet he would not ask the husband to put away either wife, but would say, 'Wait. Your first outward step toward Christ must not be marred by a cruel wrong and flagrant injustice. Wait, holding fast your faith, and time will bring a change.' Yet, as Mr. Lucas admits, the majority of missionaries, if left free to act, would go further than this, though leaving much to be determined by the circumstances of the case."

Here we see the duplicity of that religion which is all things to all men and catches you with guile. In Utah polygamists must go to jail. In India they must come into the church. Would the Protestants receive into communion all the Mormons if they would join the Presbyterian church? No doubt the Mormons can giv as good reasons for taking the second wife as can the Indians. But when did childlessness become in the Christian church a justification for polygamy? We read of these things in the Old Testament, and it is upon that book that the Mormons base their religious institutions. But if we recollect slightly, the Sarahs of old had little compassion for the Hagars, and the Abrahams were less kind than the heathen converts. There is scripture justification for the course of the missionaries, but the scheme did not work well enough to make its continuance desirable.

But the gist of the matter lies elsewhere. To refuse baptism to a polygamist would be to keep him out of the church. The heathen was not mean enough to thrust out upon the world a weak and helpless woman; he would rather go to hell with those he loved than gain heaven by another's suffering. The heathen has a heart. But the missionary had to hav a convert. He was paid for getting converts. His bread and butter was at stake. His salary depended upon a lot of spectacled old gentlemen of Massachusetts who demanded saved souls in return. It was the case of the boy and the woodchuck when the preacher was coming to dinner over again. The little wall of prejudice against polygamy came down, and the missionary counts another soul upon whose "conversion" he gets the regular commission. Not only one, but two—as many as come—and this is the practice of not only one missionary, but of a majority of them; and not only of one sect, but of all sects. Competition among purchasers makes prices high; among common carriers to heaven it makes rates low and accommodation easy.

It has been the boast of Christians that no wrongdoer could get to heaven till he repented and made such reparation as he could. Now, polygamy is either right or wrong; the convert's repentance must be shown by his work; the method of his reparation is plain. But there is no repentance, no reparation, and the man is assured of eternal salvation. The "under protest" clause may salve the conscience of the missionary, but what will the court of appeal say? How will it render its decision? Do the precedents of the Old Testament saints constitute a common law of sufficient power to pull the heathen through, or will the more recent rulings be a bar to his entrance upon the joys of the blest? These are questions which we do not see how the missionaries or the Andover Board can answer, any more than they can settle the second probation question.

But what we want to know is, why should the polygamists of Utah be put in jail and the polygamists of India received into the church? Is it because the Mormon has got the best of the biblical argument with the Protestants, or is it because the church needs some converts with which to draw money from the pockets of believers?

Editorial Notes.

THE strike at the Clark thread works, near Newark, whereby some two hundred girls were out of employment, has been settled by the interference of the Catholic priest of the parish, who said that his efforts were made in the interest of his church, to which the operativs and their friends employed in other factories contributed $25,000 annually. Without work they could not giv; therefore he advised his people to accept the employers' terms. Unselfish priest!

A PETITION was got up recently by a stockholder of the Fifth avenue stage line against the running of stages on Sunday. It was signed by clergymen and wealthy people who own carriages, and consequently do not need to use the stages. The directors of the company, however, hav decided to try the experiment. The stages will be run on Sundays as on week-days—as long as it proves profitable. The employees of the company are all in favor of Sunday work.

THE Jewish Messenger grows sarcastic and says: "A Boston correspondent of the Evangelist, in a kindly notice of the proposed Home for Aged and Infirm Hebrews in that city, refers to the gift of an estate by Hon. Leopold Morse for that purpose, and then adds: 'Blessed be the helping hand of Christianity, in whatever form it may bestow its heaven-sent gifts.' We fail to see what 'the helping hand of Christianity' has to do with the matter. Mr. Morse is glad to acknowledge that he is a Hebrew."

HELEN GARDENER was telling a funny story to a party of friends, a few days ago, and while the laughter was at its loudest, a rather prim lady, on the shady side of fifty, who is the wife of a clergyman, joined the group and asked what they were all laughing at. One of the gentlemen said: "Oh, at one of Miss Gardener's irresistibly comical yarns about the burning need for a revised theology." The lady braced herself, and with the air of a conqueror, looked Miss Gardener directly in the eyes and made the following crushing argument: "Miss Gardener had much better let theology alone. It was revised to a nicety and settled, finally, long before she was born." "So was slavery," retorted Miss Gardener, with her merriest twinkle. "I fail to see the application," said Mrs. Clergyman. "Really?" interrogated Miss Gardener; "then the case is hopeless. But let us talk of something else—something that has changed or improved since I was born—something that has a present and a future; for if you are right, theology is absolutely the only topic known to man that is in that pathetically hopeless condition when it has only a past. I did not know it was so sad as that. Let us talk of something more cheerful. How do you like the new monument——?" But a shout of laughter drowned the rest of it, and the subject was dextrously changed.

IN Garibaldi's Memoirs, which will soon appear in English, occurs this opinion of the priests: "The priest is the real scourge of God in Italy. He keeps a cowardly government in the most humiliating degradation, and strengthens himself amidst the corruption and misery of the people. In France he urges that unhappy nation to war, and in Spain, worse still, he spurs on toward civil war the leading bands of fanatics, and is spreading extermination everywhere."

THE Independent wants to know what the Churchman means by describing Dr. Field, in writing of his open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, as "the doctor with a heredity of Calvinistic background for his theogony." It means, dear Independent, that all the Calvinism there is about Dr. Field is a slight trace of ancestral fear of John Calvin's God. On his own account, Dr. Field is not a Presbyterian. If he had known as fully six months ago where he stands, we do not believe he would hav written that open letter. And if the Presbyterian church had at the time known the result of the controversy he began as well as it knows it now, we believe that the doctor would somehow hav been induced to remain silent.

THE wonderful ingenuity of biblical exegetists is shown in the following inquiry sent to the Christian Advocate:

"Is it certain that the words, 'Drink no longer water, but drink a little wine,' are properly translated as of literal water and of literal wine? Are there not places in the Bible where 'milk' and 'wine' do not mean literal milk and literal wine? And, as in this place Paul was speaking to Timothy to instruct him in the necessity of caution in the selection of church officers, why might it not be supposed that he used 'wine' and 'water' in the spiritual sense, and that the 'wine' meant to get persons of an energetic and vigorous character?"

Dr. Buckley declines, however, to get out of a bad hole in that way. He says that if Paul's advice to Timothy was not literal then no one can form any idea of anything in the Bible. How Paul's advice consists with his own Prohibition principles he fails to state.

THE Tribune, of this city, is responsible for the following: "A copy of the Bible always lies on the office desk of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. The reason of this is that he prepares his lectures and newspaper articles at his office, and this is the only work of reference which he keeps at hand. He dictates to a stenographer when preparing a lecture or article, stopping occasionally to think, frequently going back to change or correct a phrase, or again talking impetuously and rapidly. After the stenographer has put his dictation into type-written manuscript, the colonel goes over it with the utmost care and painstaking, making numerous corrections and emendations. Then he has it all rewritten on the typewriter, when he goes over it a second time with equal care. Sometimes three or four manuscripts are thus prepared for him before he is satisfied. A stenographer who has done a great deal of work for Colonel Ingersoll says that outside the Bible he uses no reference books or memoranda. Whatever he desires to say, even to quotations, is stored away in his great head. Many persons take it upon themselvs to attempt to convert Colonel Ingersoll from his Atheism. They make their efforts both in person and by mail, in letters and pamphlets. The other day the colonel received a pamphlet entitled, "Sure Cure for Atheists." He replied to the sender by returning the book with the comment that it was as full of errors as the book it sought to defend, and that he could not think of retaining it, because a single perusal was sufficient assurance that its only earthly object was to minister to the vanity of its author. Several times women of severe garb and countenance hav besieged Colonel Ingersoll's office intent on bringing him into the Christian fold. These are generally put off by the office boy, who has come to know unerringly all such visitors. One pretty little Salvation Army woman in a poke bonnet pleaded earnestly once to gain the colonel's presence, declaring pathetically that she knew she could convert him if she could only be allowed to pray with him."

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG will lecture in Texas during the remainder of the winter. He has engagements at Galveston, San Antonio, Austin, Dallas, Fort Worth, Waco, Sherman, Gainesville, Paris, Bowie, Henrietta, Brownwood, Graham, Desdemona, Burnett, San Angelo, Goldthwaite, Moody, Mansfield, Kerens, Mount Pleasant, Marquez, Hempstead, Columbus, and Victoria.

Obituary.

Mr. F. F. Follet died January 4th, in Chicago, after an illness of one week. The immediate cause of his taking-off was pneumonia. He was in his sixty-fifth year, although one would hav taken him, from his decrepit appearance, to hav been much older. He was aware that his life was rapidly drawing to a close, but he did not recant, but passed away as tranquilly as a babe falls asleep in its mother's arms. He was a Liberal Spiritualist, nay, more, he was an Anarchist, and was ready and capable at all times to defend the principles of Anarchy. The Liberals of Illinois will remember the three years he spent in traveling over this state organizing Liberal Leagues and distributing Freethought literature, all at his own expense. In this work he exhausted his limited resources, and four years ago came to Chicago to liv. He started a small business in the book trade, and built up quite a business in that time. He left a will in favor of Mr. A. F Hart, of Rockford, Ill., who came on after his death an took his body to Rockford to be laid by the side of his wife He was buried without a funeral. Not a word was said a his grave, and no obituary notice has appeared from th hands of those to whom he left his little all. Another instance of how Christians bury Infidels. W. S. BELL.

Letters from Friends.

SHARON, KAN., Jan. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say to you that I agree with all those that indorse the stand you hav taken for liberty and the right. I think the pictures a good way to reach the young folks, and lots of the old ones as well. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better every day. As I hav informed you before, I saw it first about the time Mr. Bennett was tried by Benedict, and hav been a constant reader of it ever since. I now consider it the best paper I ever saw. J. D. FAIR.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Jan. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please send me a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, for which please find inclosed 25 cents?

I am glad you speak well of those noble heroes who were hanged at Chicago. Of course, they should hav a monument, as Mr. J. S. Arthur says. It is to be hoped their friends will get them one. They were true men of the people, and died bravely. Every true Liberal should honor them. I would like them to hav a monument, like that of Washington, 592 feet in hight, at a cost of $1,187,710; weight, 81.000 tons. They deserve it. They died for humanity. Yours for the glorious cause of liberty,

J. E. WELCH.

DELAVAN, MINN., Jan. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav delayed longer than I ought in sending in my amount for the next year, trying to get another name to send along with mine. I hav made it a point the last four times I hav renewed my subscription to send you a new name for your subscription books each time. I think nearly every reader of your paper could do as well, with a little effort, and in the aggregate the result would be highly satisfactory to the publishers as well as the readers of the greatest Freethought journal of the world.

Regarding the course of your paper no Freethinker can hav other than words of commendation. The illustrations are as necessary now to complete the paper as the noble sayings of Colonel Ingersoll.

Inclosed please find $6.50, to be applied as directed.

JAMES GEDDES.

LEON, KAN., Jan. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: According to your notice of the 4th inst., my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER will expire on the 6th of next month, at which time we will bid the once best Freethought journal published good-bye. I and my family hav perused its pages in all about three years; were taking it during the travel of the great apostle of Freethought around the world, and must confess that we hav had great pleasure in reading its contributions from the ablest and best men the world ever produced. But we think of late its pages are too much occupied in defense of Communism and Anarchism. Too much government is better for the people than no government at all. I also think the man who holds the plow is entitled to as much credit as the beasts that pull it. What would labor be without intellect and capital?

Yours for the right, L. D. HENRY.

ELKHORN, MONT., Jan. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper I greatly respect and appreciate, because of its just and upright tenor and its bold independence, being yet respectful and considerate alike of the opinions of friend or foe, which desirable course, we must admit, is foreign to many of our popular journals. In the columns of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER we find contributions of a threefold nature—practical, theoretical, and scientific—all uniting in a harmonious whole, constituting a splendid volume, a valuable treatis, furnishing a means by which the gloom and darkness of a false belief are dissipated, and instead the masses, from a world of error, delusion, and ignorance, are ushered into a grand and lofty sphere, where the radiance of a brightening day, illumed by the ascending orb of reason, shall forever dispel the insidious approach of delusion and priestcraft.

Respectfully, W. H. BANTA.

SALISBURY, MO., Jan. 18, E. M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: On the evening of the 11th inst. I boarded the express train at this place, en route for Brunswick to hear Mr. Remsburg lecture on "Sabbath Breaking and Sabbath Breakers." He spoke in the city hall to a small audience, that is, to the brains of the town. There was not a fool in the house. The lecturer was introduced by Captain Beneka, a prominent lawyer of that place. Among the audience might hav been seen such splendid faces as Isaac H. Kinley, the editor of the Brunswicker, and Chas. R. Luster, editor of the Brunswick News, who, by the way, told me that night that he was just reading Thomas Paine's works, with which he was delighted. It givs me pleasure to say that Kinley, Luster, and Beneka are the three grand pillars of that town—its compass, its judge by the rule of three, and its reason and safety. The lecturer was applauded whenever opportunity offered. At 10 o'clock I bid Mr. Remsburg good-night, and took the train for Salisbury. I felt a little skittish to see a cumbersome freight pull out about twenty minutes ahead of our train. I did not know but perhaps the finger of Providence was fumbling around, and was going to make a "stumbling-stone" out of that freight, but he didn't. It certainly vanished into air as we flew over the rails. I then got to thinking how Jehovah had become civilized since he raised the mischief with Jonah and his gourd vine.

Well, Mr. Remsburg was at our town and lectured the next night. I had the honor of introducing the distinguished gentleman to our audience. Several small jugs were soon filled and floated out to slander the man, hoping thereby to "hide a multitude of sins." All honor to the Loeb brothers, A. Straub, A. Wisler, Jim Greene, and D. W. Benjamin, who helped us most generously in a financial way. Come again, Mr. Remsburg! JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

ANDOVER, O., Jan. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I write to present the obituary: Died, in Andover, O., Dec. 31, 1887, Eliza J., wife of E. W. Morley, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. She was a confirmed Spiritualist, and had been a great sufferer for years. She looked forward to the change with pleasure. Her mind was clear to the last. She said she had "no more fear of dying than of stepping into the next room." She gave directions for her funeral, and did not wish to be carried into any church, but wanted a quiet funeral at home, a few pieces sung, and speaking if the friends desired. As there was no Spiritual or Liberal speaker within miles of here, I knew not what to do. Not wishing to submit to the custom, as most Liberals do on such occasions, of thinking that any orthodox preacher will do, I commenced looking around, and as we hav a young lawyer holding the office of justice of the peace who is an outspoken Infidel of character and ability, I got him to make a few remarks. He did splendidly, and was a great surprise to the church people, and as he would not take pay for his services I herewith inclose $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER to be sent him. J. W. Roberts is his name.

E. W. MORLEY.

LAWRENCE, KAN., Jan. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a clipping from the Lawrence Tribune. I myself, an Agnostic Infidel, living here in God's country, under God's kind care and protection, hav many ups and downs in life, but am always ready to fire hot shot back when the Christian leaders try to teach me how to liv a just and righteous life. Lawrence has passed a law respecting the unknown being. All places of business, except churches, must be closed on Sundays. Churches are allowed to make as many holy dollars as they can. One poor man, by the name of Miller, that kept an eating-stand open on Sunday, was fined five dollars. A leading Methodist minister jumped out of bed one Sunday morning and married a couple of folks for a "V." That was all right; giving to ministers is giving to God.

A sad case of Christianity came to my notice here in this town. A Mrs. Solt became converted and received a commandment from God to fast. She fasted, and died drinking water and quoting scripture. Death relieved her of her transgressions of the laws of nature. She believed the infant at her breast was a new Christ. O for an Ingersoll to preach the funeral address of those that hav died for Jesus's sake!

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER everlasting prosperity, I remain, Yours for truth, A. L. WILLIAMS.

WELLAND, ONT., Jan. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At the age of eighty-two years, I, John Ray, find my health and faculties generally are fast failing me, and at the rate I am failing my time here cannot be long. I now hav little to look forward to but an early dissolution. I shall not be taken by surprise; am endeavoring to meet that event with what fortitude I can command. Having lost faith in the Christians' religious creed, and all other religious creeds, except the religion of humanity, my dependence is upon natural law, for of anything supernatural or outside of nature I know not. I had no choice in being brought into existence in this life, and a train of circumstances not at my command or of my choosing has resulted in making me what I am and as I find myself to-day. It has not been in my power to be otherwise than as I am.

If faith or a belief has anything to do with our existence in a life after this, I cannot, nor can anyone in reality, believe that which is contrary to the evidence of the senses, be the consequence what it may. My faith is in accordance with my best judgment; to profess differently would be hypocrisy, and that is what honesty could not approve. It has taken a long time, and much thought, to overcome my early teaching, which was the Christians' theory or theology. But, having arrived at my present conclusions, I cannot be otherwise than faithful to my honest convictions of what appears to me to be the truth. No one can be expected to do better than he knows. But I hold it to be the duty of all to do as well as they know. Anything short of this would be a neglect of known duty. JOHN RAY.

DULUTH, MINN., Jan. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3, for which please send me your paper for six months. Having seen several numbers of it, I am much pleased with it, though I do not agree with all the sentiments expressed in it, and am not at all pleased with the treatment which Henry George receives from you, as well as from some of your correspondents. Why do you persistently represent his ideas as Socialism or Communism? You know, as well as I do, that George is as far from those ideas as it is possible for him to be. One of your correspondents, on December 24th, over the signature of "Liberal," mixes up George's name with Anarchism, and "I brand that as an infamous lie"—see his article. The man who has read George's works and does not see and acknowledge the difference between his teachings and Anarchism, Socialism, or Communism is either a fool or something worse, but wishing to be charitable, I would rather suppose that "Liberal" has not read George's works, and has formed his opinion on what he has seen in the general secular and religious press, which never would adopt a new idea or progressiv movement in morals until the former saw that it would not affect their pockets injuriously, and the latter until a public sentiment, gradually growing up to righteousness, compelled the clergy to giv in. Instance slavery and temperance. You know, also, that they held on to the fagot and thumb-screw until clear-eyed Science moved the world out of their power. They still exercise ostracism to the damaging of Liberals, but, thank God, that is slipping from them, before the influence of such bright and glorious characters as Abraham Lincoln, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and, last but not least, our own contemporary, glorious "Bob," as the infidels to decency and good manners designate him. Some time ago I had a paper of some kind in which there was an article from the pen of a Chinese educated in English, which declared that in all China, containing nearly four hundred millions of people, there was not in a given year as much violence, outrage, and disorder as in the state of New York. The paper has been lost; and if you can procure me one I will be very thankful. Please let me know the lowest price of Bennett's travels "Around the World," for I would like to hav them, if not too costly. J. SCOTT.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Jan. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At last I hav had to come down. As Crockett said to the coon, so it has been said to me, and I hav to giv up that which I hav had the pleasure of reading for seven years, namely, the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, because I can't pay for it. I owe for one year's subscription, and to save my life I can't pay it, and must tell you to discontinue mailing it to me any longer, until I can pay, if I ever can. I don't know nor you cannot understand my condition or circumstances. The truth is, I hav talked too much. I was brought up a Presbyterian, with all its horrible teachings, and not till I was forty-eight years old, some fourteen years ago, had I ever read or heard a Freethought lecture, when an argument with a good, intelligent Liberal made me think. I was induced to read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." Nothing had so interested me ever before. Then his "Common Sense;" then came Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses" and "Skulls," and I first heard that great, noble man lecture in Jamestown and Buffalo, N. Y., in 1879. It has been my pleasure to hear him deliver four, among them "What Must I Do to Be Saved?"

I was a subscriber to D. M. Bennett's travels "Around the World," which no man or woman who wants to advance in truth and knowledge can afford to be without. I hav never seen the person who has read those books that does not say they are the most valuable history they had ever seen. I hav loaned mine many times. Is it any wonder I should talk? Could I help being disgusted with my former faith? But it cost me many a dollar. I kept hotel from 1880 to 1886 in Erie, Pa., that priest-ridden city, and while there entertained such blasphemers as J. H. Burnham, C. B. Reynolds, Charles Watts, J. E. Remsburg, and many others. It was known as Infidel headquarters, and notwithstanding I had the name of keeping a first-class hotel, I had the ill-will of the local people, and they did me all the harm they could—quite enough to keep me from succeeding.

I inclose ten cents for the next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I want to read Colonel Ingersoll's answers to your questions, and just as soon as I can, if that time shall ever come, I will pay you the balance I owe you, and resume my place again.

Trusting that by the combined efforts of Liberals all or any of the Christian Gods may be kept out of our Constitution, I am, Most respectfully, C. L. HAWES.

A NIGHT AT BETHEL.

MR. EDITOR: One Sunday morning in June, while taking my usual constitutional, I noticed across the street a plain, unpretentious building, of decidedly moral tone, embellished with a large black sign, on which was painted, "B-e-t-h-e-l." I looked at it and wondered at the strange name—for, mark ye, I am a stranger and a pilgrim in this land of yours—when a tall, lantern-jawed individual, clad in a suit of cast-off undertaker's garb, with bony hands clasped together, and a wild, yearning look in his eyes, came to the door and gazed long and earnestly at me, then said, in a holy-living-and-dying voice, "Brother, step aside from the world and drink at the font of the water of life." As I never hav refused a drink when offered in so unprejudiced a fashion, I merely replied in my huskiest tones, "Why, cet'nly, brother," and bounded up the stairs with a smile upon my lips.

Calmly and most unimpassionately my sable guide conducted me inside, and I seated myself beside a gentleman of so Elishaic—pardon the expression—appearance that I instantly looked around for the children and the two bears.

As soon as I had arranged my coat-tails I looked eagerly around for the font, but nothing in the shape of that vessel could I see. Slowly I arrived at the truth that I had been—sold. The font was symbolical, not a welcome—to me—reality. Ah, how I sighed for the sacrament! Mournfully I turned my eyes toward my guide, who was guardian angel of the collection-box. I had almost murmured, "Brother, you are a li——," when I saw that, with his eyes upturned, with a happy vinegar expression on his face, he was in communion with spirits unseen, and naturally could not attend to my spiritual wants.

On a platform at one end of the room stood the double of my guide, swinging his arms and making horrible facial contortions. He was simply reminding his hearers—"dwellers in this oasis in the great desert of life" who yet "travailed in this vale of tears"— that on account of so many sinners going down the hell side-track the faithful would require to donate more freely to the Lord, in order to keep up steam in the engin on the uptown grade; that he—the parson—knew all his hearers would giv, as the Lord"— etc.

This oration finished, he sat down, and the old man at my elbow began to groan in a manner so horrible that I, fearing the worst, instantly reminded him of the efficacy of brandy and ginger; but the old ingrate, turning his inflamed eyes upon me, howled out loud enough for all to hear, "Lord, save this poor mis-er-able sin-ner! Do, Lord, do-o-o!" which refrain was instantly taken up by the whole crowd and bellowed to the Lord, poor soul!

But as the Lord, keeping silent, refused to meddle with the affair, the Rev. Singletext called upon Sister Shanks to lead in prayer. Sister Shanks, pious and prim, Roman nose embellished with spectacles and hands clasped together, poured forth her soul to the Lord in a cracked treble. After enumerating all the gifts she had received from on high, she casually mentioned to the Lord that there was a hardened old sinner in the back seat whose soul, blackened with sin, she would like to see purified by his holy fire, his hardened heart riven in twain, etc. Others then telephoned heavenward in like terms, until I fancied that the poor dear Lord must be nigh distracted with all the conflicting messages he was that night receiving from all the Christian church. But "his ways are not our ways"—and, Lord knows, I do not want them so to be.

Having thus tormented their "elder brother" to their best ability, they concluded by singing, "Washed in the blood of the lamb," and, by the appearance of some of them, I thought that a good-sized bath would make them think that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. At least, their continued presence on earth would be more desirable.

While the audience were thus expressing to the Lord their intention of getting washed, a genteelly snub-nosed sister, with weatherbeaten features—they say it was the weather—and strongly smelling breath, ill concealed by peppermint, urged me to come and rest in somebody's "busum," but I firmly declined, muttered that I was a married man, seized my hat, and fled with their howlings ringing in my ear. I hear them yet—in my dreams I see Sister Shanks, Roman nose, spectacles, and wings, accompanied by the snub-nosed genius, flitting before me, and feel her incense-like breath (ach—chee!) until my nerves giv way, just as I am being roughly dragged to that "one's busum," and I awake in a cold sweat.

O heaven! where is thy victory? O sheol! where is thy sting? Thanks be to the Lord who givest us sheol, for its comforts pass all Christian understanding.

LANDY BRITON.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I was surprised to see a letter from one Benj. F. Clark, dated December 16th, in your issue of January 14th. Why you should let snch personal ribaldry and abuse into your columns surprises me. If you deem such things fair, I can only wonder still more. If you published a false or one-sided report from a daily paper, it was of your own motion, not to be offset by this attack on me. "Two wrongs never make one right."

The Clark letter is like its author. Both are vulgar and abusiv. I can hav no controversy with a person who openly stated on the Liberal Club platform that he had been an African slave-trader, and therefore was, under international law and treaties, a pirate. Sometimes I may hav doubted the truth of his own confession, as the same sort of morbid vanity which prompted it might also prompt a falsehood. In either case the utterer is unworthy of respect.

At the meeting referred to in the vulgar communication you publish, the person who signs it took the floor unimpeded in any way. Within two minutes he commenced a tirade of abuse, both vulgar and profane in character, for which some one hissed him. I believe that it was the librarian. Then he left incontinently. As he fled I made the mistake, perhaps, of telling him that as a self-confessed trader in human beings, he did well in retiring from among honest people. Certainly I cannot imagin them willingly associating with a character self-brand·d as infamous.

Personally, for this person's abuse I care nothing. Had it not appeared in a respectable journal, I would not hav noticed it. On the physical matter, in closing, I desire to say that such allusions belong only to bullies. My response is silent contempt and the suggestion that I am perfectly able to take care of myself against even a man of courage, let alone a coward. Respectfully, R. J. HINTON.

BROOKLYN, Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The New York Sun on Sundays presents a column or two of "questions by Sun correspondents," with answers thereto, except now and then in case of a poser which the editor can't answer. Sunday, the 22d of January, appeared four questions by "Ajax," three of which interested me not a little, and I hoped to be greatly edified by the answers. The first question, relating to unpensioned soldiers, the editor couldn't answer and said so, "like a little man;" the three others were utterly ignored, to my very great surprise. These were: 2. "Is the existence of God a matter of clear and demonstrable proof?" 3. "Does the philosophy of Atheism produce criminals?" 4. "Are there any records to show that the adherents of Christianity furnish fewer criminals than the Jews?"

To be charitable would be to suppose that the editor overlooked these three questions. Let us be charitable, for the first of the three was an easy one for any Christian. The editor might hav said something like this: "If you are not a benighted heathen—it looks as if you were—you would find in every wrinkle of the face of nature, and in the wondrous view of the illimitable firmament, studded with innumerable worlds, clear and demonstrable proof of the existence of God." Wishing to elaborate, he might hav rung in the human soul, declaring that the inner consciousness of said soul is as conscious of the existence of God as of itself; and, if a betting "inner consciousness," would bet dollars to doughnuts on the existence of God, when "Ajax" would hav felt very cheap and wished he hadn't asked such a foolish question.

The second of the three ignored questions he should hav answered with a flat-footed "Yes!" as any iron-clad Christian would hav done, leaving "Ajax" to prove to the contrary, which he could easily do, but the printing of which the editor could "decline with (or without) thanks."

The last of the three ignored questions the editor could not hav answered so flat-footedly, as "Ajax" calls for "records," which would overslaugh the editor, so to speak. But he could hav crawfished with fairly good grace in some such manner as this: "We are not posted with regard to criminal records in so far as these relate to religious tenets or beliefs, or the desirability of pork as food. Read Job for comfort."

Now, whether or not the correspondence editor of the Sun overlooked those three vital questions, purposely ignored them, or declined to answer them because he could not truthfully do so without giving God and Christianity a setback, so to speak, he is manifestly not the right man in the right place to minister to the craving minds of many "anxious inquirers," and should giv place to one who can.

SI SLOKUM.

WAYLAND, MICH., Dec. 31, 287.

DEAR MACDONALD: I am again in distress on account of the recent sickness of my wife, and my own continued poor health. I am not able nor in circumstances to permit my going from home to canvass for work, and here (at a relativ's), in Maryland, I cannot get much of anything to do, as it is only a small station on the G. R. & I. railway. Now, what I would like to say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER is that on and after January 1, 288, I will make this offer to Freethinkers: I will make crayon portraits from any style of small picture sent me, in the following sizes, at prices stated opposit the sizes, if cash remitted with the order, and will pay the postage or express on the crayon when it goes to the owner.

Size of paper.	Length of head.	Price.
16x20	6½ to 7 inches	$6 00.
18x22	7 " 7½ "	7.00.
22x27	full life size	10.00.

Will furnish excellent appropriate frames for $2.50, $3.50, $5.00, and $7.00 each extra in the respectiv sizes, but where frames are furnished, the parties ordering must pay express charges. For a guarantee as to my work and ability I will send to those writing to me indorsements from those whom I hav made portraits for, and those that hav seen my work. I might offer here the names of Mr. Watts and Putnam, and Mr. A. P. Urey, Sandy Lake, Pa. I am making one for Otto Wettstein. Now, friends, you hav a chance to get a good crayon for a small amount of money. I can make changes, such as clothing or hair, to suit, but changes will be charged some extra for. Let me know what you want and I will tell you how much, if any, extra will be charged.

Giv Heston my unconditional compliments. He is improving very much on his drawing, and especially in his perspectiv. His lessons hit hard. Long liv Heston, and THE TRUTH SEEKER and its able editor. F. E. STURGIS.

HOLDEN, Mo., Jan. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I asked Rev. D. C. Williams if he would publicly debate, and affirm his cardinal doctrins. He declined, but afterward announced that he would answer questions handed in before a given time.

I wrote and presented the following: "Did not the church (both Protestant and Catholic) hav its most rapid growth, and greatest influence over the people, from the third to the sixteenth century, inclusiv? Was not that period noted for ignorance and bloodshed? Was not the ignorance the cause, and the bloodshed the result, of the influence and growth of the church?"

He answered my question, or rather attempted to answer it, from his pulpit in public. He said there were no Protestants during that period. Whether he did not know that my question covered the sixteenth century, or wanted to evade it, I do not know, but he contended that the question extended only to the beginning of the sixteenth century. I had no copy of the question with me, but had a copy on my desk, and when I returned and examined, I found the question did not contain a mistake, but clearly covers the sixteenth century, as shown by the verbatim copy given above.

But he said there were no Protestants, and I think he said there were no Christians, in that period. He admitted that ignorance and bloodshed prevailed in those times—dumped it all off on the Catholics, just as if they were not Christians. I cannot undertake to settle the dispute between the Protestants and Catholics, but they are both ardent Christians, and both darkened Europe and appalled humanity for the last eighty years of the sixteenth century. Buckle says, however, that the Protestants revolted, claiming the right of private judgment, but afterward became more intolerant than the Catholics. The same author says in vol. i, p. 407, that in France, in the reign of Henry IV., the Protestants would not, for many years, permit the Catholics to worship at mass, and that they seized the property of the Catholic clergy and employed it in support of their own churches.

"On one occasion, in the reign of the Arian emperor Valens, no less than eighty Catholic ecclesiastics were imprisoned in a ship at sea, and treacherously burnt" (Lecky, vol. ii, p. 22).

Luther delivered an address to the German noblemen in 1520, and that was the kernel of the Reformation. So we see there were myriads of both Protestant and Catholic Christians through most of the sixteenth century.

I hav no word against the better things taught in Christianity. Indeed, if it were wronged, I would defend it with might and main; but I am neither called upon by duty nor inclination to indorse its errors nor palliate its crimes, or rather those growing out of it.

Friend Williams has little to say to my direct question, but dwelt statistically upon the growth of the church in this country, but failed to say that it could not work the mischief it has in the past centuries, for here it is kept in check by our growing enlightenment, and cannot grasp and wield the civil power.

Nor do I perceive that the number of its communicants is in ratio to our developed civilization and increased population.

He intimated that the Liberals are Anarchists or Socialists, or hav such leanings. Shades of Moses! That calls for an investigation aside from the text. Let us start out for facts on the orthodox route. I hav seen a statement that I think is more reliable than the authority he quoted, that thirteen and seven-tenths per cent of the seventy thousand preachers and priests in the United States are criminals. Of seven hundred convicts in the Kansas penitentiary a few years ago, all were reported to be orthodox but one. It is beyond doubt that John Calvin found out the hiding-place of the noble Servetus, and used his influence to hav him brought into Geneva and burnt to death in October, 1553. (See American Cyclopedia.) Luther believed in witchcraft, and recommended that a child be thrown into the river to rid the house of a devil (Lecky, vol. i, p. 84). In the spring of 1545 the leading Protestant nobles formed a conspiracy to assassinate Archbishop Beaton, and in 1546 he was murdered in St. Andrews. John Knox said to sanction it (Buckle, vol. ii, p. 176). Most murderers who expiate their crimes with their lives die Christians, and make a bee-line from the gallows to heaven.

Now let us return by the Liberal route. This brings us in harmony with the good and the great—the founders of American Independence and the guardians of civil and religious liberty—Washington, Jefferson, Franklin. Not one of these was a church-member—not one was orthodox. Further along we find Lincoln and Grant; their reason was never clouded by superstition, nor will their names be lost in oblivion.

In everyday life and in every community, we find Liberal men and women, generally, reliable, truthful, upright, and honorable in all the affairs of life; besides, they are generally above mediocrity in intellect and learning. With their minds free from all superstition, they better enjoy this life, and hav as good a chance in another, if there should be another, as their orthodox friends. They do not rely upon faith, fuss, and fiction to save them, but save themselvs from the effects of wrong-doing by not doing wrong. The Christian expects to be saved by believing in a batch of absurd superstitions, and by praying out of sins, if need be, seven times seventy times. Ergo, no wonder the facts favor the Liberals.

My friend Williams was long and loud on the growth of the church in this country, and the large amount of money contributed for foreign missions. I want to show that much of their money is obtained by a species of "boycotting." It is their custom to send sweet women to every business man—generally customers of the man in business come and plead for money, insinuating a reminder that they are good customers, and he must "shell out." Other unfair and adroit methods are making festivals, inviting the public, and putting their guests under very embarrassing circumstances, so they must make generous, but reluctant, contributions.

Next, the money is spent in fat living for missionaries engaged in trying to convert pagans and Mohammedans to Christianity, or rather to get them to throw off one lot of superstitions for another lot of superstitions. And how are they getting along at that? My friend says he can eat statistics. I will serve him from a speech made recently at a church congress by Dr. Isaac Taylor, D.D.—a good authority. He said: "In Asia and Africa, Islam, as a missionary religion, is more successful than Christianity, and our efforts to convert the Mohammedans hav failed." He said, too, "The increase of the Mohammedan population in India, between the census of 1871 and that of 1881, amounts to 9,239,062, an increase of about twenty-five per cent. Making ample allowance for the natural increase due to the excess of births over deaths, the conversion of heathens and Christians to Mohammedanism must be at the rate of at least six hundred thousand per annum." Gracious! there is plenty of good eating here. I will now giv him some dessert.

Dr. Taylor again said: "Taking the four missionary fields of Persia, Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt, I find that the Church Missionary Society employs 109 missionaries and nativ agents at a cost of £11,804, and last year only one adult convert was baptized."

Plenty more such facts, but I must hasten, merely suggesting that, if pagans and Mohammedans cannot be induced to believe in his religion, certainly enlightened people cannot believe in it.

Christianity is on the wane. It has not suffered a demotious lapsus, but it is in articulo mortis. It declines slowly but surely as science advances. The clergy get shorter salaries, and giv shorter sermons and shorter prayers; fewer people, according to population, attend church; and still fewer take an activ interest in the forms of worship. True, the dull monotony is sometimes broken, as here now, by new and novel modes of excitement—it is a strong and concerted effort to push the bright nineteenth century back into the dark sixteenth century.

On such occasions effort is made to excite the people with a gush of appeals to their sympathies, by reminding them of dead friends, and a mythical place called heaven, till they are willing to act as puppets, and respond to some person's imperativ demand to stand up or hold up their hands, as in the play, "Simon says wig-wag." This is called a religious revival.

Decline is further seen in the vast increase in Liberal periodicals and publications, and in the abandonment of cardinal doctrins by learned and leading preachers, from Beecher down to ordinary. Spurgeon has just retired from the pulpit on account of the last revision and the concessions made all along the line.

For the most rapid growth of the church, see the reign of Constantine, in the fourth century, and on through the Dark Ages. For ignorance and bloodshed at the same time, too, see Buckle, Lecky, Rebold, Renan, Gibbon, American Encyclopedia, and Library of Universal Knowledge.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Death.

At morn, at noon, at sunset eve,
At midnight dark and cold,
Death comes with glist'ning sword in hand,
And slays both young and old.

He stops not for the rugged oak,
Nor for the tender vine,
But both are victims of his sword,
They yield to him supine.

The beasts and fowls of nature's flock
Fall lifeless at his feet;
Whether at home or far abroad,
His face they hav to meet.

Everthing that has a life
Must give it up when due;
And even little flowers,
Why, they must perish too.

So let us while we do liv
Shun error as a foe,
That when death calls upon us
We'll be content to go.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

Golden Keys.

A bunch of golden keys is mine,
To make each day with gladness shine.

"Good morning," that's the golden key
That unlocks every day for me.

When evening comes, "Good-night" I say,
And close the door of each glad day.

When at the table, "If you please"
I take from off my bunch of keys.

When friends giv anything to me,
I'll use the little "Thank you" key.

"Excuse me," "Beg your pardon," too,
When by mistake some harm I do.

Or if unkindly harm I've given,
With "Forgiv me" I'll be forgiven.

On a golden ring these keys I'll bind,
This is its motto: "Be ye kind."

I'll often use each golden key,
And so a happy child I'll be.

Why I Am a Liberal.

I see a prize offered by B. H. Marlett, of Chicago, in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the best essay on "Why I Am a Liberal."

I am a Liberal because I believe in free speech and Freethought. The Bible teaches us that we hav to obey all of the Commandments, but Moses was the first one to break them. The stories in the Bible do not seem reasonable to me, such as the whale swallowing Jonah and Samson overturning a house with three thousand people in it. I am a Liberal because I like to giv my candid opinions and to listen to the candid opinions of others. And I would accord the same right to others that I would like accorded to me.

[Age 13.] GEORGE DOWNER.
Perry, Ill.

I am twelve years old, and I am going to tell you why I am a Liberal. I of course do not expect to get the $3, but as Mr. Marlett wants all the children to write I will try. I go to Sunday-school and get papers and nice cards, but I can't see any sense to them. They tell me things at Sunday-school that I don't understand, and when I come home papa asks me so many questions about things the teacher said that I am ashamed because I went. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the pictures which Mr. Heston makes make me feel ashamed of the Sunday-school. I like to go to Sunday-school because all the boys and girls go there, but think I would like it better if we could hav a Sunday-school that would teach the boys and girls some good, sensible ideas, and not talk so much about God, and hell, and heaven. I am a Liberal because my papa is, and I know he has good reasons for it. And I don't think any boy can be anything else unless some preacher drives it into him.

[Age 12.] MASTER WALTER PENFIELD.
Lebo, Kan.

Polly and The Mouse.

A young lady living not far from Boston has an extremely tame and clever parrot, which she prizes very highly. Every morning Polly makes a tour of the house, perched on the shoulder of her mistress, who talks to her much in this strain:

"Come take a walk. Do take a walk. Fine day for a walk."

One afternoon Polly's mistress heard a noise in the room where the parrot is kept; and, upon entering it, she saw Polly had scrambled down from her roost, and was gazing with great earnestness under a large bureau, repeating at intervals in the most persuasiv manner:

"Come take a walk. Do take a walk. Fine day for a walk." Interested to learn who it was that Polly was so urgently inviting to a walk, the young lady proceeded to investigate, and soon found the object of Polly's invitation to be a small mouse.

Not on an Empty Stomach.

Anxious Arkansaw mother: "Tommy, is that a green persimmon you are eating?"

"Yes, maw."

"Don't you know it ain't healthy to eat green persimmons on an empty stomach?"

"I ain't eatin' this green persimmon on an empty stomach. I ate a peck of 'em before I tackled this one."

Correspondence.

SNOHOMISH, WASH., Jan. 4, 1887.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I send you the accompanying statement to Charles Corbett, which, if you so please, you may print following this letter. I read those "Counsels" from the Hon. Horace Mann forty-five years ago, I think, having been myself an educator fifty-one years. I do not believe in plagiarism. Perhaps all the rest of your readers believe those "Counsels" to be original with Charles Corbett.

Bless you ever. PROF. J. H. COOK.

SNOHOMISH, WASH., Jan. 4, 1887.

TO CHARLES CORBETT, Nat Moore, N. C.:

Dear Sir: In the department of the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER for December 24th I read an article over your signature as though it was original from you, entitled, "Counsels to the Young." Those "Counsels" are from the Hon. Horace Mann, "the great educator," and came from his lips forty-five years ago. How you should hav sent them to THE TRUTH SEEKER as your own is for you to explain. It would hav been honest to put quotation marks to them.

PROF. J. H. COOK.

JACKSON, MICH., Jan. 11, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to THE TRUTH SEEKER before.

My father does not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it is sent to our house for Mr. Feldpaush, and we all read it.

Although my folks are not Liberal, they all, with one exception, like your paper very much.

I go to school in a first-class public school. I am eleven years old, and am in the seventh grade.

My teacher's name is Miss Germain; she is very kind and considerate.

I must close, as I would like to see my letter in print, and am afraid if I make it too long you will not print it.

I would like correspondents of about my age. Respectfully yours,

214 N. Jackson Street. GEO. A. SMITH.

955 LAKE WEST ST.

DEAR MISS WIXON: If Adam and Eve were the first man and woman made, how could Satan get made himself and come and tempt Adam and Eve? Please tell me, if you can. I am a little girl only nine years old, and I do not know, and I thought you could tell me. ELLA ROBERTS.

[Adam, Eve, and Satan are imaginary beings, like Santa Claus, Jack the Giant Killer, etc. The stories about them are unsupported by reliable testimony, and they take their places with the old-fashioned myths. We would advise Ella not to bother her little head over such matters, but learn all she can of the wonderful world in which we liv, and the people who hav made it brighter and better for us all.—ED. C. C.]

OAK MILLS, KAN., Jan. 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I last wrote you. yet I think none the less of you. You are in the midst of a great work, laboring for a great cause, and doing your best to make the young folks happy. I know the young Liberal folks love you, and feel kindly toward you for editing the Children's Corner, and giving them the benefit of it. I know I do, and heartily thank you for your earnest labors.

You and Aunt Elmina are doing a noble and a needed work. I hav been reading a book called, "Self-Help," and think all young folks should read it and take it for their guide.

I hav also read "The Bible of Bibles," by K. Graves, and pronounce it an unanswerable work—a credit to its author. I request all Christians to read it, and throw aside the dogmatic literature. Yet the period is approaching when Freethought literature will find a welcome place in every home. Go to almost any public library, and there, beside the works of Calvin, Luther, Wesley, and Edwards, you find the works of Huxley, Darwin, Spencer, and Tyndall.

The eloquence of Ingersoll in unsurpassed. The poetical and descriptiv writings of S. P. Putnam are beautiful; and the unanswerable arguments of our great workers, with Eugene Macdonald at the head, are fast bringing us to the front. And now, wishing you and the Corner success, and again thanking you for your labors, I remain, Faithfully, G. J. REMSBURG.

[Such letters as the above are an inspiration, and make us feel we are doing a little for the elevation and welfare of those who are advancing to fill the places of their e'ders. George will please accept our hearty thanks for his kindly feelings, and the assurance that we can never grow weary in our work as long as we retain the regard of our many TRUTH SEEKER boys and girls, not the least among whom we count George J. Remsburg. In manhood may he more than fulfill the promis of his youth.—ED. C. C.]

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Jan. 18, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think it is a very nice paper. I went to school some of this winter, but it got so cold, and the snow was so deep, we could not get there. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, geography, language, writing, and physiology. I hav two brothers, but no sisters. Their names are Pearl and Willie. Pearl is seven years old, and reads in the second reader. Willie is twenty-two months old. Pearl and I go to school, when we can get there. I am eight years old, and read in the fourth reader. I read all the letters in the Children's Corner. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly two years, and he thinks it is a very nice paper. I tried to get papa to tell me what to write, and he told me to write what I knew and use no deceptions.

I think this is long enough for the first time, so good-bye.

Yours truly, JENNIE GIGRAY.

[Jennie has written a good letter, and without help. That is the way. Rely on yourself. Talk well, and write as you would talk, easily and naturally.—ED. C. C.]

BAKER'S CORNER, IND, Jan. 7, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for THE TRUTH SEEKER. My little brother died three months ago; he was over six years old; he had just started to go to school; his name was Otto Clyde. We are all lonely without him. We can sympathize with you; it is so sad to lose a friend.

We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since the Children's Corner commenced.

I like to go to school. We had a Christmas tree at the school-house. I got several presents.

This is a small village, but there is one church here. They had a revival, but did not get any to join, so they quit.

I wrote a private letter to Pearl Dewy over a month ago, but hav not yet received an answer.

As my letter is too long, I must stop. I will soon be thirteen years old, and would like to hav some correspondents about my own age. From your friend, ESTELLA BAKER.

[We sincerely sympathise with Estella and all her family in the loss of dear little Otto. We know all the sorrow of such a loss. But Otto will never suffer any more. This is one consolation. And we must try to bear our griefs and burdens with courage and patience. —ED. C. C.]

LOCUST BAYOU, ARK., Dec. 30, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Please excuse the liberty I hav taken in writing to you. I was so much pleased with your sketch of the life of that inestimable lady, Frances Wright, that I must inform you that she remained in my father's house ten days, when she delivered a course of lectures in Baltimore. That was in 1829. I was an awkward boy of sixteen years. The house was thronged with company from morning until night. She made the purchase of the "Chickasaw Bluff," and invested $15,000 in slaves in order to educate them, and after she started the thing she had to return to Europe, and the thing fell through. When she returned she liberated them. She told my father it cost her half her fortune.

She entered the room one morning and said: "Mr. Haslam, I must tell you what a compliment President Jefferson paid me." (She stayed with him ten days.) "He told me he had a work—a small work—in his library, and he prized it above all others. I inquired what it was, and could I procure it. He replied, 'A Few Days in Athens.'"

It was said at that time, I distinctly remember, that she was one of the most intellectual women that ever lived. Anything relating to that grand philanthropist interests me. The Liberals ought to keep her memory green. I hav her portrait to adorn my room, with this sentence: "Human kind is but one family; the education of its youth should be equal and universal."

Wishing you and the Corner great success, I remain,

Your unknown friend, J. H. HASLAM.

[We thank our unknown friend for the item in regard to Frances Wright, and agree with him that her memory should be kept green and fragrant. We know of her only through her works, and through the friends who had the honor and pleasure of her acquaintance and friendship, but our admiration and respect for her great mind and many noble qualities will remain with us always. Would there were more like her.—ED. C. C.]

Snow.

See how it snows! How soft, and white, and fleecy the snow is! What delicate, feathery, floating flakes! How lightly and gracefully they float and fall, covering the frozen ground like a mantle of ermin! Beautiful snow! Let us see what it is. Watch the swiftly descending flakes and you will notice that they are perfectly formed into lovely shapes, crystals and prisms, and each perfect to itself. Well, these vast number of shapes reflect the different rays of light in their colors—north, south, east, and west. Away up in the sky these varied colors come together. We cannot see them do this, because it is done beyond seeing distance; but this union it is that makes the snow so pure and white when it falls to the ground. It is the uniting of all colors that makes white.

Salt and sugar are formed by a similar process—the union of little crystals, etc. But what is snow? Why, it is only frozen air, or rather the vapor which is in the air, which is made dense or thick by currents of of cold air passing through it and freezing the same. It might snow in summer if the earth was not so warm and giving out so much heat, which rises and melts any speck of snow that might be in the atmosphere before it touches the earth. Snow remains on the mountain-tops all the year round. Why is that?

Because the high mountain-tops are so far above the earth that snow falling there can not be melted by warmth that rises from lower levels; and then, mountain air is more rarefied or light, and not dense, and so keeps a good deal of heat in a latent state.

Snow is very warm, as you may know by observing how green the grass will become when it is covered a long time by the snows of winter. The little crystals of snow are all mixed or mingled with air, and a substance called carbonic acid is given out by the snow, and this substance settles slowly into the fields and valleys under the snow, keeping them moist and warm, so when the spring-time comes they are prepared for the upspringing of the beautiful grasses, herbs, and flowers. The heat of the earth that, were it not for the snow, would be thrown off into the atmosphere, is kept under the snow and feeds the earth.

Why does the snow not melt quicker?

Look up at the sun now. Do you not see how slantwise it shines? In that way, its rays cannot heat the earth as it does in summer, and the surface being frozen, it cannot radiate heat; consequently the snow cannot melt away quickly.

We can hav a great deal of fun with the snow—snow-balling, sliding down-hill on our swiftly gliding sleds, tobogganing, and making snow-huts and snow-men. Some children work, oh, so hard! to get a snow wigwam made, and then it is so nice and warm inside. But it generally happens that, just as they begin to enjoy the playing in the snow-house, a thaw commences and melts it all away like a castle built in the air.

Lots of children hav made ice-cream with snow mixed with cream and sugar. I hav made it myself, and I am sure it is very nice.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Of what shapes is snow composed? Why cannot we see snow reflecting the rays of light? Why is snow white? What is white? What of salt and sugar? What is snow? Why does it not snow in summer? Why does snow remain on the tops of mountains so long? Is snow warm, and why? How does it keep the earth warm? Can you tell why it does not melt sooner? Name some of the games that children hav with snow.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Current Thought

AS REPRESENTED IN ENGLISH AND AMERICAN MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

A class of literature worthy of some attention from Freethinkers is that consisting of the numerous first-class magazines of this country and England. Students of the social forces of the times may perhaps do well, besides giving their main attention to their own special fields, to keep informed on the general progress of modern thought among other classes than their own. A profitable opportunity to do this is presented by this class of literature, which has of late so increased in numbers and circulation as almost to supplant books, and circulates extensivly among certain classes—those of wealth and leisure. Perhaps a brief résumé of the contents of the January magazines may not be without use.

In the sphere of Politics and Economics there is of late unusual activity and earnestness of discussion. The momentous revolutionary doctrins and movements are subjects of determined and bitter controversy. In England the large landholders, peers, and public functionaries argue profusely that their land should not and shall not be taken; that Marx is an imbecil, George a thief, and that Socialism would be the end of the world. Messrs. Hyndman and Morris, the two leading English Socialists, reply in language equally subdued. DeLancey Nicoll, a New York politician of comparativ integrity, in the North American Review closes a startling detailed presentation of the corruption and bribery in our politics with the words: "In a few short weeks, when the legislatures of our state and cities convene, despite the solemn lessons of the past, the Constitution will again be defied and spat upon by the very people who helped to make it, and whose official lives serve to illustrate how vain and impotent after all are even its strong sections to stem the tide of corruption which, unchecked, must ultimately submerge our free institutions." The tariff question is attracting unprecedented attention. To the statement of Henry Watterson (Harper's) that "to the average understanding no word connected with government presents, in proportion to its significance, so slight a meaning as the word 'tariff,'" exception may be taken by those readers believing, with certain labor reformers, that it is not of importance to workers which way the affair is decided, and that the tariff is but a device of certain manufacturers to enrich themselvs through political manipulation, and a sham issue for demagogs to cry up to laborers to divert their attention from their real interests. Henry C. Adams, in showing "The Dangers of Surplus Revenue" (Princeton Review), quotes Mr. Carlisle's statement that "a large surplus in the treasury constitutes the most dangerous corruption fund that can possibly menace the integrity of legislation," and says: "Income from taxes over and above expenditures means a decrease in the amount of money in circulation; decrease means falling prices; falling prices means certainly commercial depression, perhaps commercial disaster." Prof. David A. Wells thinks (Popular Science Monthly) that the establishment of the tariff 'has been progress backward—progress in the direction of that sentiment of the Middle Ages which held that, as commerce could benefit one country only as it injured some other, it was the duty of every country to impose the most harassing restrictions on its commercial intercourse. Or, in other words, increased knowledge respecting the forces of nature and a wonderful subordination and use of the same having greatly increased the abundance of all desirable things, the world's legislators hav seemed to consider it incumbent upon them to neutralize and defeat the beneficent results of such abundance. And the most comforting assurance that progress will not indefinitly continue to be made in this same direction is to be found not so much in the intelligence of the masses or their rulers as in the circumstance that existing restrictions on commerce cannot be much further augmented without such an impairment of international trade as would be destructiv of civilization." In Harper's is a discussion of Mayor Hewitt's recent denunciation of the average "newspaper boss"—meaning the editor—as a despotic and dangerous force in our public life, worse than the political boss, appealing to and fostering prejudice and ignorance. English reviews lately teem with schemes by property-owners for removing or appeasing those huge mobs of unemployed and starving that are becoming, especially in London, so alarming a menace to property and law. Whatever may be the differences of the writers on other subjects, they all concur in denouncing all radical substitutes for our present economic system. Francis Peek, after presenting in the Contemporary Review the particular device that he prefers among the multitudinous schemes of public works, free soup-houses, local boards for supervision of the poor, relief funds, free dinners, work-houses, lodging-work-houses, almsgiviug, night refuges, casual wards, cultivation of waste lands, etc., says: "Such an idea [Socialism] will appear the perfection of folly to all who know the incapability of any elected government, from its very constitution, to control properly or work economically even its own manufacturing establishments. . . . A fallacy is constantly propounded on popular platforms which ought not to be passed over without contradiction, namely, that all wealth is created by the working classes. In fact, it is very largely the result of the enterprise of the merchants; . . . the greater portion of the wealth of England has been created by its capitalists. . . . At Socialistic demonstrations it is the fashion to rail against the extravagance of the wealthy, the speakers ignoring or being totally ignorant of the fact that at least nine-tenths of this expenditure, directly or indirectly, provides work and wages." Cardinal Manning, who has been busily securing popularity among the poor by activity among the projectors and associations for the relief of these English homeless, presents his views in the Fortnightly. Of a series of articles commenced in the Forum in which the subject, "What Shall the Public Schools Teach?" is to be treated from many points of view, the first is by Rev. M. J. Savage. He disapproves of the proposal to giv a higher course of training, ending with the university, because, first, it would be unjust to tax a man to fit his neighbor's son for a profession, the acquirement of which, passing that rudimentary instruction necessary to the public welfare, would mainly redound to the student's private good, and the public good is the only permissible object of the expenditure of public funds; and, second, because it would be impracticable from many causes. He thinks that of the three branches of instruction essential to be taught, the first is that "each child should be trained into fitness for honest self-support. Next, since in our republic every man is an activ part of the governing power, he should be trained into an ability to use this power intelligently." And in the third place, he should be taught morality. The first end, self-support, is to be secured by industrial training. On the second he says that it is imperativ that "every child hav imparted to him so much intelligence as shall make it safe for him to become a citizen. Such a thing as an ignorant vote ought to be an impossibility. Most vices and all crimes are punishable by law, and yet no one of them, not even all of them taken together, are so dangerous to a republic such as ours as is an ignorant ballot. Ignorance is the ready tool in the hands of designing villainy. There is no injustice in the disfranchisment of ignorance; it is simply asking that a man fit himself for the grand work of sharing in the governing power before it shall be intrusted to him. One of two things, therefore, ought to be done. Either the ballot should be taken from the hands of ignorance, or immediate measures should be taken for compulsory, universal education. This is a matter in which the national safety is concerned." The subject of moral instruction introduces the religious question, on which Mr. Savage says: "The people of this country ought clearly, and at once, to understand how much and just what is involved in the relation of religious instruction to our public school. The great danger is that the matter will somehow go by default. Some step involving disastrous consequences may be taken, either through the thoughtless, the indifferent, or the ignorant consent of the voting majority; and then, when too late, it may be found that a consent once given is not easily taken back." He urges that the present Protestant ceremonies in our schools be removed, so that the Catholic may be defeated by the main ground of his complaint being taken away. Showing that morality does not depend on religion as its basis, the writer remarks: "But if religion is absolutely essential to morality, we cannot leave the matter all in the air; we must go on to ask what religion—whose religion? It might indeed be possible to teach the science of comparativ religions; to instruct pupils in the historical origin and development of the different religions; but this is not what the religionists want, and it would not satisfy any of them. Of course all Christians would make short work of the claims of any religion not Christian. And, equally of course, the Protestants would make short work in disposing of the Romanist's claim, and the Romanist of the Protestant's. The use of a very little common sense and common observation makes it perfectly plain that, as a matter of fact, there are moral Buddhists, moral Mohammedans, moral followers of Confucius, moral Romanists, moral Protestants, moral Agnostics, and even moral Atheists. And it is a trifle absurd to be arguing the impossibility of what is standing palpably before one's eyes. And if the different religions were to arrange a competitiv examination for the purpose of determining under which one the least amount of immorality would be found, he would be a rash man indeed who did not act on the advice of Hosea Bigelow: 'Don't never prophesy onless ye know.' . . . The most superficial study of the facts of human progress makes it perfectly clear that religious contention is one of the bloodiest factors of history. It has perpetually been at work undermining and overthrowing the civil order."

In the domain of Religious and Anti-religious controversy perhaps the church defender who attracts most notice of late is W. H. Mallock, the bitter and ingenious enemy of the modern Agnostic school of scientists, and of the English group headed by Tyndall and Huxley in particular. He is probably known to some of our readers by his work, "Is Life Worth Living?" an attack on the Agnostic morality and a defense of the Catholic church of much brilliance and subtlety. In each month's magazines attention is attracted by this writer's venomous and sophistical onslaughts upon natural morality. Recent books and lectures in England by R. Bosworth Smith on Mohammedanism in Africa, and other causes directing attention toward it, hav called forth articles on that subject by church dignitaries, in which the superiority of Mohammedanism over Christianity in beneficent effects in that region, being so palpable that it cannot be denied, is ungracefully admitted, but uniformly supplemented by the declaration that, for some mysterious reason not given, Islam should be supplanted there by the creed of the writers. Matthew Arnold (Fortnightly Review) comments on the recent sad piece of business done by the great Russian novelist, Count Leo Tolstoi (who is not to be confounded with Count Tolstoi the statesman) in retiring from literature to the humble, secluded life of a peasant and the trade of a cobbler, in obedience to a sudden burst of religious fanaticism, a desire to "liv the life of Jesus." Tolstoi's admirers among literary circles in every country hav always been so numerous and enthusiastic, and his present confessions of faith and religious appeals are so eloquent, that his example is exercising a great and regrettable influence. He has discovered that what Christ intended us to hav for a creed is embodied in the Sermon on the Mount, and may be extracted thus: We must never allow ourselvs to feel anger; there must be no libertinage and no divorce; no oaths are to be taken; we are to resist not evil; nationality to be renounced for universal love. Mr. Arnold says: "Christianity cannot be packed into any set of commandments. Christianity is a source; no one supply of water and refreshment that comes from it can be called the sum of Christianity. It is a mistake, and may lead to much error, to exhibit any series of maxims, even those of the Sermon on the Mount, as the ultimate sum and formula into which Christianity may be run up. And the reason mainly lies in the character of the founder of Christianity and in the nature of his utterances. Not less important than the teachings given by Jesus is the temper of their giver, his temper of sweetness and reasonableness. Goethe calls him a Schwärmer, a fanatic; he may much more rightly be called an opportunist." An extract from advance sheets of Professor Le Conte's forthcoming work on "Evolution and Its Relation to Religious Thought" is given in the Popular Science Monthly. Stating "the law of evolution to be thoroughly established," he inquires, "What is to be its effect on religious belief, and therefore on moral conduct?" and proceeds with his share of the modern Sisyphean labor of the reconcilement of the Bible and science. Enumerating all our great scientific discoveries that hav contradicted scripture and yet forced themselvs into Christian recognition, he inquires: If, after recognizing the truth of the heliocentric theory of the planetary system, contradicting our belief in a firm, central, and all-important earth; the theory of the universality and inflexibility of law, destroying the conception of a providence, and the theory of the antiquity of the earth and of man, Christians find their belief unshaken, can they not also find it so after embracing this seemingly dangerous theory of evolution? No doubt they can, we should say; most people who can hold a belief after it has been shaken in the way the aforementioned discoveries shook it will no doubt go right on holding it no matter how it is shaken by anything. Professor Huxley, perhaps the foremost Agnostic leader in the sciento-religious warfare, after dissecting some absurdities of theological pseudo-science in "Science and the Bishops" (Popular Science Monthly), remarks: "That this Christianity is doomed to fall is, to my mind, beyond a doubt, but its fall will be neither sudden nor speedy. . . . It is probable that there is as much sheer fetichism among the Roman populace now as there was eighteen hundred years ago. . . . No one who considers the present state of even the most developed countries can doubt that the scientific light that has come into the world will for a long time hav to shine in the midst of darkness. The urban population, driven into contact with science by trade and manufacture, will more and more receive it, while the pagani will lag behind. Let us hope that no Julian may arise among them to head a forlorn hope against the inevitable." W. S. Lilly, the able second of Mr. Mallock in his arguments that merely human morality has no foundation, and if left unsupported by supernatural would fail, and ruin mankind, presents at great length in "Right and Wrong" (Fortnightly) his view that "only in the Self-Existent can be found a base for ethical ideas." "I had occasion, not long ago," he says, "to cite the well-known dictum, 'The rights of man are in a middle.' The printers were good enough to make of it, 'The rights of man are in a muddle.' In a muddle indeed!"—made so, he explains, by "the uncouth shibboleths of a sect of physicists," which must be removed. "Physical force says, 'Given such and such antecedents, and such and such consequences follow.' Moral law says, 'From such circumstances such action ought to follow.' Physical law declares, 'This is how things are.' Moral law declares, 'This is how things ought to be.' You cannot get that ought from a universe of observed facts, from an infinit series of experiences. 'The word ought,' as Kant observes, 'expresses a species of necessity which nature does not and cannot present to the mind of man. The word, when we consider the course of nature, has neither application nor meaning.'" Frederick W. H. Myers writes (Fortnightly) of "Charles Darwin and Agnosticism"—of the theories of that great man, and their relation to religion, morality, and Agnosticism; and of his serene and beautiful life. "He seems," says Mr. Myers, "to be the exemplar of a new ideal, a man as well adapted to human life, on the hypothesis that this earth is all that we can know, as a John or a Paul were adapted to human life on the hypothesis that our citizenship is in heaven. How, then, we ask ourselvs, does the new ideal bear comparison with the old as regards the virtue or the happiness which that old ideal aimed at securing? On the moral side there is certainly no perceptible decline. . . . And linked with this peace of conscience there is a boyish yet a stedfast happiness." A passage quoted from Darwin's "Life and Letters," recently published, giving his own description of his loss of Christian belief, may be reproduced: "I was very unwilling to giv up my belief. I feel sure of this, for I can well remember often and often inventing day-dreams of old letters between distinguished Romans and manuscripts being discovered at Pompeii or elsewhere which confirmed in the most striking manner all that was written in the gospels. But I found it more and more difficult, with free scope given to my imagination, to invent evidence which would suffice to convince me. Thus disbelief crept over me at a very slow rate, but was at last complete. The rate was so slow that I felt no distress." In "The Higher Life: How Is It to be Sustained?" (Fortnightly) Rev. J. Llewellyn Davies combats Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer with as near an approach to sanity of reason as can be expected of theologians. One of his paragraphs may be given as a sample of the whole class of the comparativly modest and decent arguments to which intelligent Christianity has at last been forced to confine itself, and which form the body of late scholarly Christian polemics: "It is a mysterious condition of our human existence that our understanding is brought up against insuperable difficulties, like the invisible wall which stopped Balaam's ass. Any scheme of philosophy which professes to evade contradictions or to solve them convicts itself of superficiality. But it is a boast made on behalf of science that its truths never conflict with one another. Mr. Cotter Morison," says our author, Mr. Davies, "writes as follows: 'Not less marked in another respect is the difference between the truths derived from religion and those derived from science. The truths of science are found to be in complete harmony with one another. Where this harmony is wanting, it is at once felt that error has crept in.' But our intellect gets unceremoniously buffeted by contradictions whenever it makes excursions into the world behind the senses. If, for example, there is one thing which the principle of evolution seems to make evident, it is that there is no beginning of things; it is, indeed, impossible for us to conceive an absolute beginning. But it is equally, or almost equally, impossible for us to imagin an absence of beginning. And evolutionists, quite naturally, however unscientifically, talk of the primordial atoms of the universe. It is not merely that we are made aware of things beyond our knowledge, but that contradictory conclusions seem forced upon our understandings. Space and time ought, one might hav imagined, to be simple things, but the consideration of them leads us into insoluble problems. . . . St. Paul held that human conceptions of things beyond the sense-world are no better than the mental attempts of young children. The frank apprehension of the inadequacy of our conceptions, and of their transitional character, will render it easier to us to acquiesce in traditional religious terms or statements which may not be quite to our mind, as well as in formally contradictory propositions. When we try to discover a purpose in this perplexing disciplin, we are led to the conclusion that we are intended to learn a distrust of our reasoning faculties, as of instruments, useful and necessary indeed, but stamped with inferiority and inadequacy. We follow our best Christian teachers in holding that, with regard to the greater things of life, the mind or spirit which trusts and loves and hopes is the superior organ of knowledge, and that human beings are put to the test whether they will be guided by the superior organ or the inferior." Prof. J. Peter Lesley, the eminent scientist, in the Forum makes, under the title of "Shall

We call Him Master?" an essay at "comparativ religion," "scientific theology." A tribute he pays to science may be repeated for its beauty: "Science has always been the knowledge of the true, the real, the explained and comprehended. The love of science is a worship of the truth, heartfelt, ritualized, inspired; an admiration of the truth for the sake of its mere goodness; adoration of it for the benefits it must bestow; invocation of it against deceits of all kinds and the ills sure to flow from them. The thinker caresses science as his own special and particular bosom friend, as a man kisses the mother of his children." Of the four great religion-founders—Confucius, Gautama, Mohammed, and Christ—he admires Confucius, with his "religion of plain, virtuous, common sense, which has worked well three thousand years; where characteristic feature has been social contentment, and whose fruits are sobriety, thrift, politeness, and common helpfulness;" condemns Gautama and his religion of self-abnegation and renunciation of desire, which has not worked well, but has destroyed the home and turned the public school into a society for the suppression of cruelty to animals; and bestows high praise on Mohammed's "religion of enthusiasm, the worship of one God, unknown, undescribed, incomprehensible. . . . It is essentially a religion of temperance, truth, and justice; also, in a wide sense, a religion of human brotherhood. 'It has abolished drunkenness, prostitution, and gambling, the three curses of Christian lands.' It enforces successfully the social virtues: temperance, cleanliness, justice, fortitude, benevolence, hospitality, veracity, and resignation to the inevitable. It is the religion of all others best applicable to savage and degraded races; the most missionary and the only successful missionary religion; the antidote to both heathen and Christian superstition." Very good so far; but when the professor proceeds to affirm that Christianity is even better than all this, and insists upon "worshiping Jesus of Nazareth," not, indeed, as a God, but "as the ideal man, and therefore king of men," his reasonings may not seem so well founded. Arthur Tappan Pierson insists in the Forum that as "Socialism and Anarchy threaten, in these days, even the foundations of the social structure, the only hope is to get the Christian churches once more into close contact with the common people," for "whatever men may think of religion, the historic fact is that, in proportion as the institutions of Christianity lose their hold upon the multitudes, the fabric of society is in peril."

Among miscellaneous treatises, that of the eminent scientist George J. Romanes "Concerning Women" is a valuable one. He adduces physiological and anatomical evidence—among other testimony, the fact that the average brain-weight of civilized woman is five ounces less than that of civilized man—which he judges to disprove the claim made by a large section of the woman's movement that "naturally, or originally, there is no assignable difference between the intellectual capacities of the two sexes, and that the only reason why women hav not hitherto performed the intellectual work of men is that they hav been artificially excluded from fair competition." But, between the diverse gifts of the two sexes, he "cannot see that those which hav fallen to the masculin mind are intrinsically superior or more estimable than those which hav fallen to the feminin. If strength alone is to be regarded as the one criterion of excellence, then is a horse better than a man. No human being, I suppose, could seriously maintain this as regards bodily strength; and no more, in my opinion, could it be maintained as regards mental. Among all the wonderful excellences which the human mind displays, sheer force, even in the direction of creativ thought, is only one, and, rightly viewed, not the chief. Those qualities of mind which belong by nature to the woman, and which, generally speaking, are distinctivly characteristic of female excellency, are at least as great and admirable as any of those which belong by nature to the man." Professor Romanes advocates the higher education of woman, stating as reasons: (1) Nothing is so conduciv to brilliancy in a man as to meet with it in a woman, and vice versa; how immeasurably, therefore, would the pleasures of social intercourse be enhanced if both sexes were more generally able to meet on common grounds as regards culture; (2) the importance to a cultivated man whether his wife is or is not cultivated is immeasurable; (3) the importance to a family whether or not their mother is a cultured woman is more so; and many other considerations.

ARGUMENT

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

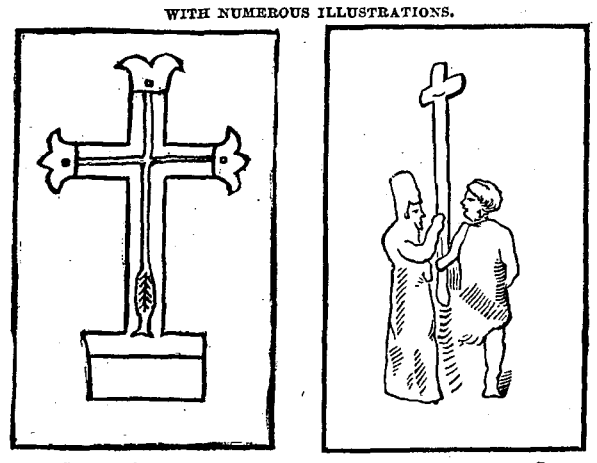
BIBLE MYTHS;



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

Speaking of this work in connection with the proposed independence of America from Great Britain, Washington wrote: "A few more such flaming arguments . . . will not leave numbers at a loss to decide on the propriety of a separation."

THE pope has written an autograph letter to the czar, thanking him for the expression of good-will contained in the address the czar sent him on the occasion of his jubilee. In his congratulatory telegram the czar said that he desired to assure the interests of his Catholic subjects, and hoped that his holiness would aid him in harmonizing the needs of the Roman church in Russia with the fundamental principles of his empire.

THIS English apings's hardly right,
In fact it's grown absurd;

A STRANGER was caught in the recent Montana blizzard, snowed under for four days, and was about giving up hope, when a rescuing party dug down on him. As the first shovel struck through the roof of his tomb, he moaned: "Excuse, me, gentlemen; but if we drink in celebration of this event, I move that we make it a Dutch treat." And the sturdy Northmen, as they covered him up again, remarked in a chorus: "Pack him down hard, boys. He's from Boston."

A NORWICH primary teacher, to test the knowledge of her little pupils upon the Golden Rule, inquired how many of them could repeat it. Several hands went up, and a little boy noted for his activity and brightness was permitted to answer, which he did thus: "Do to others as others do to you." He was told that he was wrong, and a precise little miss of a mild and clever disposition was next invited to repeat it. She said sweetly: "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you." The girl sat down in triumph, but the boy, who had missed, with a look of disgust rarely shown by one so young, said: "I guess not That won't work."

THE Chicago News tells this story about the Rev. Mr. Manton, who was a barber before he became a preacher. The News says that one of his first duties after he was ordained was to baptize a child. Wetting his hand in the water bowl, he laid it on the child's head, and then, his mind reverting to his old calling, he began rubbing the head vigorously, and, turning to the astonished mother, said: "Shampoo?"

He will die with his red breast congested.

"I MUST leave you now," the girl said lightly, as she rose from her chair. "I hav got to go to the missionary society rooms and do some sewing for the heathens." "There's a heathen around in a Twenty-third street boarding-house," casually observed the young man, looking vacantly over her head, "third-story hall-bedroom, front, who has three buttons off his cutaway, a rip in the elbow of his dress-suit, and a choice collection of socks that look like cullenders. Does he come in on this missionary deal?" "He does, George," she whispered softly, as she tucked in her eyelids, "if he needs a missionary all to himself."

Gems of Thought.

"ELISHA, giving leave to the young prophets to enlarge their dwellings, causeth the iron to swim." So we find it written in the head-piece to the following story: "Elisha went with them, and when they came to Jordan they cut down wood. But as one was felling a beam, the ax-head fell into the water, and he cried and said, Alas! master, for it was borrowed. And the man of God said, Where fell it? And he showed him the place. And he cut down a stick and cast it in thither, and the iron did swim. Therefore said he, Take it up to thee; and he put out his hand and took it.—2 Kings vi, 4-7. [I rather think the simplest reader will, without any aid from German or other rationalistic commentators, be able to paint this scene to himself and be able to recover the ax out of the river by the aid of the stick referred to; but if he don't see through it, let him study the following extract.—Hylax].

A MIRACLE is a work beyond man's power to perform. He who performs it [in this case Elisha, the man of God] does so by the assistance of God. And if God giv his power to a man, it must be for some great and extraordinary reason [such as the recovery of a lost ax]. . . . The working of a miracle proves that the man who performs it is God's messenger and speaks God's truth, for God works by him, and would not so lend his power to an impostor.—Biblical Cyclopedia, by John Eadie, D.D., LL.D.

PLINY the Elder, who sacrificed his life to his curiosity, being suffocated by the dust and asbes of the eruption that overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii, was an omnivorous reader; and even when he was so occupied that he could not read himself, he had himself read to. His example is not worthy of imitation. If he had read less and thought more, he would hav served mankind better. He well remarked that he never found a book so bad but he was able to get some good out of it; and both Milton and Gibbon hav said the same, a remark that I most cordially indorse. Amid much inferior matter, Pliny now and then surprises us by the acuteness of his remarks. He bad the boldness to deny that "God could either endow man with immortality or recall the dead." Pliny, you may rely on it, was no fool.—Hylax.

THERE hav been, and there may be again, great individual thinkers in a general atmosphere of intellectual slavery. But there never bas been, or ever will be, in that atmosphere an intellectually activ people. When any people has made a temporary approach to such a character, it has been because the dread of heterodox speculation was for a time suspended. Where there is a tacit convention that principles are not to be disputed; where the discussion of the greatest questions which can occupy humanity is considered to be closed, we cannot hope to find that generally high scale of mental activity which has made some periods of history so remarkable. Never when controversy avoided the subjects which are large and important enough to kindle enthusiasm, was the mind of a people stirred up from its foundations, and the impulses given which raised even persons of the most ordinary intellect to some of the dignity of thinking beings.—Mill's Liberty.

THAT many good men hav believed this strange fable [the temptation of Mother Eve by the devil, the fall of man, etc.], and lived very good lives under that belief (for credulity is not a crime), is what I hav no doubt of. In the first place, they were educated to believe. There are also many who hav been so enthusiastically enraptured by what they conceived to be the infinit love of God to man, in making a sacrifice of himself, that the vehemence of the idea has forbidden and deterred them from examining into the absurdity and profaneness of the story. The more unnatural anything is, the more is it capable of becoming the object of dismal admiration.—Paine's Age of Reason.

WISDOM strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city. For there is not a just man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not. Also take no heed unto all words that are spoken, lest thou hear thy servant curse thee. For oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise hast cursed others.—Ecclesiastes vii, 19-22.

LITTLE do men perceive what solitude is and how far it extendeth; for a crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love.—Bacon's Essays.

SOCRATES says that he knows nothing, except, the one fact that he is ignorant; and that he is superior to others in this particular, that they believe that they do know what they do not know, while he knows this one thing alone—that he knows nothing. And it is on that account that he imagins he was pronounced by Apollo to be the wisest of all men, because this alone is the whole of wisdom, for a man not to think that he knows what he does not know.—Cicero.

CHANGE and progress are the universal law We can stand still in nothing.—D. M. Bennett.

THE WAY CHURCH DEBTS ARE LIFTED.

Notes and Clippings.

FIRST Omaha dame: "Do you mean to say you went to church last Sunday? Why, the weather was perfectly awful." Second Omaha dame: "Yes, I went; but I arrived there more dead than alive." "What was the sermon about?" "Oh, the minister scolded us for three hours because the rest of you didn't come."

A LITTLE girl of Metz, fourteen years old, named Louise Fuchs, has just been condemned to eight days' imprisonment for having insulted the emperor of Germany. The insult consisted in writing a private letter to one of her little friends, in which there was something disrespectful to his majesty. Such sentences are said to be quite common in Alsace-Lorraine, and they can add no strength to the popular love for the conquerors.

IN some remarkable mathematical observations by M. Hermite concerning the number of stars, he shows that the total number visible to the naked eye of an observer of average visual power does not exceed six thousand, and of these the southern hemisphere contains somewhat the larger number. In order to see this number of stars the night must be moonless, the sky cloudless, and the atmosphere pure, and here the power of the unaided eye stops; an opera glass will bring out twenty thousand, while a small telescope will bring out at least one hundred and fifty thousand, and the most powerful telescopes yet constructed will show more than one hundred millions. M. Hermite concludes from his various observations that the light emitted by all the stars upon the whole surface of the globe is equal to one-tenth of the light of the full moon.

A FAR Western newspaper announces the postponement of a wedding "owing to the fact that the groom is too busily engaged in a poker game at the Silver Starch club rooms." The paper further explains that the clergyman who was engaged to perform the ceremony also got interested and took a hand, and "as we go to press is kicking like an elephant because there is a limit to the game."

A CATECHISM lately issued by the Roman Catholic authorities in Mexico, for the circulation of which the civil authorities of the state of Guanajuato caused a priest to be punished, directs Catholics not to lend or hire houses to Protestants for services; not to erect or repair churches for Protestants, nor to make or sell furniture for such churches, nor to attend Protestant services, under penalty of excommunication. The civil authorities interfered with this religious boycott on the ground that it was "subversiv of the public well-being."

"THE war of the Rebellion," said Gen. Daniel E. Sickles the other evening, "was really a Whisky war. Yes, whisky caused the Rebellion! I was in the Congress preceding the war. It was whisky in the morning—the morning cocktail—a Congress of whisky-drinkers. Then whisky all day; whisky and gambling all night. Drinks before Congress opened its morning session; drinks before it adjourned. Scarcely a committee room without its demijohn of whisky, and the clink of the glasses could be heard in the Capitol corridors. The fights—the angry speeches—were whisky. The atmosphere was redolent with whisky—nervous excitement seeking relief in whisky, and whisky adding to nervous excitement. Yes, the Rebellion was launched in whisky. If the French Assembly were to drink some morning one-half the whisky consumed in any one day by that Congress, France would declare war against Germany in twenty minutes." It seems to be a good thing that Frenchmen drink mild wine.

IN a leading uptown church, reports the Tribune, where a lecture was given to a class of young people who were about to become members, there were seven lads and one man to forty-three of the other sex, only three or four of whom were full-grown women, the remainder being girls. The male population of New York is not given very largely either to church-going or religion. Ministers say that the proportion of female communicants to male is becoming larger every year. One of the oldest pastors of the city, commenting on this state of things, said with a half-sigh: "However, it is a great step to bring the women into the fold, for in the end they will bring the men with them."

ELIZA LYNN LINTON was one of the twelve children of the vicar of Crosthwaite in the lake region. There she was accustomed to see Robert Southey, whom, she says, she remembers "with his eagle's beak and small, retreating chin, spare frame, and dark eyes full of fire. He preferred long, solitary rambles to our primitiv society. But Harriet, duchess of St. Albans, was more sociable, and when journeying northward used to invite the vicar to spend the evening with her at the Royal Oak. My father's fellow-parsons were a very queer lot. Some drank and fought in public-houses, others were little better than honest day-laborers, and it was not uncommon to hear the officiating clergyman exclaim, when his Sunday ministrations were over, 'Gosh! that job's jobbed!'" Mrs. Linton has for years been a pronounced Freethinker.

DR. MCGLYNN and THE TRUTH SEEKER hold the same opinion regarding the Catholic church and the workingmen. Two weeks ago, at one of his Sunday night meetings, the ex-priest said: "The labor party must expect to find everywhere the enmity of the ecclesiastical machine. And what has this machine done for the labor movement here, or in England, or anywhere? It has ever been on the side of despotism instead of on the side of freedom. The ecclesiastical machine was opposed to secret societies. It was opposed at the outset to the Knights of Labor, and suggested the forming of a confraternity of trades. The machine would hav an Order of Consecrated Car-Drivers and the Holy Guild of Plasterers, under the guidance of the parish priests. The church is opposed to any labor movement, and I am sorry to be able to say that Grand Master-Workman Powderly went to Cardinal Gibbons, and, not satisfied with that, sent an embassador to Rome and paid the expenses out of the funds of the Knights of Labor. And I should not be at all surprised some day to learn that part of that money was expended in buying up one of the underlings, and not so much of an underling after all. If it were not somewhat indelicate, I could tell you the name of the embassador." Powderly denies this statement; but Dr. McGlynn reiterates it, and says his informants were men high in the councils of the Knights of Labor.

Blue Laws of New England.

The virtues of the Pilgrim fathers hav been sung by poets and extolled by historians. Orators hav painted their characters in glowing colors. The belief that they sought an asylum in the wilds of America for the oppressed, that they were lovers of liberty, and that they were the real founders of our free institutions, is the reason why the founders of New England hav been so revered. But historical criticism has reduced them to their proper level, and we now see their characters in their true light—not as we were once taught to view them, but almost the reverse.

It must be admitted that the Pilgrims had many virtues. They were a sturdy, honest, industrious, chaste people. It must also be admitted that they had many faults. They were superstitious, narrow-minded, fanatical, bigoted. But there were two things in which the Pilgrim fathers certainly excelled —hunting heretics and hanging witches. It would be supposed that the Pilgrims, having been persecuted for opinion's sake in England, would hav granted liberty of conscience to those who sought a home in their colony. But their much-desired haven, where they could worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, was intended only as a refuge for those subscribing to the Calvinistic creed. The thought never occurred to them that other sects held their belief just as sacred as they did theirs; that it is impossible to prevent the human mind from overpassing the limits of any prescribed boundary; that it is the hight of cruelty to persecute their fellow-men for opinion's sake. Their creed was the only one that was right; and as those who denied it were in danger of perdition, it was but just and merciful that they should force others to accept that which was necessary for the salvation of their souls.

Social and political disadvantages were placed upon those outside the church. But woe to him who chanced to be unorthodox; he was sure to become the victim of a heartless and relentless persecution; and if he escaped without a flogging, with unharmed ears, or an unbored tongue, or even with his life, he was very fortunate. If the luckless wizard dared wave his magic wand, or if the toothless, haggard, old witch mounted her broomstick and ventured to perform her aerial evolutions—"to sweep the cobwebs from the sky"—they were placed entirely without the pale of society; no more mercy was shown then than as though they were the very imps of satan, who, it was piously believed, bodily inhabited their persons. Having been reared in the school of persecution, our forefathers were not slow in proving themselvs proficient in the art. They therefore employed their leisure time in flogging, banishing, or hanging Catholics, Quakers, and Baptists, for daring to abuse the liberty of thought. There was, of course, nothing more clearly proven than the right to think for one's self, provided he thought right, and as the Puritans had the only standard of right-thinking, it very necessarily followed that whoever differed from them thought wrong, and whoever persisted in wrong-thinking was a wilful violator of the liberty of conscience, and must either renounce his heresies or be cut off as a corrupt and dangerous member of society.

It is not positivly known why these enactments against heretics and witches, and Sunday laws, hav been called "Blue laws." It is possible that they were so named by having been first published in a blue-covered book. But I am of the opinion that it was because the laws themselvs were intrinsically blue.

In the enactment of Blue laws the premium must be awarded to Connecticut, but in the punishment of Quakers and witches the superiority must be conceded to Massachusetts. The latter colony was altogether too holy a place for anyone but Puritans, as Massachusetts was a place "especially devoted unto the worship of the Lord Jesus Christ above all the rest of the world." The Puritan colonies could not therefore be tainted with the pernicious doctrins of Catholics, Quakers, and Baptists, and other "pestilent heretiques;" and consequently those who held opinions that were unorthodox had either to suffer torture or seek an asylum among the savages, and receive from them that protection they had vainly hoped for from their Christian brethren.

Thus it was in the case of Roger Williams, who, for entertaining dangerous opinions, was driven from the Salem colony in the dead of winter to perish from cold and hunger, or to find shelter and food among the wild men of the forest.

And the principal offense for which Roger Williams was banished was that he denied the right of the civil magistrate to punish for mere religious delinquencies. He simply reasserted the right of liberty of conscience—the very principle the Puritans themselvs braved the dangers of an unknown ocean and the hardships of a wilderness to establish. The Puritans affirmed the right of a union of church and state; Roger Williams denied it. The Puritans claimed the right of the state to enforce religious conformity, and Roger Williams protested against it. The Puritans triumphed, and drove him into exile; but he succeeded in founding a colony which was the first place in Christendom where a law was enacted tolerating and protecting alike the Christian, the Jew, or the Mohammedan.

The Blue laws were particularly severe on the inoffensiv Quakers, and it was really against them that the laws were directed.

The Quakers were deprived of civil rights, whipped, branded, had their ears cut off, their tongues bored with hot irons, were banished, and even executed upon the gallows.

Here is what Christian wisdom and charity giv us in the form of a law: "No Quaker or dissenter from the established worship of this dominion shall be allowed to giv a vote for the election of magistrates or other officers." The law also expressly forbade bringing Quakers to the colony. "It is ordered by the court, that in case any shall bring in any Quaker, ranter, or other notorious heretic, either by land or water, into any part of this government, he shall forthwith, upon order from any one magistrate, return them to the place from whence they came, or clear the government of them, on penalty of paying the fine of twenty shillings for every week that they shall stay in the government after warning." It would hav saved much trouble if the faith of passengers had been inquired into when they went on shipboard, seeking refuge in the "asylum for the oppressed." It might also hav been policy for the landlord to hav done the same with his lodgers; for it was further "enacted by the court and authority thereof, that no Quaker or person commonly so called, be entertained by any person or persons within this government under penalty of five pounds for every such default, or be whipped; and in any case anyone shall entertain any such person ignorantly, if he shall testify on his oath that he knew not them to be such, he shall be freed of the aforesaid penalty, provided he, upon his first discerning them to be such, do discover them to the constable or his deputy."

Oct. 6, 1657, an order was passed banishing Humphrey Norton, a Quaker, from the colony, and on the 14th of October this additional law was enacted against Quakers, and for atrocious cruelty it is surpassed by few documents of its kind on record. It is the essence of Christian bigotry double distilled: "As an addition to the late order in reference to the coming or bringing in of the cursed sect of Quakers into this jurisdiction, it is ordered that whosoever shall henceforth bring, or cause to be brought, directly or indirectly, any known Quaker or Quakers, or other blasphemous heretics, into this jurisdiction, every such person shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds to the country, and shall by warrant from any magistrate be committed to prison, there to remain till penalty be satisfied and paid; and if any person or persons within this jurisdiction shall henceforth entertain and conceal any such Quaker or Quakers, or other blasphemous heretics (knowing them so to be), every such person shall forfeit to the country forty shillings for every hour's entertainment and concealment of any such Quaker or Quakers as aforesaid, and shall be committed to prison as aforesaid, until the forfeitures be fully satisfied and paid; and it is further ordered, that if any Quaker or Quakers shall presume after they hav once suffered what the law requireth, to come into this jurisdiction, every such male Quaker shall, for the first offense, hav one of his ears cut off, and be kept at work in the house of correction till he can be sent away at his own charge; and for the second offense he shall hav the other ear cut off and be kept at the house of correction as aforesaid. And every woman Quaker that hath suffered the law here, that shall presume to come into this jurisdiction, shall be severely whipped and kept at the house of correction at work till she be sent away at her own charge, and also for coming again she shall be alike used as aforesaid. And for every Quaker, he or she, that shall a third time herein again offend, they shall hav their tongues bored through with a hot iron and be kept at the house of correction close at work till they be sent away at their own charge."

A Quaker was not allowed to buy a horse, or if one brought a horse into the colony the horse was confiscated to the use of the country. "Whereas, we find that of late time the Quakers hav been furnished with horses, and thereby they hav not only more speedy passage from place to place, to the poisoning of the inhabitants with their cursed tenets, but also thereby hav escaped the hands of the officers that might otherwise hav apprehended them. It is therefore enacted by the court and authority thereof, that if any person or persons whatsoever in this government doth or shall furnish any of them with horse or horse kind, the same shall be forfeited and seized on for the use of the government; or any horse they shall bring into the government, or shall be brought in for them and they make use of, shall be forfeited as aforesaid, and it shall be lawful for any inhabitant to make seizure of any such horse and deliver him to the constable or treasurer for the use of the country."

And it was yet further "enacted by the court and authority thereof, that if any person or persons commonly called Quakers, or other such like vagabonds, shall come into any town of this government, the marshal or constable shall apprehend him or them, and upon examination so appearing, he shall whip them, or cause them to be whipped with rods."

Alas! what tender mercies our Pilgrim fathers showed! The Quakers hav ever been remarkable for their steady habits—for being inoffensiv and law-abiding citizens. They, too, were flocking to America for the sake of liberty of conscience. They no doubt thought that the Puritans, having had the lash of persecution applied to themselvs, would be slow in applying it to the backs of others; but in this they were sadly mistaken. But the Puritans did what they could to save the stiff-necked Quakers. Did they not say their prayers through their noses for the salvation of the Quakers' souls? Did they not repeat passages of scripture to convince the Quakers that they were receiving a just punishment? Does not God's word say: "Though an angel from heaven preach any other doctrin than that ye hav received, let him be accursed;" "depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;" "if any come unto you and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed, for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds?"

If our forefathers hated Quakers, they loved Catholics but little more, for among these saintly laws we find the following: "No priest shall abide in this dominion; he shall be banished and suffer death on his return." "Priests may be seized by anyone without a warrant." Gloomy and morose, they forbade any engaging in sinful pleasures, or observing any customs that they thought were tinctured with Catholicism. "No one shall read common prayer, keep Christmas or saints' days, make minced pies, dance, play cards, or play on any instrument of music, except the drum, trumpet, and jewsharp." From this it would seem that the Pilgrims were great lovers of music, but unwilling to minister to any of the sinful pleasures of this vain world. They directed their musical talents so that, by a series of consecutiv steps, they would be prepared to twang the strings of their celestial harp in the "world to come." The Pilgrims also held the use of the ring at marriages to be a "relique of popery, and a diabolical circle for the devell to daunce in."

The custom of some ancient and half-civilized nations in putting to death a stubborn and rebellious son, and selling a debtor to make satisfaction to his creditor, has been justly characterized by modern Christians as the basest of crimes. But are not these customs justified by the Bible? And hav not Christians justified the same by statute law? They certainly did in New England. For we find a law which says: If a man hav a sixteen-year-old son, who, after being chastened, proves rebellious and stubborn, the parents are to take him to the magistrate and "such a son shall be put to death." And also one which says: "A debtor in prison, swearing he has no estate, shall be let out, and sold to make satisfaction." Charitable in them to let him out before he was sold.

Not content with meddling in religious matters, they must regulate the manner of dress and the cost of the trimming on their clothes; and even went to the extent of saying how one's hair should be cut and dressed. "Whoever wears clothes trimmed with gold, silver, or bone lace, above two shillings by the yard, shall be presented by the grand jurors, and the selectmen shall tax the offender three hundred pounds." Men were not allowed to wear their hair below their ears, nor women to wear their hair cut above their ears. "Every male shall hav his hair cut round according to a cap." That is, he must hav a cap drawn over his head for a gage by which to cut his hair. For a woman to allow her hair to "hang loose" was a grievous sin.

"If any woman shall not hav her hair tied up, but shall allow it to hang loose and be cut as men's hair, she shall pay five shillings. If any man shall wear long hair, he shall pay five shillings."

In all capital causes concerning life or banishment, if there was no express law, the judgment should be rendered according to the barbarities of the Mosaic code.

Matters and Things.

The New York Central railroad's classification requires that gall in large quantities shall be transported by freight.—Chicago Mail.

It is not stated what kind of gall it is, but we feel doubly assured in stating that it is Christian gall that is meant. We know of no other gall to be had in such large quantities, and that exists all over the country and is in constant use. It is the real "gall of bitterness," and it is so apt to "flow" that railroads will carry it only as freight—it is dirty and smells bad.

A venerable Methodist minister is authority for the statement that no camp-meeting can be successful in a location where there is fishing.—Martha's Vineyard Herald.

It is intended by the above to convey the idea that where there is fishing, fishers fall into the habit of telling such large fish stories that they easily slide away from grace. We do not look at the matter in the same way. The best camp-meeting revivalists we know of preach and believe the biggest fish story on record—that of Jonah.

William Dillsbury, a post-office clerk at Elgin, will sever his connection with the post-office service to prepare himself for the ministry.—Chicago Times.

We presume William has proved a failure as a useful clerk. There is nothing so handy for the runt of the family as the ministry. It requires so little practical knowledge of this world. A lingo of dogmas formulated by leaders, with a smiling, pleasant, "taking look," is about all that is required to start out saving souls. Of course it is better to be a dapper ladies' man—one who can say pleasant little nothings with wisdom's air and manner, and giv advice about the life beyond, of which he knows nothing. The knowledge required is so meager that it is no wonder that so many are seized with such a desire to save sinners. SAGE WINTERSET.

Shakspere and Christ.

No man on the earth loves the writings of the immortal Shakspere more than I, and no man is less capable of appreciating him, and knowing from the evidence at hand that the Bard of Avon wrote the immortal plays.

That Donnelly should attempt to prove that Lord Bacon wrote the plays of Shakspere, with the evidence against him, shows one thing very clearly, at least, and that is, upon what slender threads hang everlasting things.

I shall examin briefly the evidence that Shakspere wrote Shakspere, and then the evidence that Christ preached the Sermon on the Mount and taught the doctrin of the New Testament canon, that nobody follows and few believe.

It is conceded by everybody that there was such a man as William Shakspere, and the evidence that he was John Shakspere's son has never been questioned, and that he was born at Stratford-upon-Avon and was baptized and christened on the 26th of April, 1564. This is shown by the parish register of births at Stratford. We know that he grew up in Stratford and attended the Stratford grammar school; from Nashe we learn that Shakspere was trained a law clerk or noverint, and Lord Chief-Justice Campbell said if the case was brought before him in court, he would hav to so decide upon the evidence.

From Aubrey, the earliest of all his biographers, we learn that young Shakspere was addicted to poetry and the stage, and left Stratford at about the age of eighteen for London. There are many guesses why he went and whether he took Annie, his wife, with him or not; but we find him at the Blackfriars Theater, according to Greene, a Johannes Factotum, in 1592. In his warning to his three friends, Greene, on his dying bed, says:

Yes, trust them not, for there is an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his tiger's heart, wrapped in a player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes Factotum, is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a country.

Greene here meant that Shakspere had claimed plays that belonged to others. Chettle, who published Greene's statement, investigated the matter, and published an apology to the upstart crow within a year, and said he was as sorry as if the offense had been his own, for he found Shakspere to be honorable in his dealing and to write with a facetious grace.

There were three wonderful writers for the stage at that time besides Shakspere—namely, Greene, Peele, and Christopher Marlowe—and how a poor young man from Stratford could come to London, get employment in the Blackfriars Theater, and enter the lists with such men, is the wonder of the world, and there is but one solution, and that is that the wells of eternal poetry were springing up into everlasting life in Shakspere's brain. He could not hav become a fixture in the theater otherwise. Marlowe was, in my judgment, the equal of Shakspere so far as he went, but he was killed in 1594, and Greene had been dead for two years, leaving the field to Shakspere and Peele. Five of Greene's plays hav come down to us. They are infinitly beneath any play of Shakspere. Marlowe's writings hav come down to us also, and there are passages equal to anything Shakspere wrote, but his plays and writings, as a whole, lack the smooth perennial flow of Shakspere.

At Stationer's hall, London, all the plays of Shakspere were entered, when published, in his name as the author, and the company to which Shakspere belonged. He was not the manager, as Donnelly says, but stood No. 12. Burbage was No. 1, and the manager traveled all over England and Scotland, playing everywhere. Handbills were posted up in the cities, of which the following is one of many:

By the Right Honorable the Lord Chamberlain, his Servants,
AT THE GLOBE THEATER AT BANKSIDE, THIS DAY,
Being Tuesday, July 11, 1600, will be acted
MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.
Written by William Shakspere.

For twenty-five years Wm. Shakspere wrote for the theater, and associated with sixteen managers of the Blackfriars—with such men as Burbage, Thomas Pope, George Peele, Thomas Green, the greatest of all theatrical clowns, and with such men as the inimitable Ben Jonson, who criticised Shakspere's plays; and in all that quarter of a century, those most intimate associates never discovered or dreamed that Lord Bacon was the author of the plays. Greene claimed that he, Marlowe, and Peele were Shakspere's feathers. Who were Shakspere's feathers after 1594, when Greene and Marlowe were dead? The best plays were written after that year. Where in all the world was there a better school of learning, a better college in which to study human nature, than the theater? And Shakspere, for twenty-five years, was so connected, and it was the age when men depended on the memory; it was the age of the reformation, when human liberty was unchained, and the state was divorced from the church. Before Shakspere there were thousands of church-plays; every scene in the Bible was the subject of a play. The church authorities dramatized "Adam and Eve," and they appeared as they were created. What a chance Comstock lost by not being there! But that was the age when smothered human thought burst forth in a perennial stream of human glory, and Shakspere gathered the golden sheaves of fifteen centuries and bound them bundles of Hamlets, Macbeths, Lears, Othellos, King Johns, etc. Green's charge against Shakspere sets one question at rest forever, and that is that Shakspere was a writer for the theater as early as 1590. According to this he was twenty-five years writing forty plays, or 180,000 lines of the most wonderfully grand smooth poetry ever written.

Lord Chief-Justice Campbell says that Shakspere wrote his own will, and I wish to notice and compare the will with Shakspere's poetry. My opinion is that the man who wrote the plays wrote the will. The will and the plays breathe the same air. They are both in the same style. Compare the following from his will:

First, I commend my soul into the hands of God, my creator, hoping, and assuredly believing, through the only merits of Jesus Christ, my savior, to be partaker of life everlasting; and my body to the earth, whereof it is made.

With the following from the Sonnets:

But be contented; when that fell arrest
Without all fail shall carry me away,
My life hath in this line some interest,
Which for memorial with thee shall stay.
When thou reviewest this, thou dost review
The very part was consecrate to thee.
The earth can hav but earth, which is his due;
My spirit is thine, the better part of me.
So then thou hast but lost the dregs of life,
The prey of worms, my body being dead.

And in Hamlet's soliloquy, the same sharp antithesis is drawn between the body and the soul, or spirit:

To be or not to be, that is the question—
When we hav shuffled off this mortal coil——

The plays and the will hav the same text, that is, the mind, the soul, the spirit—three names for one part of man, that is, the immortal part—belongs not to the grave, but the body does, "where it is made." Says Shakspere in "Measure for Measure:"

But ah, to die and go we know not where!

Upon the above text or theme all the plays of Shakspere are built. Shakspere died in 1616, about a month after his old friends and fellow-actors had paid him a visit at his home in Stratford. They were Ben Jonson and Drayton, and of that meeting a preacher—a saint—as usual, smelling carrion, forty-six years afterward wrote: "Shakspere, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and it seems drank too hard, for Shakspere died of a fever there contracted." Shakspere was buried at Stratford-upon-Avon, his nativ town, from which, tradition said, he had to flee from the prosecutions of Sir Thomas Lucy, whom he afterward immortalized in the "Merry Wives of Windsor." A monument was placed over his grave and inscriptions placed on it that he was richer than the cost of the tomb:

Since all it he hath writ
Leaves living art but page to serve his wit.

Nobody at Stratford questioned the authorship of the immortal plays, and when Shakspere's "Hamlet" appeared, a citizen of Stratford sneeringly said: "It is the fashion nowadays for a noverint [law clerk] to leave the trade whereto they were secured and go to the theater and write 'Hamlets,' wherein Seneca afforded whole 'Hamlets' if you entreated him kindly of a frosty morning." His idea was that "Hamlet" did not amount to anything, and young Shakspere got it out of Seneca.

Donnelly says Shakspere never claimed the plays. The fact is, he publicly claimed them for twenty-five years and the most of them were published in his lifetime in his own name, and so great had become his fame that certain publishers, Wm. Jaggard among them, in 1599 published a lot of rot and hogwash poems and love ditties, and one very pretty love song of Marlowe's, and gave Wm. Shakspere as the author, whereupon Shakspere made him correct it by taking his name off and out of the book. Thomas Heywood interfered also to the same effect.

Seven years after Shakspere's death, two of his fellow-actors, Hemings and Condell, whom he mentioned in his will, gathered his writings together from the Shakspere company, assisted by Ben Jonson, who had played and written with Shakspere, and published all in a folio volume in 1623 under Bacon's nose, as the works of William Shakspere, for the benefit of his orphans, Mrs. Shakspere having recently died. And Ben Jonson wrote under the portrait of Shakspere which adorned the folio the following words:

The figure that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakspere cut;
Wherein the graver had a strife
With nature to outdo the life.
Oh, could he but hav drawn his wit
As well in brass as he hath hit
His face, the print would then surpass
All that was ever writ in brass;
But, since he cannot, reader, looke
Not on his picture, but his booke.

Was Jonson mistaken? Did Bacon stand afar off and laugh at college graduates and lifelong friends of Shakspere publishing a folio volume of Bacon's plays in William Shakspere's name? What fun it must hav been to Bacon to fool the world of literary men, whose associations with Shakspere must hav told them whether he could write such plays as were published in his name! Donnelly says that the plays were written by a master scholar well versed in Latin, French, and Greek. Now, I hav read the entire plays of Shakspere, and in the whole one hundred and eighty thousand lines there is not as much Latin, Greek, and French quotation as I hav heard a school-boy quote in one essay in my school-boy days.

The plays of Shakspere are immortal, because they are bristling full of thought, full and running over of nature, full of common sense; everything is natural—nothing is strained. The world has always conceded Shakspere the author on the evidence, and always will.

I hav read Donnelly's Bacon cipher. I am not mathematician enough to understand it, but we know that the cipher Bacon claims he invented in his boyhood in Paris was published when Bacon was only three years old; and if Bacon put said cipher in "King Henry IV., Parts I and II," it was done to plagiarize Shakspere's plays. If the testimony in favor of Jesus of Nazareth being the son of God, the messiah, or Christ was as strong as that Shakspere wrote Shakspere's plays, I should join church to-day, and be a Christian, and join Gideon's band, Sam Jones's, Sam Small's, or some other hallelujah crowd.

But I feel like weeping over the fact that no historian even mentions Christ's name. We do not know even the year he was born, the day, nor the month. Some church historians place his birth in August, five years before the Christian era; others place his birth four years earlier. None are agreed. But all are agreed that none of his friends ever wrote anything we hav about Jesus.

It is certain Jesus never wrote anything himself, for Luke says he could not write—that he never learned even to read. The Talmud is the only book outside of the New Testament that mentions Jesus's name. It tells of a Jesus who was hanged and stoned about seventy years before the Christian era, and who had for disciples Paul, and Peter, and Stephen. I am inclined to think that this is true, and that the hanged-and-stoned Jesus is the Jesus of the gospels. My opinion is that the day is not far off when it will be conceded that no such being as Christ ever existed. A Roman governor crucified him, yet made no report of the fact to Rome, thus committing treason in not reporting such an event.

If there is any grand saying in the New Testament, I hav failed to find it. But in Shakspere's plays the whole thought is lofty and grand. I can pick out one chapter in the Bible that contains more filth than can be found in all the plays of Shakspere. He is immortality itself. GEO. H. BETHARD.

Miracles.

There is a reason in favor of the amendment proposed by Miss Gibson, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 21st, to the proposition of "Ononon," that ought not to be overlooked, if we are to hav a miracle that will be worth anything. If a five-ton rock were to be carried across the Alleghany river, it would not be five years before a party would spring up declaring that it had always been on that side. Such a miracle would hav no more weight than the miracles of former days, resting upon the credibility or credulity of individuals. But if the sun, instead of sinking in the west, will change its course for one night, so as not to set at all, but make two revolutions before it sets, the whole world will know it when it occurs, and it will be recorded in scientific and historical annals, beyond all possible controversy. All that we should then need would be sufficient evidence of the actual existence of the prayers; for unless that were made certain, they would be disputed in a century or two. The very fact of the difficulty in preparing a miracle that would be beyond dispute, is one of the strongest evidences that no age of miracles ever existed. H. M. P.

Paine Celebrations.

New York.

The Society of Humanity was the only organization in New York which honored in a proper manner the 151st anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. The celebration included recitations, music, a speech, and a dance. Mr. Auckatel, Miss Louis, and Frederick Cyrus Leubuscher were the individual entertainers, and the audience did the dancing. Mr. Leubuscher will be recollected as the late candidate of the Henry George party for a judgeship of this city, and his address was an effort to show that Paine would hav voted for him had he lived till last fall, and been able to go to the polls. Mr. Leubuscher said:

There is one of the manifestations of the genius of this many-sided man which I hav not yet touched upon, and which has not been noticed by Ingersoll nor by any of Paine's biographers. I refer to his economic writings. He lived at a time when Adam Smith wrote the "Wealth of Nations." Adam Smith's dicta on economics were generally looked upon almost in the light of axioms; yet Paine dared to disagree with him. Thus the "Wealth of Nations" classifies land as capital. Paine, in an article entitled, "Agrarian Justice," clearly shows that private property cannot be predicated of land. He says:

"It is a position not to be controverted that the earth, in its natural, uncultivated state, was, and ever would hav continued to be, the common property of the human race. In that state every man would hav been born to property. He would hav been a joint life proprietor with the rest in the property of the soil, and in all its natural productions, vegetable and animal.

"There could be no such thing as landed property originally. Man did not make the earth, and though he had a natural right to occupy it, he had no right to locate as his property in perpetuity any part of it; neither did the creator of the earth open a land-office from whence the first title deeds should issue. Whence, then, arose the idea of landed property? I answer that, when cultivation began, the idea of landed property began with it, from the impossibility of separating the improvement made by cultivation from the earth itself upon which that improvement is made. The value of the improvement so far exceeded the value of the natural earth at that time as to absorb it, till in the end the common right of all became confounded in the cultivated right of the individual. But they are, nevertheless, distinct species of rights, and will continue to be, so long as the earth endures."

You will notice that this sounds very like Herbert Spencer and Henry George. Paine goes on to show how poverty arose from this merging of the ownership of land into the ownership of the improvements on the land; but he says that it is impossible to separate the two. Henry George, however, has shown that this can be done, and in fact is being done every day in this city by the owners of large estates, such as Trinity church, which exacts ground-rents from tenants, while the tenants own the buildings on the leasehold.

In reading this short pamphlet, "Agrarian Justice," I hav come to the conclusion that Henry George must hav read it before writing "Progress and Poverty." Just listen to this, and see if it does not hav the same ring as the opening pages of Mr. George's great work:

"Whether that state that is proudly, perhaps erroneously, called civilization, has most promoted or most injured the general happiness of man, is a question that may be strongly contested. On one side, the spectator is dazzled by splendid appearances; on the other, he is shocked by extremes of wretchedness; both of which he has erected. The most affluent and the most miserable of the human race are to be found in the countries that are called civilized. . . . Poverty, therefore, is a thing created by that which is called civilized life."

There is another most curious coincidence between Paine, the Infidel, and the Anti-Poverty Society, the high priest of which is Dr. McGlynn, a Roman Catholic priest. The Anti-Poverty Society scouts the idea that when Jesus said, "The poor ye hav always with you," he meant, "The poor ye should hav always with you." So Paine states that the occasion for the publication of the pamphlet, "Agrarian Justice," was a sermon preached by Watson, bishop of Llandaff, entitled, "The Wisdom and Goodness of God in having made both Rich and Poor:" and he says, "The error contained in the title of this sermon determincd me to publish my 'Agrarian Justice.' It is wrong to say that God made rich and poor; he made only male and female, and he gave them the earth for their inheritance."

Henry George has conclusivly demonstrated that mere alms-giving charities, however numerous and however noble, cannot abolish poverty, but that their effect too often is to aggravate it. About one hundred years ago, Thomas Paine saw this clearly when he wrote:

"There are in every country some magnificent charities established by individuals. It is, however, but little that any individual can do, when the whole extent of the misery to be relieved is considered. He may satisfy his conscience, but not his heart. It is only by organizing civilization upon such principles as to act like a system of pulleys, that the whole weight of misery can be removed. It is the practice to make provision for persons becoming poor only at the time they become so. Would it not, as a matter of economy, be far better to devise means to prevent their becoming poor?"

Is it not remarkable how this man, living at a time when views of political economy diametrically opposed to those enunciated in "Agrarian Justice" were generally received as true, could hav had the temerity to advocate doctrins which must hav seemed almost as heretical as his views on the Bible?

He even has glimmerings of the single-tax solution of the economic problem, for he says, "Every proprietor, therefore, of cultivated land owes to the community a ground-rent—for I know of no better term to express the idea by—for the land which he holds."

It is only when Paine suggests a means by which this unearned increment, the ground-rent, can be restored to its rightful owners, the people, that he is weak. Like a great many others who hav recognized the evil, the remedy suggested is inadequate. The Socialists in the late political campaign in this city admitted that no one has ever excelled Mr. George in depicting the terrible misery which seems to be a concomitant of civilization and progress; but they declared, unjustly as I believe, that his land-tax remedy is ridiculous. To my mind it is a most philosophical deduction from the fundamental principles of political economy. Whether it be or not, you will all agree, I think, in condemning Paine's proposed remedy.

It was to create a national fund, out of which there shall be paid to every person when arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the sum of fifteen pounds sterling, as a compensation in part for the loss of his or her natural inheritance by the introduction of the system of landed property. And also the sum of ten pounds per annum, during life, to every person now living of the age of fifty years, and to all others as they shall arrive at that age. The French Revolution had engendered in men's minds a fanatical hatred of the rich and titled. But Paine, though one of the principal actors in that tragedy, had a philosophical mind which would not allow prejudice to swerve it from a scientific conclusion. In his proposed plan he therefore would make these payments to every person, rich or poor. He says that "it is right it should be so, because it is in lieu of the national inheritance which, as a right, belongs to every man over and above the property he may hav created or inherited from those who did."

His proposed national fund would be created as follows: At the death of any person, one-tenth of all his property in value must be paid to the state. He calculates from statistics of mortality and so forth that the wealth of a given country changes hands completely, by inheritance and bequests, every thirty years. Thus, if the whole wealth of a nation, real and personal, be one billion, one-thirtieth of that would revolve every year. Under his plan one-tenth of this one-thirtieth, or about three millions, would be taken for the national fund.

You readily see that this is a most arbitrary and hence unscientific method. He admits that the fund will be inadequate for some years; but in order to demonstrate his sincerity, Paine, having no property of his own in England and France, offered to pay five hundred dollars in England, and a similar amount in France, into the fund as soon as it should be adopted. Unlike the majority of the preachers, he was ready to practice what he preached.

His plan is unscientific, because it is founded on a general average and not on scientific principles of taxation. He suggests a taxation of one-tenth of all property revolving in one year, because he calculates that that will represent the unearned increment. This will result in a confiscation of the realty of the small landowners, while the great monopolizers of land would go practically Scott free.

Paine stumbled on the true remedy when he wrote that every landowner owed the comunity a ground-rent. When he wrote this, he was so close to the single-tax doctrin that, as the Germans say, "if it had been a dog it would hav bitten him." If such a ground-rent is owing to the government, why not take it for the purpose of government, and thus relieve the real products of labor from the burdens of taxation?

The improvement and amelioration of the condition of his fellow-creatures was the end and aim which Thomas Paine ever had in view. This was as true when he wrote the "Age of Reason" as when he wrote "Agrarian Justice," as true when he suffered imprisonment for begging for the French king's life as when he reaped fame in denouncing the oppressions of George III. If the birthday of Washington is observed as a national holiday, it is meet that at least this small fraction of the American people should assemble once a year to glorify Thomas Paine, for whom Washington had the highest regard.

During Paine's imprisonment in France the Americans then resident in Paris petitioned the government for his release; and in their petition they described him as "Thomas Paine, the apostle of liberty in America, a profound and valuable philosopher, a virtuous and esteemed citizen." I can not bring this brief tribute to a more fitting close than by repeating the words of these patriotic Americans of one hundred years ago.

Paine's Memory in Chicago.

The rooms of the Chicago Secular Union were filled to suffocation on Sunday evening, January 29th, and the many persons who stood during the entire program seemed to be amply repaid for so doing. The exercises consisted of musical and vocal selections by Mrs. and Miss Piper and Mr. Card; oration by Dr. Juliet Severance, and short speeches from Mrs. Freeman, Professor Orchardson, and Dr. Henry, concluding by a telling speech from Prof. W. S. Bell. Dr. Severance's oration was a strong, stinging, grand eulogium on Thomas Paine, and the audience unmistakably testified their unqualified approval of the speaker's sentiments.

I will let the Chicago Times tell of the public celebration on Monday night:

There was a blaze of light in Kimball Hall last night; there was a singing society on the platform; there was an orchestra of seven pieces stowed away in the corner; there were decorations on every hand; there were pretty girls there by the score—pretty girls who sang; pretty girls who danced; pretty girls who played piano solos; pretty girls who apostrophized Liberty in pretty little speeches. There was even a zither solo to "Liberty."

The Chicago Secular Union was celebrating the 151st anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. The Chicago Secular Union is organized for "Secularization of state and Freethought propaganda"—that is what the programs said; in other words, it is a society of professed Infidels. It has about one hundred and fifty members. There were nearly three hundred people there last night. One might expect a gathering of Infidels to differ in some way from a gathering of Christians—to hav some of the supposed earmarks of Infidelity. But it might hav been a Sunday-school soiree so far as outside appearances went. There were little children there who might be Sunday-school pupils; there were modest young ladies there who might be Sunday-school teachers; there were grave and gray-bearded men there who might be Sunday-school superintendents—men bald enough to be entitled to seats in the front row when the ballet is on. First, there were literary and musical exercises for two hours; then there was a ball which lasted till nearly daylight. The literary exercises included an oration by the president, E. A. Stevens, on "Thomas Paine, Revolutionary Hero, Patriot, Statesman, and Philosopher." There would hav been an original pôem on the same subject by Dr. Juliet H. Severance, only that Mrs. Severance accidentally left the poem behind her on her dressing-table at home. It was a narrow escape. Mrs. Severance filled in her place in the program, however, by reciting a piece called, "A Woman's Conclusion." The woman concluded in favor of the other fellow. It is usually that way.

Mr. Stevens's oration was the chief feature of the earlier exercises. A platform had been erected for Mr. Stevens and the singing society. The walls adjacent to the platform were ablaze with flags and mottoes:

"Ye that dare oppose not only tyranny, but the tyrant, stand forth.—Paine."

"The world is my country; to do good is my religion.—Paine."

"In vain would hav been the sword of Washington, worthy as he was, but for the pen of Paine.—John Adams."

These are specimens of the mottoes. To Mr. Stevens's right on the platform, there was a frame designed with pictures of the father of the republic and a copy of the Declaration of Independence. To his left there was a framed parchment on which were inscribed the "Nine Demands of Secularism." On a small table before him was a plaster cast of "Thomas Paine writing his 'Age of Reason.'" There were national flags everywhere around.

Mr. Stevens wore the badge of the society—"The flag above the cross." It is a gay white satin badge, with a picture of the Union flag floating over a prostrate cross. All the officers of the society wore similar badges.

Mr. Stevens's effort was a brilliant oration and well spoken.

After the oration, there was music, interspersed with recitations. Then the chairs were cleared away, the orchestra tuned up its instruments, and the dancing began. There were fourteen numbers on the program, and each number was named in honor of some prominent Infidel, or the work of some prominent Infidel. Altogether, it was quite a successful celebration.

E. A. Stevens, Sec. A. S. U.

Illinois.

A few of us here in Strasburg, who love liberty, thought we might as well as not hav a meeting Sunday evening to perpetuate the memory of the birth of Thomas Paine.

We met at the school-house and found above the rostrum the motto: "The world is my country; to do good, my religion.—Thomas Paine."

The house was full by 7 P.M. The music consisted of a violin and organ. The house was called to order by the president (modesty forbids that I should name him), and the object of the meeting stated. Music—"Yankee Doodle."

The president said: "Even the music goes back to 1776." The next piece was a waltz, and while it was played, three women left the room, one of them taking her little boy—a youth of twenty—with her.

W. W. Beals was next introduced to the audience, and spoke for an hour; next, music; a school-teacher, J. M. Tull, read an essay, "Thomas Paine;" music; reading from Paine; a talk by our miller, Mr. Henry Bernhard; reading from the "Age of Reason," by W. W. Beals; music; closing remarks by the president.

This will giv you some idea of our first effort. The husband of the woman that took her boy home draws $12 a month pension, and said anyone who thought anything of himself would not go to such a place. When a man loves his country well enough to fight for it, and then loves God too well to celebrate the birthday of its founders, he is too good to liv among a free people. He sees the beauties of a pension here, but condemns the man who, more than any other, made it possible for him to be a pensioner, Thomas Paine. He is looking to be an eternal pensioner in heaven. His application is in the hands of the Methodists, and he is preparing for the final examination as to his disability. I do not know just what it is. Injury of the brain, probably.

I wish to say to the readers of The Truth Seeker that we celebrated the birth of Thomas Paine here in Milwaukee on the 29th. In the forenoon we met and had two speeches, one in English and the other in German. Professor Lockwood, of Ripon, Wis., gave the one in English and Professor Gaubran the one in German.

The meeting was largely attended. In the evening there was a meeting at Fraternity Hall, where, with music, recitations, and speeches from different ones, they celebrated the occasion in a fitting manner that gave universal satisfaction. Dr. Juliet was engaged in Chicago for the same purpose.

I consider it an honor to anyone to take part in celebrating the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, the grandest man that ever lived in America. And yet at this time there are but few that hav any comprehension of his work and what he has done toward mental liberty for our country. And it looks now as if it would take another hundred years before the masses of the people will be far enough along to accept his teaching.

For to-day we need a Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin as much as we ever did. The colonies did not hav as much reason to rebel against old King George as we now hav to rebel against King Monopoly. They hanged witches and burnt Quakers in the early days of New England. They strangle men to-day for opinion's sake, but call them Anarchists.

Church and state try as hard to suppress Freethought as ever they did, and we do not know but they will yet succeed. All they want is the power. The disposition is just as good. And if the Prohibition party should ever become the dominant party, they will then hav the power. For then they would hav God in the Constitution (for that is what they are working for), and say so publicly. And I am very much surprised when I see Liberals that are working for mental liberty affiliate with this party.

But I want to thank you, Mr. Editor, for the broad and Liberal stand you take in giving us a paper that is free to all sides to discuss our differences of opinion.

And I am also surprised to see persons so narrow-minded as to want you to not put this or that in your paper. For instance, some thought you ought not to put anything in your paper in favor of the Anarchists, showing their intolerance as much as any class, and this from professed Liberals.

But ignorance is at the bottom or corner of all bigotry and intolerance, and they that oppose Anarchy, Spiritualism, or Materialism are generally the most ignorant of those subjects, for when we thoroughly understand any subject we are not afraid of it, and are willing to discuss it in a candid manner.

Liberalism is increasing in our city, in consequence of labor organizations. Our working people are well organized, and they often find that to be true to their church doctrins they would be untrue to their labor interest and right economics and government. So by agitating and discussing all questions the people become more Liberal and enlightened.

Paine Day in San Francisco.

The Liberals of San Francisco held on Sunday evening, Jan. 29th, one of the most entertaining and successful Paine anniversary meetings, probably, that this country has ever seen. Irving Hall, on Post street, was filled with an audience who had come to listen, to be pleased, and to keep the room ringing with applause. Not less than six hundred were present. Mr. H. W. Faust, through whose activity the assemblage was brought together, appointed Capt. A. F. Scott to the chair. The captain is an old timer—patriotic and eloquent—in whom the spirit of the Revolution still survives. His opening speech warmed up the enthusiasm, and the following speakers did not suffer it to cool.

The principal address of the evening was delivered by Samuel P. Putnam, president of the American Secular Union, who held the undivided, uninterrupted, and enthusiastic attention of the audience for half an hour. "We do not gather here," he said, "to consecrate the memory of this man simply because he was Thomas Paine, but because Thomas Paine was the American Revolution. He was the first one to declare independence. He pronounced first the fateful words: 'The free and independent states of America.' Therefore, when we honor him we honor the old flag itself and all that that flag represents. He was born of the people, he understood the people, he realized all that was throbbing in their hearts one hundred years ago; he declared for the new republic and was the author-hero of the Revolution. The prince was no more to him than the peasant, because he saw the man and not the tinsel with which he was hidden. And this thought of Paine was a democratic thought. He was the grandest of patriots, for he loved his country. His country was not simply his nativ soil, for Paine declared, 'The world is my country; to do good my religion.' Where there was anything in the world to be accomplished for liberty, there was his heart. Where there was any struggle for liberty, there was his church and his altar. Faithful indeed he was to this grand idea. Upon two continents he labored for liberty, and surrendered everything in order to be true to his own convictions. If the word 'religion' means a devotion to principle, Thomas Paine was one of the most intensely religious men that ever lived."

Other addresses were made by Mr. Geo. T. Bruce, who is the Ed King of this coast, except that he pays more attention to Freethought and temperance than to labor questions; and by Professor Seymour, a Freethinker, who regards D. M. Bennett as the greatest writer, and THE TRUTH SEEKER as the greatest paper, this country has ever been blessed with. There was also music, instrumental and vocal. Such an occasion, such an audience, and such speakers will not come together again in this city for a year.

Let met add that the cause of Freethought on the coast has experienced a boom.

First on the Roll of Honor for January stands the name of James Tuttle, of Atlanta, Ill., who attended the last Congress, and pledged $25 for the Campaign Fund by taking a life membership. This contribution would hav reached the secretary much sooner had he not been laboring under the delusion that Mr. Tuttle lived at "Atlantic," instead of Atlanta. James Tuttle is not much of a talker, but as a worker and giver is entitled to take high rank among the noblest and best Liberals of our time, as his frequent labors and contributions amply testify. It is sad, however, to contemplate that our younger men do not more often show ardent love for the Liberal cause, when they see these old apostles who, besides having borne the brunt of the battle as pioneers of Freethought, still hav to sustain the struggle financially, even when weighted down with the burden of eighty years, as is our venerable friend Tuttle. If possible, I shall soon take a trip through Illinois, and will then tell your readers more of Mr. Tuttle.

Photius Fisk is another to whom the cause of freedom—mental and physical—is profoundly indebted for his unflagging generosity, which will be the subject of peans of praise in coming time. Ever ready to assist, Mr. Fisk has just paid another $25 into the treasury of the Union, but again there is a tinge of sadness to think that in his enfeebled condition—unable to walk, read, or write—we hav to appeal to such afflicted Liberals, because we know that despite their decrepitude their hearts are still sound to the core. As it is "more blessed to giv than to receive," may Mr. Fisk be abundantly repaid by a knowledge of worthy work being well done. Mr. Fisk's thought for many years has been concentrated on the well-being of others, and, though denied the dearest boon of the student and thinker, the faculty to read or write, whate'er betide himself, he has ever been foremost in sustaining the battle for mental freedom, which is grandly commendable of his qualities of mind and heart. It is hard to realize how much is the debt of gratitude we owe such moral heroes as Photius Fisk. It is perhaps idle to hope that he will be fully restored to vigor at his advanced age, but if there were any virtue in mental healing, his complete restoration would soon be an accomplished fact, for that doubtless is the desire of every true Secularist in the land who knows the name of Photius Fisk. Many Liberals of means and robust health should blush to be reminded of their indifference by these acts of earnest old heroes.

Another veteran soldier fn the battle against religious bigotry is William Case, of Lafayette, Ind., who sends $10 to keep the flag of freedom flying. As Brother Case intends doing something better before he dies, we shall hereafter make special mention of him.

William Redfield, of Stanley, Iowa, is a sterling soldier intent on elevating "our flag above the cross," and who, with Brother Risk and others, makes it exceedingly interesting for the foes of mental freedom, by distributing literature and engaging lecturers in his neighborhood. Brother Redfield attended the last Congress and knows something of the importance of the work to be done, and is also anxious that the next Congress shall be held in this city.

Carl Hyldahl, of Fort Thomas, Ariz., is introduced to us through the Investigator, and sends $5 for the good of the Union. In his communication, replying to letter and certificate (which evidences that he is a gentleman of culture), Brother Hyldahl says he is "glad and proud to be a member of the Union." May he be fully able to hold the Secular fort in Arizona till mental freedom is secured.

William Reynolds, of Wanship, Utah, is not a Latter Day Saint by a large majority, but is an activ, energetic, intelligent Liberal, so he sends his "tithing" to the temple of common sense, as represented by the American Secular Union, instead of the church of Zion, with regrets that a couple of ciphers cannot add value to the above figures. The secretary, following the phrase of a distinguished senator, says, "Me, too." Brother Reynolds is secretary of the Utah Secular Union, which is shaking up things, and it doesn't look as though the Mormon saints were likely to "reign immortal" in Utah—not while Brother Reynolds is around.

E. R. Evans, of Durand, Ill., attended the Congress at Chicago, and pledged $2, which he forwards with the wish it were multiplied about a hundredfold, for the purpose of spreading the light of universal mental liberty. Thanks, Brother Evans.

Brother Vitt's contribution came also through the Investigator. The rest, with the exception of Mr. Ross's donation, are all the work of Miss Voltairine de Cleyre's energy in the very first place where she solicited contributions to aid the American Secular Union, and there are more of them that hav not reached me yet.

This establishes the fact that if the American Secular Union does not become a flourishing organization it will be owing largely to the indifference of lecturers. With their assistance it can be built up and made a power in the land; without their aid, or the activ energetic work of agents who go among the people to rouse them to the importance of the fight, it is liable to wane and die. It is the desire of the board of directors to engage the services of the Liberal lecturers as special agents of the Union, upon certain conditions, and either pay them a liberal commission or a specified sum out of the treasury at the end of the month or year. There has been complaint in the past than only a few persons were benefited by the American Secular Union, and for the future we propose to diversify its advantages as well as its labors, and it is hoped that those lecturers who are willing to act as such special agents will receive the aid and encouragement of all Liberals who believe in the work of secularization of state. As some splendidly equipped men and women are likely to enter the lecture field in our behalf, it looks as though we were likely to succeed.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

French, English, and Latin.

The following couplet in French was submitted to the readers of a daily paper some years ago for translation:

Pas de lieu
Rhone que nous.

It is impossible to make any meaning out of it; but, reading it by sound, you hav:

Paddle your own canoe.

Here is a verse in hog Latin which every reader can understand, when told that it is about three foolish brothers:

Tres fratres stolidi
Took a boat for Niagri;
Roarum, foamum, surgebat,
Boatum overturnebat,
Et omnes tres drowndiderunt,
Qui swimaway non potuerunt.

And here is another not quite so intelligible, owing to the imperfect knowledge of the boy who made it. For laughing in school he was compelled to compose a verse without a dictionary, so he attempted to describe what made him laugh, as follows:

Mus cucurrit
Plenum sed
Contra meum
Magnum ad.

Sed (but) and ad (to) the boy made to mean "butt" and "toe," so that the verse read: "A mouse ran full butt against my big toe." BURR.

The S. S. V. Spy.

Rev. C. A. Bartol in February Forum.

There is among us a legal agency, appointed with a large salary, supported and empowered for the praiseworthy purpose of hindering or visiting with condign penalty the circulation of obscene pictures and books. One of the methods, perhaps the chief one, employed to this end, and which court and Congress connive at or shut their eyes to, is the agent's hypocritical ordering, under an assumed name, of a print or volume which he pretends to want, with no object but the obtaining of evidence against the publisher and shop. The officer plays the part of a decoy-duck to bring the shy and secretiv offenders within reach of his law-loaded gun. But for what recompense could one consent to be an informant in ambush, on terms recognized in no Hebrew, Christian, or accepted pagan code? Something of his manhood is always sold by the spy. Part of his remuneration, if it be not blood-money, is a bribe for his sly adventure and a sop to his shame. "Will ye speak deceitfully for God?" says Job. The devil, whipped round a stump, leaps on our backs from behind. As in the Cossack tale Lord Byron founds his poem on, the reformer who sacrifices to his zeal the honor which is the soul of reform, is borne, like Mazeppa, to his overthrow on the unmanageable steed he mounts. We cannot educate in others the nobleness we violate in ourselvs. Indecency in all its forms, for the sake of ourselvs and our children, let us discourage and suppress in every honest way, and drive it out of stores and galleries, and from our manners and our mails; yet not in ways underhand, but with courage and strengths unstained by public opinion, aboveboard. Let us free our minds from the hurtful cant that detectivs must be sinners who, by breaking the eighth, and ninth, and tenth commandments, can please God or serve the commonwealth. Such incentivs in hunting down iniquity blind us as to the nature and track of what we pursue. Culture of falsehoods yields a baleful crop. Besides, it puts the hunter on a wrong scent. Not the lines in a picture nor language in a book, but the intent of the canvas or composition, must determin whether it be impure. Nude art is not live nudity. The marbles of Greece and Italy, like Adam and Eve in the garden, are naked and not ashamed. We speak of the holy Bible; but how unholy in many a passage, were it not redeemed by its aim.

What Is Evolution?

Everybody nowadays talks about evolution. Like electricity, the cholera germ, woman's rights, and the great mining boom, it is "in the air." It pervades society everywhere with its subtle essence; it infects small talk with its familiar catchwords and its slang phrases. Everybody believes he knows all about it. Everybody is aware, in a dim and nebulous semi-conscious fashion, that it was all invented by the late Mr. Darwin, and reduced to a system by Herbert Spencer. It is generally understood in the best-informed circles that evolutionism consists for the most part in a belief about nature at large essentially similar to that applied by Topsy to her own origin and early history. It is conceived, in short, that most things "growed." Especially is it known that in the opinion of the evolutionists as a body we are all of us ultimately descended from men with tails, who were the final offspring and improved edition of the common gorilla. That, very briefly put, is the popular conception of the various points in the great modern evolutionary program.

It is scarcely necessary to inform the intelligent reader, who of course differs fundamentally from that inferior class of human beings known to all of us in our own minds as "other people," that almost every point in the catalog thus briefly enumerated is a popular fallacy of the wildest description. Mr. Darwin did not invent évolution any more than George Stephenson invented the steam-engin, or Mr. Edison the electric telegraph. We are not descended from men with tails any more than we are descended from Indian elephants. There is no evidence that we hav anything in particular more than the remotest fiftieth cousinship with our poor relation the west African gorilla. Science is not in search of a "missing link;" few links are anywhere missing, and those are for the most part wholly unimportant ones.

But a more serious error than all these pervades what we may call the drawing-room view of the evolutionist theory. So far as Society with a big initial is concerned, evolutionism first began to be talked about, and therefore known, when Darwin published his "Origin of Species." That great book consisted simply of a theory as to the causes which led to the distinctions of kind between plants and animals. With evolution at large it had nothing to do; it took for granted the origin of sun, moon, and stars, planets and comets, the earth and all that in it is, the sea and the dry land, the mountains and the valleys—nay, even life itself in the crude form—everything, in fact, save the one point of the various types and species of living beings.

It was in the last century that the science of evolution really began to take form and shape in the separate conceptions of Kant, Laplace, Lamarck, and Erasmus Darwin. Kant and Laplace came first in time, as astronomy came first in logical order. Stars and suns, and planets and satellites, necessarily precede in development plants and animals. You can hav no cabbages without a world to grow them in. The science of the stars was therefore reduced to comparativ system and order, while the science of life, and mind, and matter were still a hopeless and inextricable muddle. It was no wonder, then, that the evolution of the heavenly bodies should hav been clearly apprehended and definitly formulated while the evolution of the earth's crust was still imperfectly understood, and the evolution of living beings was only tentativly and hypothetically hinted at in a timid whisper.

In the beginning, say the astronomical evolutionists, not only this world, but all the other worlds in the universe, existed potentially, as the poet justly remarks, in "a haze of fluid light," a vast nebula of enormous extent and almost inconceivable material thinness. The world arose out of a sort of primitiv world-gruel. The matter of which it was composed was gas, of such an extraordinary and unimaginable gasiness that millions of cubic miles of it might easily be compressed into a common anti-bilious pill-box. The pill-box itself, in fact, is the net result of a prolonged secular condensation of myriads of such enormous cubes of this primeval matter. Slowly setting around common centers, however, in anticipation of Sir Isaac Newton's gravitation theories, the fluid haze gradually collected into suns and stars, whose light and heat is presumedly due to the clashing together of their component atoms as they fall perpetually toward the central mass. Just as in a burning candle the impact of the oxygen atoms in the air against the carbon and hydrogen atoms in the melted and rarefied wax or tallow produces the light and heat of the flame, so in nebula or sun the impact of the various gravitating atoms, one against the other, produces the light and heat by whose aid we are enabled to see and know those distant bodies. The universe, according to this now fashionable nebula theory, began as a single vast ocean of matter of immense tenuity, spread all alike over all space as far as nowhere, and comparativly little different within itself when looked at side by side with its own final historical outcome. In Mr. Spencer's perspicuous phrase, evolution in this aspect is a change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous; from the incoherent to the coherent, and from the indefinit to the definit condition. Difficult words at first to apprehend, no doubt, and therefore to many people, as to Mr. Matthew Arnold, very repellent, but full of meaning, lucidity, and suggestivness, if only we once take the trouble fairly and squarely to understand them.

Every sun and every star thus formed is forever gathering in the hem of its outer robe upon itself, forever radiating off its light and heat into surrounding space, and forever growing denser and colder as it sets slowly toward its center of gravity. Our own sun and solar system may be taken as good typical working examples of how the stars thus constantly shrink into smaller and ever smaller dimensions around their own fixed center. Naturally we know more about our own solar system than about any other in our own universe, and it also possesses for us a greater practical and personal interest than any outside portion of the galaxy. Nobody can pretend to be profoundly immersed in the internal affairs of Sirius or of Alpha Centauri. A fiery revolution in the belt of Orion would affect us less than a passing finger-ache in a certain single terrestrial baby of our own household. Therefore I shall not apologize in any way for leaving the remainder of the sidereal universe to its own fate, and concentrating my attention mainly on the affairs of that solitary little, out-of-the-way, second-rate system whereof we form an inappreciable portion. The matter which now composes the sun and its attendant bodies (the satellites included) was once spread out, according to Laplace, to at least the farthest orbit of the outermost planet—that is to say, so far as our present knowledge goes, the planet Neptune. Of course, when it was expanded to that immense distance, it must hav been very thin indeed—thinner than our clumsy human senses can even conceive of. From the orbit of Neptune, or something outside it, the faint and cloud-like mass which bore within it Cæsar and his fortunes, not to mention the remainder of the earth and the solar system, began to converge and gather itself in, growing denser and denser but smaller and smaller as it gradually neared its existing dimensions. How long a time it took to do it is for our present purpose relativly unimportant; the cruel physicists will only let us hav a beggarly hundred million years or so for the process, while the grasping and evolutionary geologists beg with tears for at least double or even ten times that limited period. But at any rate it has taken a long while, and, as far as most of us are personally concerned, the difference of one or two hundred millions, if it comes to that, is not really at all an appreciable one.

As it condensed and lessened toward its central core, revolving rapidly on its great axis, the solar mist left behind at irregular intervals concentric rings or belts of cloud-like matter, cast off from its equator; which belts, once more undergoing a similar evolution on their own account, hav hardened round their private centers of gravity into Jupiter or Saturn, the earth or Venus. And round these again, minor belts or rings hav sometimes been formed, as in Saturn's girdle of petty satellites; or subsidiary planets, thrown out into space, hav circled round their own primaries, as the moon does around this sublunary world of ours. Meanwhile, the main central mass of all, retreating ever inward as it dropped behind it these occasional little reminders of its temporary stoppages, formed at last the sun itself, the main luminary of our entire system. Now, I won't deny that this primitiv Kantian and Laplacian evolutionism, this nebular theory of such exquisit concinnity, here reduced to its simplest terms and most elementary dimensions, has received many hard knocks from later astronomers, and has been a good deal bowled over, both on mathematical and astronomical grounds, by recent investigators of nebulæ and meteors. Observations on comets and on the sun's surface hav lately shown that it contains in all likelihood a very considerable fanciful admixture. It isn't more than half true; and even the half totters in places. Still, as a vehicle of popular exposition the crude nebular hypothesis in its rawest form serves a great deal better than the truth, so far as yet known, on the good old Greek principle of the half being often more than the whole. The great point which it impresses on the mind is the cardinal idea of the sun and planets, with their attendant satellites, not as turned out like manufactured articles, ready made, at measured intervals, in a vast and deliberate celestial orrery, but as due to the slow and gradual working of natural laws, in accordance with which each has assumed by force of circumstances its existing place, weight, orbit, and motion.

The grand conception of a gradual becoming, instead of a sudden making, which Kant and Laplace thus applied to the component bodies of the universe at large, was further applied by Lyell and his school to the outer crust of this one particular petty planet of ours. While the astronomers went in for the evolution of suns, stars, and worlds, Lyell and his geological brethren went in for the evolution of the earth's surface. As theirs was stellar, so his was mundane. If the world began by being a red-hot mass of planetary matter in a high state of internal excitement, boiling and dancing with the heat of its emotions, it gradually cooled down with age and experience, for growing old is growing cold, as every one of us in time, alas, discovers. As it passed from its fiery and volcanic youth to its staider and soberer middle age, a solid crust began to form in filmy fashion upon its cooling surface. The aqueous vapor that had floated at first as steam around its heated mass condensed with time into a wide ocean over the now hardened shell. Gradually this ocean shifted its bulk into two or three main bodies that sank into hollows of the viscid crust, the precursors of Atlantic, Pacific, and the Indian seas. Wrinklings of the crusts, produced by the cooling and consequent contraction, gave rise at first to baby mountain ranges, and afterward to the earliest rough drafts of the still very vague and sketchy continents. The world grew daily more complex and more diverse; it progressed, in accordance with the Spencerian law, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, and so forth, as aforesaid, with delightful regularity.

At last, by long and graduated changes, seas and lands, peninsulas and islands, lakes and rivers, were wrought out by internal or external energies on the crust thus generally fashioned. Evaporations from the oceans gave rise to clouds and rain and hail-storms; the water that fell upon the mountain tops cut out the valleys and river basins; rills gathered into brooks, brooks into streams, streams into primeval Niles, and Amazons, and Mississippis. Volcanic forces uplifted here an Alpine chain, or depressed there a deep sea hollow. Sediment washed from the hills and plains, or formed from countless skeletons of marine creatures, gathered on the sinking bed of the ocean as soft ooze, or crumbling sand, or thick mud, or gravel and conglomerate. Now upheaved into an elevated table-land, now slowly carved again by rain and rill into valley and water-shed, and now worn down once more into the mere degraded stump of a plateau, the crust underwent innumerable changes, but almost all of them exactly the same in kind, and mostly in degree, as those we still see at work imperceptibly in the world around us. Rain washing down the soil; weather crumbling the solid rock; waves dashing at the foot of the cliffs; rivers forming deltas at their barred mouths; shingle gathering on the low spits; floods sweeping before them the countryside; ice grinding ceaselessly at the mountain top; peat filling up the shallow lake—these are the chief factors which hav gone to make the physical world as we now actually know it. Land and sea, coast and contour, hill and valley, dale and gorge, earth-sculpture generally—all are due to the ceaseless interaction of these separately small and unnoticeable causes, aided or retarded by the slow effects of elevation or depression from the earth's shrinkage toward its own center. Geology, in short, has shown us that the world is what it is, not by virtue of a single sudden creativ act, nor by virtue of successiv terrible and recurrent cataclysms, but by virtue of the slow, continuous action of causes still always equally operativ.

Evolution in geology leads up naturally to evolution in the science of life. If the world itself grew, why not also the animals and plants that inhabit it? Already in the eager, activ eighteenth century this obvious idea had struck in the germ a large number of zoölogists and botanists, and in the hands of Lamarck and Erasmus Darwin it took form as a distinct and elaborate system of organic evolution. Buffon had been the first to hint at the truth; but Buffon was an eminently respectable nobleman in the dubious days of the tottering monarchy, and he did not care personally for the bastile, viewed as a place of permanent residence. In Louis Quinze's France, indeed, as things then went, a man who offended the orthodoxy of the Sorbonne was prone to find himself shortly ensconced in free quarters, and kept there for the term of his natural existence without expense to his heirs or executors. So Buffon did not venture to say outright that he thought all animals and plants were descended one from the other with slight modifications; that would hav been wicked, and the Sorbonne would hav proved its wickedness to him in a most conclusiv fashion by promptly getting him imprisoned or silenced. It is so easy to confute your opponent when you are a hundred strong and he is one weak unit. Buffon merely said, therefore, that if we didn't know the contrary to be the case by sure warrant, we might easily hav concluded (so fallible is our reason) that animals always varied slightly, and that such variations, indefinitly accumulated, would suffice to account for almost any amount of ultimate difference. A donkey might thus hav grown into a horse, and a bird might hav developed from a primitiv lizard. Only we know it was quite otherwise. A quiet hint from Buffon was as good as a declaration from many less knowing or suggestiv people. All over Europe the wise took Buffon's hint for what he meant it; and the unwise blandly passed it by as a mere passing little foolish vagary of that great ironical writer and thinker.

Erasmus Darwin, the grandfather of his grandson, was no fool; on the contrary, he was the most far-sighted man of his day in England; he saw at once what Buffon was driving at, and he worked out "Mr.

Buffon's" half-concealed hint to all its natural and its legitimate conclusions. The great count was always plain Mr. Buffon to his English contemporary. Life, said Erasmus Darwin, nearly a century since, began in very minute marine forms, which gradually acquired fresh powers and larger bodies, so as imperceptibly to transform themselvs into different creatures. Man, he remarked, anticipating his descendant, takes rabbits or pigeons and alters them almost to his own fancy by immensely changing their shapes and colors. If man can make a pouter or a fantail out of the common sort; if he can produce a piebald lopear from the brown wild rabbit; if he can transform Dorkings into Black Spanish, why cannot nature, with longer time to work in, and endless lives to try with, produce all the varieties of vertebrate animals out of one single common ancestor?

It was a bold idea of the Lichfield doctor—bold, at least, for the times he lived in—when Sam Johnson was held a mighty sage and physical speculation was regarded askance as having in it a dangerous ouch of the devil. But the Darwins were always a bo'd folk, and had the courage of their opinions more than most men. So even in Lichfield, cathedral city as it was, and in the politely somnolent eighteenth century, Erasmus Darwin ventured to point out the probability that quadrupeds, birds, reptils, and men were all mere divergent descendants of a single similar original form, and even that "one and the same kind of living filament is and has been the beginning of organic life."

The evolutionary idea is briefly this: that plants and animals hav all a natural origin from a single primitiv living creature, which itself was the product of light and heat acting on the special chemical constituents of an ancient ocean. Starting from that single early form, they hav gone on developing ever since, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, assuming ever more varied shapes, till at last they hav reached their present enormous variety of tree and shrub, and herb and sea-weed, of beast and bird, and fish and creeping insect. Evolution throughout has been one and continuous, from nebula to sun; from gas-cloud to planet; from early jelly-speck to man or elephant. So at least evolutionists say—and of course they ought to know most about it.

But evolution, according to the evolutionists, does not even stop there. Psychology as well as biology has also its evolutionary explanation; mind is concerned as truly as matter. If the bodies of animals are evolved, their minds must be evolved likewise. Herbert Spencer and his followers hav been mainly instrumental in elucidating this aspect of the case. They hav shown, or they hav tried to show (for I don't want to dogmatize on the subject), how mind is gradually built up from the simplest raw elements of sense and feeling; how emotions and intellect slowly arise; how the action of the environment on the organism begets a nervous system of ever greater and greater complexity, culminating at last in the brain of a Newton, a Shakspere, or a Mendelssohn. Step by step, nerves hav built themselvs up out of the soft tissues as channels of communication between part and part. Sense-organs of extreme simplicity hav first been formed on the outside of the body, where it comes most into contact with external nature. Use and want hav fashioned them through long ages into organs of taste and smell and touch; pigment spots, sensitiv to light or shade, hav grown by infinit gradations into the human eye, or into the myriad facets of bee and beetle; tremulous nerve-ends, responsiv sympathetically to waves of sound, hav turned themselvs at last into a perfect gamut in the developed ear of men and mammals. Meanwhile corresponding percipient centers hav grown up in the brain, so that the colored picture flashed by an external scene upon the eye is telegraphed from the sensitiv mirror of the retina, through the many-stranded cable of the optic nerve, straight up to the appropriate headquarters in the thinking brain. Stage by stage the continuous process has gone on unceasingly, from the jelly-fish with its tiny black specks of eyes, through infinit steps of progression, induced by ever-widening intercourse with the outer world, to the final outcome in the senses and the emotions, the intellect and the will, of civilized man. Mind begins as a vague consciousness of touch or pressure on the part of some primitiv, shapeless, soft creature; it ends as an organized and co-ordinated reflection of the entire physical and psychical universe on the part of a great cosmical philosopher.

Last of all, like diners-out at dessert, the evolutionists take to politics. Having shown us entirely to their own satisfaction the growth of suns, and systems, and worlds, and continents, and oceans, and plants, and animals, and minds, they proceed to show us the exactly analogous and parallel growth of communities, and nations, and languages, and religions, and customs, and arts, and institutions, and literatures. Man, the evolving savage, as Tylor, Lubbock, and others hav proved for us, slowly putting off his brute aspect derived from his early ape like ancestors, learned by infinitesimal degrees the use of fire, the mode of manufacturing stone hatchets and flint arrow-heads, the earliest beginnings of the art of pottery. With drill or flint he became the Prometheus to his own small heap of sticks and dry leaves among the Tertiary forests. By his nightly camp fire he beat out gradually his excited gesture language and his oral speech. He tamed the dog, the horse, the cow, the camel. He taught himself to hew small clearings in the woodland, and to plant the banana, the yam, the bread-fruit, and the cocoa-nut. He picked and improved the seeds of his wild cereals till he made himself from grass-like grains his barley, his oats, his wheat, his Indian corn.

In time he dug out ore from mines, and learned the use first of gold, next of silver, then of copper, tin, bronze, and iron. Side by side with these long secular changes, he evolved the family, communal or patriarchal, polygamic or monogamous. He built the hut, the house, and the palace. He clothed or adorned himself first in skins and leaves and feathers; next in woven wool and fiber; last of all in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. He gathered into hordes, tribes, and nations; he chose himself a king, gave himself laws, and built up great empires in Egypt, Assyria, China, and Peru. He raised him altars, Stonehenges, and Karnaks. His picture-writing grew into hieroglyphs and cuneiforms, and finally emerged, by imperceptible steps, into alphabetic symbols, the raw material of the art of printing. His dug-out canoe culminates in the iron-clad and the Great Eastern; his boomerang and sling-stone in the Krupp gun; his boiling pipkin and his wheeled car in the locomotiv engin; his picture-message in the telephone and the Atlantic cable.

The grand conception of the uniform origin and development of all things, earthly or sidereal, thus summed up for us in the one word evolution, belongs by right neither to Charles Darwin nor to any other single thinker. It is the joint product of innumerable workers, all working up, though some of them unconsciously, toward a grand final unified philosophy of the cosmos. In astronomy, Kant, Laplace, and the Herschels; in geology, Hutton, Lyell, and the Geikies; in biology, Buffon, Lamarck, the Darwins, Huxley, and Spencer; in psychology, Spencer, Romanes, Sully, and Ribot; in sociology, Spencer, Tylor, Lubbock, and De Mortillet—these hav been the chief evolutionary teachers and discoverers. But the use of the word evolution itself, and the establishment of the general evolutionary theory as a system of philosophy applicable to the entire universe, we owe to one man alone—Herbert Spencer.

Very many other minds—from Galileo and Copernicus, from Kepler and Newton, from Linnæus and Tournefort, from D'Alembert and Diderot, nay, even, in a sense, from Aristotle and Lucretius—had been piling up together the vast collection of raw material from which that great and stately superstructure was to be finally edified. But the architect who placed each block in its proper niche, who planned and designed the whole elevation, who planted the building firmly on the rock and poised the coping-stone on the topmost pinnacle, was the author of the "System of Synthetic Philosophy," and none other.—Home Journal.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

LEON, KAN., Jan. 9th, 10th, 11th.—From hades to paradise, was my thought, as I remembered the horrors of Fall River, when ushered into the cosy, comfortable, happy home of Jerry Benninghoff, one of the most highly respected and enterprising men of Kansas—a practical, earnest Liberal, the loved and honored leader of a valiant host of fearless truth seekers.

Leon is a live town, and is struggling heroically to survive the stagnation resulting from having been "boomed." There are a goodly number of ungodly women in Leon, who are models of all that is estimable and praiseworthy; they rival the men in their zeal and devotion to Freethought. The weather was intensely cold, nights dark and tempestuous, yet quite a number came six miles to attend the lectures. Leon only needs its Liberals organized, a Sunday science-school and social advantages inaugurated, and it would become the banner town of Liberalism in Kansas.

ANDOVER, KAN., Jan. 12th.—The Wolf brothers are the worthy standard-bearers, and hav a hard battle to wage. The majority of the inhabitants of the little town are deplorably ignorant, and consequently rabidly pious; but the logical arguments are powerful, and even more potent are the good, consistent lives of probity and benevolence of the two Wolf brothers and their families. I lectured on "Life's Duties," at the school-house. It took considerable courage to face the terrific blizzard, but about forty, and among them three ladies, were present. One old gentleman, friend Hoxie, walked two miles to hear the Boonton blasphemer.

BENTON, KAN., Jan. 13th, 14th, 15th.—I rode across country to Benton, about seven miles. No abatement of the severe cold. Wind cut like a knife. Delivered lecture in a large unoccupied store; only about twenty-five ventured out. The stove was kept red-hot, so the temperature was comfortable, and considerable interest was awakened.

Saturday the blizzard was on the war-path, increasing in potency; at dusk it was 12° below zero and rapidly growing colder—even the indomitable E. K. Robinson failed to venture out. About 7 o'clock the stalwart Clark Henry decided the weather was too severe, and that it was useless to attempt a lecture, so he started for home, but soon returned. He had met some friends who had come nearly three miles, and must not be disappointed; so we decided I should lecture in his (Clark Henry's) store. A big fire having been kept going all day, it was somewhat comfortable as to temperature, and they could improvise seats. Thirty-five were present, and we had a really happy, and I believe a profitable, time.

That night the mercury fell to 20° below zero. I slept in a room without fire, but with thorough ventilation. I could scrape with my finger-nail the thick frost on my pillow, and the moisture of my breath actually formed ice and froze my mustache to the bed-clothes. Oh, the sunny, balmy zephyrs of Kansas! Beautiful climate! Go West, young man! Go West!

Sunday afternoon the weather moderated to only a few degrees below zero. We had a good time at the afternoon lecture. The evening lecture was well attended. I had a delightsome visit with the sturdy old veteran Liberals, Joseph Henry and wife—far down the stream of life beyond the average, yet vigorous, jolly, retaining all their faculties, rejoicing to labor for the spread of Freethought. When I left Benton on Monday the whole town was discussing the lectures, and earnestly debating whether the teachings of Liberalism would not prove more productiv of happiness than Christianity.

DODGE CITY, KAN., Jan. 18th, 19th, 20th.—W. F. Dean, Morris Collar, and Clarence Petty are the blessed and most effectiv trinity of Dodge. They never dodge responsibility or self-sacrifice needed to aid the cause of Freethought. Three lectures were advertised at the court-house; first night, good attendance; second night, court-house crowded, big interest. I urged all to ask the ministers why they denounced Liberals for doubting some statements in the Bible, while they proved each week they did not believe God, Christ, or the declarations of the Holy Ghost, or the apostles; for they taught violation of the Sabbath and worship of the pope of Rome, by keeping Sunday, without even a piece of a text to justify them. The poor seven ministers, despite the assured help of heaven and the angels, got scared out of their senses by one little, gray-headed, fat man. They rushed round town frantic, imploring everyone they thought had any influence to go see the sheriff and county clerk and insist on their shutting me out of the court-house—already by my two lectures I had undone all their united labors of the past year—if allowed to continue I should destroy all veneration for the Bible and bring religion into contempt.

And the parsons succeeded in bulldozing the officials. They obeyed the orders of the clergy and closed the court-house against me. We only learned of the pitiful servility of the sheriff, his deputy (made so by Infidel interest), and the county clerk late in the afternoon. Poor, abject lickspittles! The contemptible sycophants abjectly crawled like whipped hounds at the feet of their masters and whined their sorrow for having displeased the parsons. At once the friends secured the Opera House. The notice of change was very short. The Opera House was objectionable in such cold weather, on account of the impossibility of warming it, yet we had a large attendance, and great interest and enthusiasm. Nothing the poor, silly clergy could hav done could hav better helped our cause. It awoke a spirit of inquiry and interest among many who, but for this act of injustice toward us, might never hav cared to investigate.

One of the best and most respected business men of Dodge City, a good, outspoken Liberal, named Zimmerman, died the night before I left. The church, with its usual love of truth, justice, and honesty, wrought on the feelings of the grief-demented wife to allow the funeral to be held in the church. In health, the parsons all declared Zimmerman would be cast into hell for his Infidelity. In death, finding he was generally loved and lamented, they preached him into heaven for his wealth, and now claim all his benevolent acts are the evidences of his devout Christianity.

When will Liberals learn to deposit, with tried and trusted friends, proper legal authority for Liberal friends to take charge of their bodies at death, and prevent parsons insulting their memory?

As Dr. York has special engagements at Salt Lake City, and required the rest of Utah for week-day night lectures, and my engagements would interfere, I hav withdrawn all Utah appointments. I shall return from Delta back to Pueblo, thence south to New Mexico and Arizona, and shall reach southern California at the beginning of March. Will the friends of southern California and the coast take due notice and govern themselvs accordingly?

Practical Endowment of the Church.

The advances being made by the church in America toward a more complete union with the state—or at least toward such a union as shall burden the state with a large share of the church's expenses—leads naturally to the consideration of the effect of such union in other countries. It is a fact which some may regard as curious that, while other countries are throwing off the yoke of ecclesiastical rule, this country, having once thrown it off, is now putting it on again. This is being done by piecemeal, a little here and a little there, but the progress is steady, and must be as satisfactory to the churchmen as it is unsatisfactory to the taxpayer.

The advocates of the Church of England, like the religious people here, deny that there is any pecuniary union of church and state in Great Britain. They assert that the church receives no grants of money, has had no state funds or property given her, and owes nothing to Parliament or the British taxpayer. This is by no means true, though the payment of the item for church rates in the tax bills has been made optional with the ratepayer. The Church of England is connected with the state by what is called the royal supremacy, constituting the reigning monarch the head of the church; by the right of the bishops and archbishops to a seat in the House of Lords, and by national endowments, which amount annually to £9,500,000. The capitalized value of the property held by the church is over £220,000,000. Until 1868, the church rates realized £400,000 per annum for the church, and compulsory Easter offerings and oblations brought the spouse of Christ some £80,000 more.

According to the Act of Settlement, the wearer of England's crown is required to "join in the communion of the Church of England, as by law established;" and many of Victoria's good Protestant subjects think that by her recent visits to Roman Catholic churches the throne has become vacant. But she is not likely to abdicate on this account, nor should her Church of England friends find too much fault with her, for she has also joined in the Presbyterian communion—the established religion of Scotland—without evoking adverse comment. Catholicism is rather more absurd, but no more cruel and barbaric, than Presbyterianism. But the queen does not count heavily in the government of Great Britain, and her communion with one church or another is not of great importance. Widely different is it with the "spiritual lords," however. The hindrance to material progress and to liberty of a union of church and state finds hundreds of facts in proof in the unwise aws which giv a man devoted to "God" power to control actions affecting the people. Macaulay wrote that the Church of England has been for more than one hundred and fifty years the steady enemy of public liberty. The votes of the bishops in the House of Lords hav fully justified Macaulay's words. They voted against the bill rendering Roman Catholics eligible to Parliament; against the bill removing the political disabilities of Jews; against the bill abolishing ecclesiastical tests and restrictions upon entrance to the universities; against the bill abolishing the oath which bound all officials to do nothing against the peace and welfare of the Protestant church, or the bishops and clergy of said church, or their rights and privileges. Of course they voted against the abolition of compulsory church rates in the tax bill. On all other questions affecting the freedom of the people they were found on the side of the oppressor. And we of this country found the clergy, when clothed with power, always retrogressiv, mean, and tyrannical. They are so to-day. Every new movement encounters their opposition. They possess no toleration, no humanity. Their spirit is narrow, jealous, selfish. If they succeed in their attempts to obtain power through legislation in the interests of religion, we shall find them, like the English spiritual lords, a constant and persistent obstructiv force.

In Scotland, the state church costs the country about £380,019 per annum. In Wales the church receives the income of property worth £300,000 a year, making £10,180,019—nearly fifty million dollars—as the annual contribution of Great Britain to the Episcopal church. This, of course, represents but a fraction of the income of the church, as its private endowments and benefactions amount to colossal sums.

Now, if it costs the state fifty millions of dollars a year to dispense the gospel in a compact country like Great Britain, with only some thirty-five millions of inhabitants, what would it cost in this great nation, several states of which are bigger than all Great Britain, with sixty odd millions of people? Yet a union of church and state, which will mean here what it means in England, is being slowly brought about by the churches. Only a few months ago the churches of Brooklyn, N. Y., made a clean steal of over a million dollars, by a law passed exempting them from paying their assessments for street improvements—a most unjust law, which throws the whole burden of taxation upon the secular taxpayers. With disendowment of the Church of England a leading question in England, here in this country we are practically endowing the various sects by governmental aid reaching millions of dollars. The trouble is, our legislators are not statesmen, but politicians who care only for momentary success for their party, no matter how obtained.

Breaking Fetters.

We hav often said that the Mormon problem will be best settled by Freethought. The church cannot do it, and the persecution of the Mormons by the Protestants leads to revolt, resistance, and war. The imprisonment of a few polygamists will never make Utah civilized. Polygamy will go when the religion goes, and under the influence of the Freethought propagandism of the sturdy heretics of Salt Lake City the religion is going.

It was remarked of the Paine meeting held at the Opera House in Salt Lake on the 29th ult., that the great audience was composed of "Mormon apostates or Mormons weak in the faith." Lawyer Bennett, who presided, said the faces were almost entirely strange to him. The Tribune accounts for this phenomenon by saying that "as thinking Mormons comprehend the utter groundlessness of their creed, and the hypocrisy and hollowness of the church hierarchy, they are gradually falling away, until within a few years the entire rotten fabric of Utah Mormonism is bound to collapse with a crash that will set people to wondering how it was that they were duped so long by such a soap-bubble. Infidelity, Atheism, Agnosticism, and Freethought are spreading rapidly right under the noses of those upper silurian fossils, the Mormon bishops, and will reap a tremendous harvest ere long." And not only did these Mormons turn out in large numbers to listen to Dr. York's tribute to Thomas Paine, but they loudly applauded his eloquent denunciations of the Christian religion, which has for so many years calumniated the character of Paine, covering his grave deep with slanderous filth. And when Dr. York turned his oratorical battery upon Mormon orthodoxy, referring to it as spiritual slavery, the audience also agreed with him. The Tribune says if the enthusiasm over Freethought continues, a crusade will be begun against orthodoxy and for Liberal ideas.

Here, then, is the potential force that shall destroy the surviving "twin relic." Freethought, education, a knowledge that no supernatural religion is true, and that all such are bad guides and governors of men, this is the revival needed in Utah more than legal measures. It appears to us that Utah is a good field for the Freethought missionary. The Mormons of intelligence hav been through the mill of Protestantism and therefore will not return to that, but look to something higher and better, which they will find in Liberalism, the religion of humanity. Materially, as well as spiritually, the Mormons will benefit by their emancipation, and if the prediction of the Salt Lake Tribune is based on truth the future of Utah is bright. From slavery to the most ignoble of superstitions to the limitless air of freedom is a stupendous change. Yet we hope to see the Mormons make it through the efforts of the heretic lecturers and workers of the West.

Trouble in Toronto.

Mr. Charles Watts and his friends in Toronto desired to incorporate a stock company for the purpose of publishing Secular Thought and Secular books and pamphlets, and made due and regular application to the authorities for a charter. This has been refused by the Ontario government, for the reason "that Christianity is a part of the law of the land," and the government can giv no sanction "to the incorporation of any company known or considered to be in opposition to Christianity."

Of course, this decision of the government will in no way interfere with the regular publication of Secular Thought, but Mr. Watts and his friends do not propose to submit to even this petty amount of persecution. The case has been placed in legal hands, and the paper comes out squarely for a fight. The conduct of the government, says Mr. Watts, in refusing the charter is an attempt to prevent the circulation of Freethought literature throughout the Dominion. The majority of the ministers and the masses of the people of Ontario, proclaims the editor of Secular Thought, are so wedded to the traditions of bygone ages, and are so incrusted in despotism and bigotry, that they are slow to grasp the conception that, as time rolls on, newer and more enlarged ideas and rules of life are required to regulate the intellectual and societarian conduct of the human race.

This is undoubtedly true, and the wonder is that the bigots hav let the Freethinkers of Toronto alone so long, and that they confine their suppressiv efforts to the attempt to deprive the Secular company of a charter. When Mr. Watts said he proposed to locate in Canada we encouraged him by remarking that as soon as the Christians found out he was there they would put him in jail. He said, "All right, me boy," and at once hired a house in Toronto. The Christians hav not yet placed him behind the bars, but they would enjoy doing so, and the stronger Secular Thought becomes the stronger will be the efforts of the Christians to suppress it. The action of the government is no doubt instigated by the clergy of Toronto, who will not be content with this little turn of the rack. Canada is a good way behind the rest of North America, bringing up the rear of a not very respectable procession of religious beliefs, and her clerical rulers will not willingly submit to the overthrow of their cherished dogmas. This attempt to suppress the heretic is not a very serious matter, but it shows plainly what the authorities will do when opportunity offers. And if no further chance occurs, we should not be surprised if the government made one. Like Jonathan Edwards, the Canadian Christians can tolerate an Atheist only when he keeps quiet.

Errors of Statement.

In response to our criticism of his assertion that in the United States "the people are free; speech is free; the mails are free," Dr. Monroe, the jovial and optimistic editor of the Ironclad Age, says:

"A very small provocation will make an Anarchist organ slop over. We didn't hav this fact sufficiently in view last week. Yet it was hardly supposable that anyone not swollen with unappeasable hate would fail to see that our remarks on the liberty of speech and the press referred only to political liberty. Religious liberty is quite a different thing. You may plot against the government openly and freely, but once conspire against God and you are gone. They who want to pile the world's goods and money into a heap from which every loafer may take according to his needs, and to which every industrious man shall contribute according to his ability, can go into New Jersey and Delaware openly preaching bombs and the blowing up of Congress and the courts; but if they touch on God to deny him, or his son, or his book, to jail they will go instanter."

Wrong again, good doctor. Hav you forgotten that the police of Hoboken and Jersey City, New Jersey, broke up the meetings of those fellows who want to pile the world's goods and money into a heap? The authorities positivly refused to let them preach bombs and the blowing up of Congress. The New York authorities are of the same mind, and several Anarchist gatherings hav been forcibly suppressed, and the Anarchists who preached bombs and the blowing up of Congress sent to jail. Did you hav these facts sufficiently well in view when you wrote this rejoinder?

Again. There is no record that New Jersey ever sent a man to jail for preaching against God. New Jersey fines such preachers twenty-five dollars and costs.

Once more. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not an Anarchist organ. Not one word in favor of Anarchy did the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER ever write. Per contra, he has written thousands against it. Did you hav this fact sufficiently well in mind last week?

Fourthly. No one, swollen or otherwise, could possibly construe your remarks into meaning anything but that you maintain that there is positivly no restriction in this country upon speech or publication. You said that "every man is a million times free to preach and print in decent language whatever he believes," and charitably added that "the man who believes there is restriction upon free speech in this country should leave it of his own volition, or be made to on the double quick." Is it consistent, dear doctor, for a Freethinker to advocate the expulsion of men from the land because of belief? Would you expel Mr. Reynolds because he not only believes but knows that such restriction exists? Would you expel everyone who believes that the advocates of bombs and the blowing up of Congress hav been suppressed?

Did you hav those facts sufficiently well in view last week?

Counting the Sheep and the Goats.

The Rev. D. Dorchester, who is publishing through the Methodist Book Concern a volume on "Christianity in the United States From the First Settlements to the Present Time," givs in the last Advocate an advance column of figures showing the number of evangelical Protestant churches, ministers, and communicants in this country. He admits that the statistics are imperfect, but claims that his quotations and estimates are not far from accurate. His figures are:

If we giv the Roman Catholics seven millions, and the Unitarians and Universalists and other sects not considered evangelical a few score thousand, we shall still find that two-thirds of the population of the United States do not belong to any church at all.

The great unchurched multitude can be divided into saints and sinners in any numbers agreeable to the divider. We hav no means whatever of knowing how many Infidels there are in the country, but if we should estimate the number of up-and-down, outspoken, unterrified Freethinkers—men who always put in a word for liberty whenever the opportunity occurs—at one hundred thousand, we think it would be high enough. The number of real Infidels in the country who for one consideration or another conceal their thoughts on religious questions will undoubtedly run up into millions.

Messrs. Harman and Walker.

There is danger, owing to their isolated position, that the Messrs. Harman and Walker will be over looked by the great mass of liberty-lovers of the country, and left to contend single-handed with the Christian bigots who hav undertaken their ruin. The two or three months intervening before the trial will soon be gone, and we judge by the reports published in Lucifer that the defense is not yet prepared, and that funds are lacking to pay counsel.

It seems anomalous that a Freethinker, when talking to Freethinkers, must preface a plea for justice with a denial of any sympathy for the opinions of the victim; but such a procedure is necessary, and we desire it distinctly understood, at the outset, and once for all, that in helping the gentlemen connected with Lucifer, and in asking others to help them, we do not advocate Anarchy, free love, or the common employment in newspapers of the language for which they are indicted. We simply desire that justice shall be given to all men.

The case of the two Harmans and E. C. Walker is something like that of D. M. Bennett. They hav circulated another person's ideas, expressed in print, and that the Christians are using as a pretext to suppress Lucifer. Mr. Bennett circulated Mr. Heywood's ideas, and the Christians used that to suppress THE TRUTH SEEKER, which they did not succeed in doing. They did, however, succeed in getting Mr. Bennett into prison. Let us hope the Lucifer people will not hav that cruel experience to endure. The few words which Heywood wrote in bad taste, the small, coarse paragraph which Lucifer published, were and are nothing to the church folks; it was and is the paper that they desire to squelch. To hav Christianity attacked, riddled by argument, and covered with ridicule makes the good pietists mad to their very heels. But they cannot answer us—they could not answer Mr. Bennett; they never try to answer Mr. Walker—and they reach out for the club of the law. That club they know well how to wield. Persecution has become to them a familiar plaything. They are skilled in its use. There is no instrument of cruelty, from the flame-charred stake to the agony wrought by a drop of water, from the rack to the prison, from the gallows to a simple legal fine, there is no method of torture with which the pious Christians are not acquainted. It is their best argument, and they hav brought it to bear upon three men in Kansas, in the endeavor to convert them. But it will not work.

What the Lucifer people need, and need speedily, is a favorable expression of public opinion, backed by funds with which to hire lawyers. Not an expressed agreement with their ideas, but a good word for themselvs individually, and a stern demand upon the courts of Kansas that justice be done, and not persecution. Money is equally necessary, for justice comes high. Court fees and lawyers' wages eat up much cash. It cost over a thousand dollars to clear Mrs. Slenker, which was compassed then by an accident, a technical slip of the prosecution which Mr. Chamberlain's sharp eyes discovered. Everyone who feels interested in having justice done should make this fight his own, because it is not, as Colonel Ingersoll said of Mr. Reynolds's case, a question of a little property, neither is it one involving simply the liberty of three men. It is a question whether the church shall use the machinery of law to crush out an opponent it cannot answer. No matter how much we may dislike the opinions of the defendants, it is the duty of those who desire justice to put in their word where it will do the most good.

A Great Work.

From the Industrial Appeal.

We last week received a package of pamphlets from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, among which was the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC. This ALMANAC is something unique and original—it is good for saint or sinner. The pictures or cartoons that adorn its pages illustrate prominent occurrences in the Bible. Christians should hav this ALMANAC by all means, as it will lead them to search the scriptures for the purpose of comparing the text with the illustrations, and Liberals and Agnostics should hav it for the edification and amusement it contains. Children, big and little, cry for this little book. Price twenty-five cents. You can order at this office.

From San Francisco Freethought.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1888 is now at hand. It contains 117 pages, with twenty-four finely executed portraits of distinguished American Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers; also thirteen of Heston's Bible sketches. The latter are accompanied by commentaries such as were never before made, written by George E. Macdonald. A page of calendar is devoted to the chronology of each month, telling the dates of the births and deeds and deaths of great men who hav made their days luminous. At the foot of each calendar page is some sentiment or bit of philosophy that is worth remembering. The history of 1887, by the editor, reviews the past and points out the indications of progress or retrogression. It is an able article. Robert C. Adams contributes a paper on "Theism and Atheism." E. J. Bowtell, after making his bow, tells of his daily life in a Trappist monastery; the American Secular Union is written of by Samuel P. Putnam; there is an account of the International Freethought Congress in London; an article on "Sunday Amusements," by Frederic May Holland; "The Blasphemy Case;" "How the Layman is Deceived," by E. M. Macdonald; "A Horrible Man," by L. K. Washburn; and "When Did Jehoshaphat Die?" is considered by J. E. Remsburg, wherein the writer shows from biblical authority that Jehoshaphat died at sixteen different times. Besides these contributions, the ANNUAL contains numerous poetical selections, making a volume as large as the North American Review, all for two bits. The work is on sale at the office of Freethought.

Mr. Comstock's Progress in Modesty.

We hav it from an artist of this city that since he was thrown out of a Philadelphia court Anthony Comstock, in pursuance of his sacred duty, has grown so modest that he will not retire at night until the Christian Observer is removed from the table. When about to change his mind, also, he goes into another room.

It has been usually thought that the female sex is the more modest of the two, but the young lady who would not disrobe till a picture of her father hanging in her bedroom had been turned to the wall must yield the blush to Anthony.

Letters from Friends.

161 W. 128TH ST., NEW YORK, Jan. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the last edition of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Jan. 28, 1888, Mr. Van Buren Denslow asserts that good land can be bought for fifty cents per acre in New York state. Will Mr. Van Buren Denslow inform a subscriber where and how such land can be procured, and if a clear title can be got for less than the cost of the land? An answer to this will oblige a subscriber. WILLIAM BROADBELT.

NEWARK, N. Y., Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for six or eight years, and still hold fast to the good old paper. I should like to hav C. B. Reynolds giv a lecture here some time this spring or summer, as we hav a few Liberals here, and it may be we can do some good, as we hav thirteen churches here.

I hav heard R. G. Ingersoll lecture twice. He is a noble, good man, if I am any judge of human nature.

WM. H. H. STEBBINS.

GORE BAY, ALGOMA, MANITOULIN ISLAND, Dec. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find the sum of $5 for subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the "Story Hour," and the ANNUAL for 1888. I want the "Story Hour" for my little girl. Freethought, or Secularism, is making great headway, for since I espoused the cause, which was in 1879, I can notice great changes. In Hamilton, at that time, we could not get the bill-poster to put up our bills, and I was one of four that went around at night and posted them for B. F. Underwood's lecture. There are a few stanch Secularists in Hamilton, and many that hav not the courage of their convictions. Poor fellows! It is not by such weaklings that we enjoy the liberty that we hav to-day. E. L. BRAZENOR.

HAMMONTON, N. J., Jan. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Does not Mrs. Severance speak plainly and truthfully? Also J. K. Magie? Well done, Ingersoll! Has he not about shown up all the inconsistencies of the doctor's "Presbyterianism?" I wish both those Replies could be circulated amongst the creed-bound everywhere, and maybe there are some who would get light.

Those pictures in the paper—what a power to show up the absurdities of the Bible and the encroachments of the would-be holy religions! That shadow across the United States and into Canada—how significant and suggestiv of what the country is coming to!

Well, I am glad there are those who are capable of showing how our institutions are being perverted from the original as intended by the framers of the United States Constitution.

D. R. WOLLISON.

DANA, ILL., Jan. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed in last week's issue a strong appeal for help to advance the cause of Freethought and the secularization of our government, by Secretary E. A. Stevens. Now, it seems to me that for a few to contribute to the Secular fund does not amount to much. Now, if there are two thousand Liberals in the United States, a very little from each one would amount to considerable, but when a few hav got to do all of the work it doesn't seem fair. One's freedom and religious liberty are just as valuable to one as another's are to him.

I hav a suggestion to make, which is as follows: The secretary to prepare a pamphlet defining the object of the American Secular Union, and the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and mail it in a letter to each Liberal, with a pamphlet particularly urging upon him the necessity of prompt action. If every Liberal had assurance that everyone would contribute, he would giv a small sum, which would amount to considerable.

Find inclosed twenty-five cents for the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1888. Yours for truth, WM. STRAUN.

NORTH PLEASUREVILLE, Jan. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure that I am permitted to write you a few lines for the first time. I am living in Henry county, Ky., forty-five miles from Louisville. This is a flourishing country, and full of plenty. Myself and uncle are the only men taking your important paper here. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER now over a year. I am well pleased with it. I hope you may prosper and that it may grow in the future. I am glad to get it every week. It has learned me what human nature is. I heard an old Methodist say, the other day, he didn't want a TRUTH SEEKER in his house; I told him it was better than to hav so many bankrupt notices to pay his honest debts with. I am fifty-four years old, and never joined a church, yet I am a poor man. But if I had plenty of money I could tear up stumps. Our little town has a plenty of churches—old Baptist and new Campbellites, and so on, with a negro Methodist at the head. I hope you will excuse my plain talk. I am a plain talker, what little I know. You hav some of the smartest writers I ever read after, and the best letters. I was at a water-mill the other day. The miller was a Baptist. I asked him if he didn't want a paper to read. He said Yes, if was a moral paper. I told him I would not read any other kind myself. I told him it was THE TRUTH SEEKER. Said he, "I believe that doctrin will carry some day, for the people are getting so bad that their churches are going down." I told him there were two sides to every subject, it mattered not what. "Oh," he said, "but one side to serve God on!" I told him it didn't look like it to look at the cupolas pointing up to heaven—all different ones, some round, and some square, and some flat, and some iron, and some wood; it depends on the money and the lady members.

Oh, what a thing human nature is! There are a good many men who like to read your valuable paper but are afraid somebody will say they are reading Infidel sermons. Anyhow, I can't accommodate all of them with THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Editor, giv it to them; they need it. I would be glad to hear a lecture from some of the Freethinkers, but if I don't soon I will hav to fall back on THE TRUTH SEEKER to giv me lectures; that will do as well. The representations Heston givs can't be beat, and they are true. They tally with the Bible precisely. People look at them first and then read next. People are learning fast that there are two sides to a case. They tell me, "Aren't you afraid those papers will ruin you?" "Why, no; there is no soft place in my head. I hope I am a Freethinker." And I am a Republican, if I am by myself in Kentucky. I hav always been this, and always expect to be. I distribute your paper in our neighborhood, so they may know and learn what it is. They say, "I would take that paper but I am too poor." They will after awhile. They tell me, "Can't you let me hav a TRUTH SEEKER this week?" "Yes, just as soon as I look over it I will."

I notice in your paper that you hav a faithful writer from our state, that is, from Lexington, Ky. He is a good one. I will say your paper comes as true as a clock every Saturday morning, rain or shine—never fails. The postmaster told me the other day he wanted to read one of them. I told him, All right, he should hav one. A. A. DUNNAVAN.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Jan. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, for which please send me the inclosed list of books. I hav kept them constantly loaned out until they are completely worn out, and I wish to keep them in circulation.

I am working very slowly, but am just beginning to wake up some of the people here, and I think about March I will be able to send you one or two new subscribers from this city. If we could hav a few lectures here, I think it would help your paper very much, but all of our lecturers seem to steer clear of this place, and we need the Holy Ghost, or some other ghost, here worse than anywhere in this country.

I heard one Methodist preacher here telling his flock that when the children of Israel were in bondage in Egypt they became so enraged that one of them drew his revolver to shoot his taskmaster, and I asked one of the members if they were not just a little short of revolvers at that time. "I guess not," said he. Now, with that kind of stock in the pulpit, I think our cause is perfectly safe. GEO. M. HARE.

BALSTON SPA, N. Y., Jan. 15, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me six copies of "Christian Absurdities," by John Peck, and one copy of "For Her Daily Bread." I was a little struck with the letter from Brother "Ohio" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 14th. He complains of the poor in the Infidel ranks making their wants known to the non-sympathizing world. We hav lots of poor in our ranks, it is true, but is it a crime to be poor? Are Infidels non-sympathizing? I think not. It is our duty to hav sympathy for our fellow-man, and do what good we can. I am a poor man, and toil and spin hard every day, but it has cost me $150 the year past in the way of help to my fellow-men. And behold, they know not whence it came, but it has done my old heart good to see them enjoy it, and no doubt thanking almighty God for it, not knowing that the "God" that sent it is a poor horseshoer. If every Infidel in the land (those who are able) would pay $1 a year to help the needy of our ranks, it seems to me that it would do a great amount of good. Say, brother Infidels, let us hav a fund for that purpose. I would like to hear from friends on the question. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER family.

HARRIET AND WM. THORPE.

SMITHVILLE FLATS, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $12, $5 of which please hand to Charles Eckhard, secretary of the American Secular Union, and the remaining $7 is for yourself—$3 for my subscription for another year and $4 for two new ones, which I donate as usual to pay for the illustrations, which are immense. I also inclose ten cents in stamps for another of John E. Burton's pamphlets on the "Birth and Death of Religions." I am doing better missionary work with that than any other book, because he is well known in this part of the state—married his wife near us. I suppose you know he has been the iron-king of Wisconsin during three or four years past. My son Gage E. Tarbell, a young lawyer of thirty summers, of Milwaukee, Wis., has been in company with him. Both being well known here makes people seize this little book and read with avidity when they otherwise would not touch it. I hope you still hav some of them.

I wish you and your brother George the greatest success. Will some day take his paper. MRS. M. M. TARBELL.

HANNIBAL, MO., Jan. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: About three months ago, a few of us concluded that we would try what could be done in the way of increasing the membership of our Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists by sending out through the mails at our own expense copies of our constitution and blank applications for membership. In less than ninety days, with an outlay not exceeding ten dollars, we hav enrolled ninety members from twenty-four states and territories, many of whom are prominent in the Liberal ranks. Encouraged by this result, our society, at the regular business meeting, Jan. 1, 1888, appointed a special committee to continue the good work for the ensuing year, which cannot be done without aid. The committee consists of A. E. Trabue, William Gatts, and F. H. Rau. All of these (excepting myself) are stanch business men of unquestioned integrity, as may be verified by reference to any bank or business house in this city. Their names guarantee the honest and judicious use of all funds placed in their hands, and it is to be hoped that the members of the Brotherhood and the friends of the cause everywhere will not fail to respond to this call at once, so that the committee may not be trammeled in their work. All contributions for this purpose should be sent to the treasurer, A. E. Trabue, at Hannibal, Mo., who will acknowledge the same through any Liberal paper or magazine in the United States that may be designated. The committee is required to make quarterly reports of their work, which will be sent to all the leading Liberal papers for publication.

F. H. RAU, Secretary.

NEW WINDSOR, ILL., Jan. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: One of our clergymen having asked the question, "What is a preacher?" I will partly answer it.

A preacher is a cinder in the eye of reason.

A clock running backward.

A pilot in a fog moving in a circle.

A quack doctor putting a plaster on an imaginary sore.

A cupboard with nothing in but an old bill of fare.

A person who claims to be only half a man when he is buying a railroad ticket.

An undertaker screwing a coffin-lid down on a fact.

A smoke-stack of hell.

A tailor patching a creed.

A bear on the paradise market.

A cooper who makes nothing but the bung-holes.

A banker who givs you a draft on heaven for cash in hand.

A miller grinding souls for toll.

A traitor swearing allegiance to the United States and trying to seat King Jehovah on a throne.

A student blindfolded.

A poultryman with a fine eye for young ducks.

The great and original anesthetic.

A dealer in "puts and calls" who "puts" the money in his pocket and "calls" the other fellow "dear brother."

A preacher, dear friends, is a fine pair of whiskers and a fashionable suit of clothes which the dear sisters call, "Our minister." W. S. FLEHARDY.

LIBERAL, MO., Jan. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A young cyclone in the form of C. B. Reynolds struck the town of Liberal in the early part of December, and such a shaking up as he gave the cranks—I among them—we hav never had before, and never will again until he returns, which he has promised to do when he comes back from the West. He gave us something to think about besides slandering each other, and indeed it is about all we hav done since the town started. He is one of the most entertaining speakers it has ever been my lot to listen to—grand, poetical, earnest, honest, eloquent, and in fact everything that makes a good speaker. I used to hav but one god, Ingersoll, but now I hav two. He seemed much pleased with us, and left hosts of admirers and friends behind him when he went away, although some of our best "Liberals" had business that called them away, afraid to meet a true Liberal.

We hav a splendid idea. It is the American Idea, published in the interest of the Freethought University, and suffering humanity, edited by Leahy and Allison, two of the most earnest workers in the Liberal ranks I hav ever met. There has been a movement on foot by a few good "Liberals" to crush the Idea because it is not run in the interest of monopoly, but with the help of true Liberals they will "ride safely over the billows," and in time publish one of the best Freethought papers in the world. Mr. Leahy is one of the grandest men in the world. He is doing a great work in the university, and if it does not succeed it will be the fault of the Liberals, not him. If all our people were like him and Mr. Allison, our town would be different.

I am, for the simple reason that I cannot liv without the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, A SUBSCRIBER.

MORRISTOWN, MINN., Jan. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I write to report the organization of a Liberal association under the name of the Rice county Scientific, Moral, and Reformatory Association; the objects and purposes of which, as set forth in our constitution, are: The investigation and development of the occult sciences and forces of nature; to adopt the most efficient means to procure female suffrage; to prevent illiberal class legislation; to promote the temperance cause; to work for the most equitable settlement of the conflict between labor and capital, and to obtain a more equitable system of taxation. The following officers were elected, to hold office until our first anuual meeting, to be held in June next: Mrs. S. J. Lenont, president; Mrs. Hathaway and Mr. Charles Grant, vice-presidents; Mrs. Laura A. Grant, recording secretary; Mr. J. C. Mathews, treasurer; Messrs. G. Lenont, N. Travis, and Charles Purrintin, executiv committee; Mr. D. Birdsall, correspondiug secretary. The associa ion is composed of circles or clubs, not to exceed seven, located in different localities in the county, to hold weekly meetings; the association to hold monthly meetings; and the by-laws provide that part of the funds shall be appropriated to employ a developing agent, whose duty shall be to visit all the club meetings and monthly meetings, and the association has employed Dr. S. C. Trowbridge to perform the duties of said ageut. The doctor is doing a good work, and is very competent both as a lecturer and as an improvisor of poems and songs, always inviting his audiences to select subjects for both lectures and songs. At our meetings, at which, on account of the extremely cold storm, there were but few convened, we raised by voluntary contribution the sum of $116. But now what we want is Liberal papers, pamphlets, and literature, to educate the masses to a proper understanding of the importance of united work, and that if united we can by the ballot-box settle all the evils that are convulsing our nation, without resorting to Anarchy; and I now solicit donations from all Liberalists of Liberal papers and pamphlets that they may hav accumulated on their hands that they do not care to keep. They can by so doing do much good in sowing the seeds of Liberal ideas, and showing the important necessity of immediate action to prevent all efforts to unite church and state. Our association is purely Secular and scientific, and all Liberal donations will be gratefully received. All large packages of Liberal papers please send by express to my address, and small donations by mail, and if the donors want the postage remitted, I will do so if they send me a postal card requesting it.

I send inclosed a postal note for $1.25, seventy-five cents of which is to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months to Dr. S. C. Trowbridge, Morristown, Minn.; and for the balance, please send me just as many back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as you can afford to for distribution in our clubs, and I will try to increase your subscription list, and so will the doctor.

Direct all donations, either by mail or express, to

D. BIRDSALL, Corresponding Secretary.

GREEN HILL, O., Jan. 9, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I see that Mr. Shoemaker, of Rush, Pa., says, "Stop my paper," in consequence of what little you said in regard to those Anarchists in Chicago. And I think those cartoons hurt a little. I think Mr. Shoemaker is rather easily foundered. I think it would be well for him to clear out another little patch in the wilderness of his brains just large enough to plant one grain of common sense, and cultivate well and partake freely. It will be good for what ails him. You never said one word in justification of Anarchy that I remember. You only condemned their trial and execution, and so do I. Mr. Magie, of Duluth, speaks my mind exactly (Nov. 22d). There was no evidence that one of those men had anything to do with throwing the bomb, that I could find. I see another one of those rigidly righteous and unco guid from Paris, Ill., has squealed. He says if you hav any more sympathetic editorials or communications to publish, not to put them in his paper, but smear the place with printer's ink and he will be satisfied. Now, don't you serve my paper that way. I tell you emphatically, don't you do it. I do not want a black spot to appear on the face of my paper to represent a correspondingly black spot on the inside of my skull. No, sir, I want light, not darkness.

ENOCH WICKERSHAM.

PERRINGER, W. VA., Jan. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It seems that coöperation is coming uppermost as one of the easiest and most practicable solutions of the labor question, without a change of political parties and principles. As many of your readers are, no doubt, believers in coöperation, some of whom, perhaps, would like to hav the opportunity of uniting with others on some equitable plan of associativ life, I would like to call their attention to the Clay County Coöperativ Colony now being organized in this state, for the purpose of engaging in farming, mining, timbering, etc. The Colony is to settle on a 1,300-acre tract of valuable coal and timber land lying on the Elk river in Clay county, and, if possible, begin operations next spring. The plan of coöperation is one of the most equitable and practicable ever devised for securing to its members the full fruits of their toil, besides affording them social enjoyments and educational advantages not possible under the competitiv system that now prevails. Nearly all the organizers of this colony scheme are Liberals, and it is this class of coöperators that we especially desire to hav unite with us. Those who feel interested in our project and wish to better their condition in life can obtain further particulars by addressing A. Allen Noe, secretary, Parkersburg, W. Va., or the undersigned.

C. BURSEE.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a constant reader of the old TRUTH SEEKER for six years. During that time I hav loaned every copy of the paper to some one to whom I thought it would do the most good, and some of them to four or five persons. I succeeded in getting a newsdealer to keep them for sale, and hav got several customers for them with good result. I find the most of the Jews of this city are Liberally inclined. I hav talked to thousands of people of Kansas City, including a good many of the clergy, and hav failed to find any real backbone in any of them concerning what they know. When you run them to their hole they say you must hav the evidence of the Christian religion to understand the meaning of the Bible, which I think a cowardly retreat. As long as I hav breath and strength I calculate to talk against the ignorance of those church-loving people, and the "cunning" of preachers who preach on Sunday and break the law, and idle away their time in the week.

There are thousands of Liberals in Kansas City, and some of the best men of this city are Liberals, but they never say anything for fear of injuring their business, but it has never impaired mine in the least, and everyone who knows A. B. Fox knows my religious opinion, and they well know that I hate a hypocrit in anything.

I hav been very much disappointed in Grover Cleveland's orthodox standpoint. Am disappointed that he even gave a copy of the Constitution to the pope, the greatest tyrant on earth or in heaven or hell.

The Rev. Sam Jones has been holding forth here for two weeks, and has been reinforced by Sam Small and Brother Joseph Jones. They say they hav come to battle the devil, but, instead, he has been abusing the church-members, calling them fools and idiots, bunch-worms, and saying they are not as good as a good devil. But those old preacher-lovers will take any kind of abuse from Sam, because he has license to abuse people; besides, they think they deserve it (and so do I).

Sam Jones has created quite as much excitement as we expected, but not any more than Barnum does when he comes. Both carry lots of cash, and both are large hypocrits. Barnum says he is a humbug; Jones denies it. And so wags the world!

Long may the old TRUTH SEEKER liv to espouse the cause of Freethought and reform. Those pictures of Heston's are simply immense. I hav a scrap-book from last year's pictures; this year I intend to make a book of the paper for future reference. I would be pleased to hear that Robert G. Ingersoll was billed here for another lecture, as there is a large majority here who appreciate his lectures; he always draws a large house. May he liv to see the fruits of his work mature!

I see that C. B. Reynolds has been lecturing all around us. At Kansas City he would do well to come here for a few evenings. May success and prosperity attend THE TRUTH SEEKER, and her banner ever be unfurled to all truth seekers of the world.

A. B. FOX.

WELLAND, ONT., Jan. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In last week's TRUTH SEEKER I noticed an account of the doings of the Kahle family in regard to their brother Daniel. I used to be acquainted with this same Daniel Kahle. He stopped at our place awhile in the winter and spring of 1865, when I was a small boy. After he left we never heard from him until, last summer, C. B. Reynolds in his travels spoke of him. I think he stopped at his residence. We were anxious to know if this was the same Mr. Kahle that we knew of old, so my brother addressed a letter to him at Metamora, asking him if he was the same Daniel Kahle that was at our place in 1865. His answer was, "Yes, I am the same Daniel Kahle;" and he wrote quite an interesting letter, without the shadow of a sign of craziness about it. My brother answered his letter some time afterward, but did not hear from him again. He must hav died about the time the letter arrived. We had not heard of his death until we read it in THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week.

My brother in his letter asked him how he came to be a Freethinker. He said he was a Freethinker before he was at our place, but not so radical as now. At that time our family were all members of the Society of Friends, and knew nothing about Freethought, so of course there was nothing said on the subject. His brother George was with him while here. I do not know if he is the Freethinking brother spoken of, or not.

It is certainly too bad that the Christian bigots should be allowed to hav full sway in the settling up of Mr. Kahle's affairs. It seems the average Christian has no respect for the wishes of dying Infidels. The case of Dr. T. L. Brown is a striking example of this. A more solid Materialistic Infidel than he could scarcely be found, but how shamefully they disobeyed his wishes and instructions in the management of his funeral!

In regard to Mr. Kahle being crazy, I consider that a ruse to prevent his bequest for the Freethought library from being made use of as he intended, as I firmly believe his mental faculties were all right, and I will also say that when I knew him he was a young man of more than ordinary intelligence, but did not know at that time that he was a Freethinker.

Yours in friendship, E. CHANTLER.

ROCKFORD, W. VA., Jan. 16, 288.

MR. EDITOR: As I see nothing in your paper from this part of the Little Mountain State, I seize this opportune time for contributing a few notes to the sea of Freethought. Freethinkers are numerous in this community, but outspoken Liberals are scarce. The Christian regards the Infidel as an outlaw, to be exterminated by abuse and persecution. Let us thank the god of Nature that persecutions only make us the stronger. Let us persevere in our noble efforts to break the gyves of superstition and set free the human soul. Let us march under the banner of this truth: He that converteth a Christian from the error of his views shall save a soul from superstition and cover a multitude of shams.

The Christian religion is being shaken from center to circumference by a mighty earthquake of scientific forces escaping from the unjust restraints of society. Reason, the most puissant and exalted of human faculties, is the weapon of Liberalism. Dogmatical assertion is the weapon of priestcraft. Science has been established by the pen. Religious might has been established by the sword. If "the pen is mightier than the sword," science must and will ultimately prevail over the Christian "philosophy," whose deadly foe it is in spite of all the bigoted assertions of theologians that "every discovery of science adds new proof of the truth of the Bible."

Two would-be revivals recently terminated here unsuccessfully, to the great discomfiture and chagrin of two eloquent Bible-pounders. Score another victory for the triumph of science over superstition. These two worthies labored night and day two weeks with all the zeal of "wrinkled fanaticism" and bigoted ignorance, without a single convert to their faith.

One of these "sky-pilots," an ex-evangelist from New York, made some very remarkable statements in his theological disquisitions, some of which I will reproduce for the benefit of my brother readers:

"It is impossible for God to save a man unless he wants to be saved." Indeed! Is man more powerful than God?

"Bob Ingersoll is utterly destitute of the power to reason." Brother Macdonald, do you hav any doubt in regard to the truth of this minister's modest declaration? Poor "Bob!" I pity the poor, benighted soul, wandering hopelessly in the somber valley of intellectual darkness.

Here is another: "The Bible was not made to teach astronomy." Please notify the board of revisers, so they can strike out such passages as Gen. i, 6, 7; Josh. x, 12, 15, etc.

He also stated that he "would rather be the means of converting one soul to God than be president of the United States eight years." I hav as much confidence in the truth of that statement as I hav in the Baptist preacher's who said he would never consent to hold political office while in God's ministry. A month after making this statement he was a candidate for public office, and "got left."

Yet another: "Every Infidel has on his deathbed called upon the God of the Christians to hav mercy upon his soul, without a single exception"—"unless drugged into insensibility," he ingeniously added. Is this true?

One more: "Infidels are made, not born." Ha, ha, ha! Who made them?

While hurling one of these seedy thunderbolts at the audience, our worthy divine demolished the Bible-stand with his lever of adipose tissue, depositing it and the word of God on the floor.

I take pleasure in complying with your request in your paper by sending the names of all my friends who will, I think, be greatly interested in the invaluable contents of its columns, and likely to subscribe.

WILL FIGHTUM.

GRATTAN, MICH., Dec. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your paper many years, read it carefully, and, on the whole, am well pleased with it. It is said that readers often think they are better judges of what periodicals should or should not contain than those who conduct them. I do not expect yours or any other paper to conform in all things to my personal opinions. One year ago I wrote you a private letter in regard to the Anarchy question, and also a short one that was published, asking you and your correspondents if it were not better to "call a halt" in the discussion of that question. My opinion then was, and still is, that it is not one that properly belongs to a discussion of the principles of Liberals as embraced in the Nine Demands, or the resolutions passed at the last annual convention. As I understand those documents, their whole tone, temper, and spirit indicate that as Liberals, or Secularists, we are in favor of obedience to national and state constitutions and laws. But if questions arise in regard to change or amendment, we are in favor of doing it in a legal manner, and in a full and free discussion of the same.

The principles of Anarchy involve the utter disregard and destruction of all laws; and in regard to Socialism, I cannot easily determin the dividing line where the latter leaves off and the former begins. Of course, Secularists are entitled each and all to their personal opinions in regard to these and all other questions.

But once again I wish to say, let us call a halt in regard to the discussion of these questions to so great an extent in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I say this, because I believe their discussion tends to divide Liberals into factions that disturb and destroy the harmony that should exist, and lead us astray from the legitimate principles that should govern and control all Liberals in words and deeds for the benefit of mankind, as opposed to the intolerant dogmas of Christianity and the efforts of its followers to deal unjustly toward those who do not subscribe to their peculiar opinions. We want harmony in our councils, justice in our demands, adherence to our Constitution and laws in the spirit of the fathers of our government; and if a change is needed, advocate it and make it in a lawful manner.

I never hav, and do not now, intend to express an opinion as to the justice or injustice of the conviction and punishment of the seven Chicago Anarchists. But I will say that the judge who presided at the court, and the jury who pronounced them guilty, were in a position to know more and better in regard to the guilt or innocence of those men than any or all of those who think and talk mercly as impulse or preconceived opinions dictate.

And then, when their appeal for a new trial went to the supreme court of the state of Illinois, shall we assume that the judges composing that court were actuated or governed by any motiv not in accordance with justice under the laws, and with a preference for mercy?

And finally, when the great high court of last resort in our nation took the matter of a new trial under advisement and decided against it, it seems the hight of egotistical presumption for irresponsible individuals to say that it is all wrong.

I find that very few, if any, who express their opinions through THE TRUTH SEEKER are ready to uphold the principles of Anarchists; but with many there seems a strong leaning that way, that should not appear with those who are good, honorable citizens and mean to uphold and sustain our laws and help preserve good order in society. Little straws show which way the wind blows, and I believe it wrong to show in a small way a leaning toward such principles as Anarchists advocate.

Liberal friends, let us not imperil the success of our cause or dishonor ourselvs personally by expressing any undue sympathy for those whom our highest authority pronounces criminals.

We hav boasted, and rightly too, that America was and is an asylum for the oppressed of all lands. But in view of recent events, it may be necessary to modify that expression, when men who flee from oppression in the Old World come here and while yet aliens proclaim their intention to destroy our Constitution and laws, and to do it by revolution that shall drench our land in blood. No, friends, to quote a phrase often used by Mr. Ingersoll, "it will not do." By all the honor we owe to the men, wise in council and brave in war, who imperiled their lives, their homes, and all they held dear to establish our government, which now we claim to be the best on earth, it will not do.

Then, as true friends of humanity, who claim to be engaged in a good work that shall remove and blot out all injustice, let us all endeavor in kindness, charity, and justice to help sustain and built up a world-wide sentiment that will do away with the old spirit of bigotry, intolerance, and hate that has so long and largely controled the world. In order to be consistent all those, of whatever name they may be called, who honestly wish to make this life enjoyable by teaching a better way, should constantly and kindly unite in trying to find it.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

If There Be a God, Where Are You?

With all his arguments cut down,
The parson shook his head,
And, with a sad, reproaching frown,
In substance thus he said:
"Ah, yes! if there no God should be,
I know 'tis very well;
But if there be a God, you see,
Your unbelief means hell!"

Then, parson, search the pantheon
Of all the gods in state,
And him that wears the angriest frown
We all must venerate.
Of him who threatens direst plague
On others' devotees
Must terror-smitten mortals beg
Forgivness on their knees.

A jealous god or jealous spouse
Can make a hell below;
I scorn a creed and shun a house
That's built on hate and woe.
With bliss my heart tumultuous beats,
When reason bids me find
That all the gods in all their seats
Are figments of man's mind.

Baby and the Soldiers.

Rough and ready the troopers ride,
Great bearded men with swords by side;
They hav ridden long, they hav ridden hard,
They are travel-stained and battle-scarred;
The hard ground shakes with their martial tramp,
And coarse is the laugh of the men of the camp.

They reach a spot where a mother stands,
With a baby clapping its little hands,
Laughing aloud at the gallant sight
Of the mounted soldiers fresh from the fight.
The captain laughs out, "I'll giv you this,
A handful of gold, your baby to kiss."

Smiles the mother, "A kiss can't be sold,
But gladly he'll kiss a soldier bold."
He lifts up the babe with a manly grace,
And covers with kisses its smiling face,
Its rosy cheeks and its dimpled charms,
And it crows with delight in the soldier's arms

"Not all for the captain," the soldiers call;
"The baby, we know, has a kiss for all."
To the soldiers' breasts the baby is pressed
By the strong, rough men, and by turns caressed;
And louder it laughs, and the mother fair
Smiles with mute joy as the kisses they share.

"Just such a kiss," cries one trooper grim,
"When I left my boy I gave to him;"
"And just such a kiss on the parting day
I gave to my girl as asleep she lay."
Such were the words of the soldiers brave,
And their eyes were moist as the kiss they gave.

Why I Am a Liberal.

DEAR SUSAN: It's not nice to say, "I can't," till I try, and I am going to try.

Knowledge and reason teach me. I hav studied that great word, "Liberal," many times—it runs through my mind. To be Liberal means to be kind and true, to think for myself, and be the same thing all the time—not one thing in one place and another in another place. I don't think one can be a true Liberal when he acts thus. I want to liv happily, and do all I can to make others happy.

That great word Liberal keeps me thinking we all ought to be kind, gentle, and thoughtful for the welfare of others. Oh, think deep down of that great word Liberal—what it does truly mean! How pleasantly we feel when we think what kind and true Liberals we are trying to be! Oh, would I not like to speak to the whole world, and say, "I am a true, full-blooded Liberal?"

I wonder how many girls are thinking of being a genuin Liberal, as I am trying to be. If the people were all Liberals, everything would rejoice and be glad. I will close for this time. Wishing you success in the Corner, I remain,

Your true friend, SALLIE REMSBURG.

Daleville, Ind., Nov. 14, 1887.

This is a great subject with which to combat, but I will try and express a few feeble ideas.

I am a Liberal because fanatics try to make the Bible a mystery. If the Bible will not stand criticism, let it be discarded like all other faulty productions. A belief in the Bible is simply a belief in the unknown. My reasoning powers tell me that all known facts belong to science.

I am a Liberal because of the freedom allowed in the ranks of Liberals. All people are free to a certain extent, yet nine-tenths of this great country are chained by the links of superstition and priestcraft.

I am a Liberal because of the absurdity of the Bible. Let me cite a case to illustrate my idea. Two boys, Jones and Smith, are playmates together; when manhood arrives they go out into the world together. At last, after committing all the crimes known except murder (he must not murder if he wants to go to heaven—how inconsistent!), Jones is brought to his deathbed. Then he repents. How nicely Jones, the criminal, is saved!

Smith is a kind husband and father. He delights to help his fellow-men, care for the orphans, cheer the sick; but he doesn't "repent." His fate is to burn in everlasting hell. I would rather be a Liberal and go with Smith.

All Liberals hav heard preachers tell about the intuition of savages in regard to their after life; and there is another intuition savages hav—that is, to scalp a white man regardless of his religion.

Hoping that I hav not taxed your patience too long, I will leave this subject for some greater mind. WILL. J. MICKEL.

The Death of Little Mate.

DEAR LITTLE READERS OF THE CORNER: Come up close beside my chair; you may call me Aunt Kate, if you like. I wish to tell you about my dear little daughter who died March 6, 1886. She was eleven years, eleven months, and twenty-one days of age at the time of her death. Like you, she was a little Freethinker, and a reader of the Children's Corner. She was large of her age, with flaxen hair, very large, truthful, gray eyes, broad, high forehead, and bright red cheeks. She reminded me of a maiden-blush rose. She was very loving and affectionate—would kiss my hand and say, "My good mother!" It is so hard to giv her up. I thought I would write something about her for you children to read, and thus build a monument in your minds sacred to the memory of the dear little girl that is gone. When she was small she had a quaint, old-fashioned way, and always disliked to wear red dresses, because they were so gay, liking gray best of all. When she was about five years old, grandpa, one day at dinner, told a funny story at which we all laughed heartily except Mate. I glanced at her and saw the muscles around her mouth quivering, but she looked very solemn as she remarked, "That came pretty near making me laugh!" At another time, I was preparing toast for sick grandma; she said, "Wouldn't it be nice if I were sick and you were fixing that for me?" She was very fond of pets, especially young lambs; she once had two, and her father wished to sell them with the other sheep. When the time came to drive the sheep away, Mate and her lambs were nowhere to be found; she had taken her darlings and gone to a safe hiding-place, where she remained until the danger was over.

One day, after looking in the Bible at the picture of a lamb burning on an altar, she, with a look of great concern on her face, inquired of me what it meant. With all possible dignity, I informed her that they were burning the lamb so that God could smell the smoke, to make him pleased. I wish that I could hav painted the look of utter disgust and contempt that came over her face; it would hav been a rebuke, for all time, to those who believe that such heathenish customs could ever hav pleased a God! Her name was Mary Vermilia. There is a little brown bird on this coast different from any I hav seen in the Eastern states; it has a peculiarly soft voice and only sings early in the morning and at evening. We imagined it said, "Ma, Mary; Ver, Vermilia, Milia, Milia." So she called it her bird. One day she came in with her eyes shining like the stars, to tell me that, finding a fish-worm, she had thrown it toward one of her birds, and that the little creature had taken the worm to a pool of water and washed it before eating it. She was very studious at school, and spent her spare moments in reading. It is now nearly two years since we laid our darling down to rest on the quiet hillside, and I hav waited all this time to gather courage to write this little tribute to her memory. I am afraid you will think this a strange obituary, but I believe in making even death as cheerful as possible. To the memory of our beloved child this is lovingly dedicated.

MR. AND MRS. COPE.

[We are all sorry for the death of one of our number. We know how lonely must be the home without her gentle presence. But the dear little girl will never suffer pain or know a pang of sorrow. Let us be glad that she made sunshine in her home for a little while, and now that she has gone, sweet memories of her may be cherished, and life may receive an added luster because she lived her brief, bright years of joy and gladness.—ED. C. C.]

Sayings of Little Ones.

One day at dinner, one quail was cooked for sick grandma. Little two-and-one-half-years-old, Dot, refused to eat such as the others had, and complained of being sick. I inquired where she was sick. She replied, "In the quail!" You may be sure she had some of that quail. One day after Puppy Judy had been fed a large feeding of milk, six-year-old Bennie remarked that "she looked as though she had been blown up with a gospel-stuffer." I am usually very cheerful. One morning, when I was feeling sorrowful, little four-year-old Creet missed my singing as I went about my work, and said, "Ma, tell a joke!" One day, on coming into the kitchen, I found my seven-year-old Mate holding up a very large old rat; she had his neck pinched between her thumb and finger. I said, "How is it he did not bite you?" She replied, "I hurried up and pinched his neck." After eating griddle cakes, Ral remarked that he had made a square meal. Little four-year-old said, "I should call it a round one!" Little Ben, looking at the picture of the devil at the cross-roads, said, "I shouldn't think they need to be afraid of the debble, when they look so much like debbles themselvs!"

Correspondence.

RED CANON, WYO., Jan. 6, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years, and I am much pleased with the pictures. I read the Correspondence in the Corner, and see that there are quite a number of boys and girls that write to you, so I thought I would try. I go to school and am in the highest studies. I hav four sisters, but I am the only boy of the family, and I think that I am the only Liberal one in my country. I hope that you will find a place in the Corner for this. It is my first letter. Good-bye, for this time.

Yours truly, THOS. W. MACDONALD.

NEVINSVILLE, IA., Jan. 15, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I hav been thinking about writing a letter to you for a long time. To-day is Sunday and it is a sunny day. I see you hav requested the readers of the Children's Corner to write and tell what they hav been reading. I hav lately finished reading the History of Napoleon Bonaparte, and I am now reading aloud to ma the History of Ancient Greece—that is, before Christ—and, of course, it is uncertain. You must not think that I do not read stories, for I hav the "Story Hour," "Apples of Gold," and will inclose money for "All in a Lifetime." I hav read books by Aunt Elmina, viz., "Little Lessons for Little Folks" (which is very interesting, and I think all little folks ought to hav it to read), "The Darwins," "John's Way," and the "Infidel School-teacher; or, Mary Jones." They are all nice stories, and contain much that might instruct older people.

My uncle, F. I. Green, takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Ironclad Age, Freethinkers' Magazine, and the Independent Pulpit. I read them all. I am going to school now, and study Fifth Reader, arithmetic, grammar, history, spelling, and geography, and the teachers are compelled to hav the scholars read physiology aloud.

Our teacher is a lady. She does not say the Lord's prayer or read in the Bible in the morning. Sometimes the scholars sing a song.

The picture of your little niece in front of the "Story Hour" is very pretty, and I hav been thinking about getting a frame for it.

There are two churches in this place—the Congregationalist and the Methodist; but the first named has been closed about three years; the other had a revival and got twenty-two members.

The population numbers 250. You remember the pictures of American Freethinkers that came in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL of 1885—we hav arranged them in a frame, 18x22 inches, with D. M. Bennett's monument in the center and the pictures of Haeckel and Spencer at the sides. It contains thirty-four likenesses. Folks hav thought that it was all printed on one paper. We also hav Ingersoll's and Paine's pictures, life size. Altogether, they make a goodly array of Freethinkers, and we hav also a picture of "The Modern Balaam" framed (one of Watson Heston's pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER).

I think my letter is long enough for this time, so will close, with best wishes for Liberalism. CAROLINE A. TRUMAN.

[Caroline is a model Freethinker, and we hope to hear from her again soon.—ED. C. C.]

TO COMMUNISTS.

I would like to hear from the Communistic readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially my old friends who were intending to join the L. M. and S. S., two years since. We want $5.000 to be subscribed in the next three months, making a capital of $10,000 to start a society in Kansas.

Respectfully, E. E. PARK,

All About Coffee.

Coffee is the seeds of a plant, or, more properly speaking, a tree that flourishes in the tropics. If left to grow naturally, the tree would run up thirty or forty feet, but it is usually kept pruned down in order to facilitate the gathering of its berries. Its flowers are a clear white and resemble orange blossoms; its leaves are a thick, dark green, remaining so the entire year. The fruit is a rich red, changing to dark purple, and resembles somewhat a cherry, and is very nice to eat. Buds, blossoms, and fruit in all stages of development may be seen upon the same tree at all seasons. Each berry has two seeds.

Coffee makes a very palatable drink, and is an important article of commerce. It contains in its raw state aromatic oils, fat, cane sugar, and a substance called caffeic acid, which is called its most important principle.

There are several different kinds of coffee, and its use is known all over the civilized world as a beverage. It also has medicinal qualities, and is given sometimes to stop sickness at the stomach, vomiting, etc. It is an antidote for some kinds of poison, such as opium, and it is useful in destroying bad odors. Therefore it is often used in sick rooms as a sort of disinfectant. It produces a fragrant and particularly agreeable scent when burnt where there are noxious vapors.

Its action upon some people is harmful and injurious, for it tends to increase the action of the heart, producing palpitation and impairing digestion; but it is agreeable to almost everyone, and is in general use in countries wherever it is known.

Of course, you know how the beverage called coffee is made, so we need not go into detail about that. Most people use milk and sugar with it, but nativ Turks, it is said, drink it clear.

Arabian writers first mention coffee, and the word is derived from Kaffa, the name of a place south of Abyssinia, where, in a wild state, it grows in great profusion, and where it was used a long, long time ago. The Turks call it kahve. In a place called Aden, in the fifteenth century, it was a popular drink among the studious, and those whose business or pleasure kept them much awake at night.

There is a pretty legend concerning its discovery that runs in this wise: A poor Arab was wandering one time, about the middle of the fifteenth century, down through Abyssinia, and one day, being greatly fatigued, he sat down to rest at the edge of a shady grove. He thought he would make a fire and boil some rice, for he was faint and hungry. So he cut some shrubs and sticks with which to build a fire. Some branches that he cut he noticed were covered with dried berries, and after he had cooked his rice and was eating it, he began to notice a fragrant, spicy odor arising from the burning berries. He examined the berries, crushing them, and some slipped from his hand into the jar upon the fire that contained boiling water. The weary traveler thought he would taste it, and the drink seemed to strengthen and revive him wonderfully.

"This is excellent," he said; "I will carry some away with me."

He gathered a quantity of the berries, and took them to Aden, whither he was going, and, on his arrival, presented some of them to the mufti, and told that personage that, crushed and put in boiling water, the berries made a most delightful drink.

The old mufti had smoked so much opium in his life that he had become a chronic invalid. His hands trembled and his nerves were in a sad state. He commanded that a beverage should be prepared from the berries, which was done at once.

He pronounced it delicious, and ordered his slaves to go and procure more berries for his use. He began to recover his strength, and was so charmed with the new drink that, in great thankfulness to the tree, he called it cabnah, which in Arabic means "force."

QUESTIONS.—What is coffee? How high does the coffee-tree grow? Describe the flowers and fruit. What are the qualities of coffee? What is its action upon some temperaments? Who first mentioned coffee? From what is the word derived? What do the Turks call it? Relate the legend of the discovery of coffee.

MATRIMONIAL.

Should there be an elderly Liberal lady within the reading circle of THE TRUTH SEEKER possessed of some means, and willing to correspond with an elderly gentleman, a pronounced Freethinker, having also a moderate income, with a view to matrimony, she will please address BOX 13, Ithaca, Mich., giving full name and address. Those only who mean business need write.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

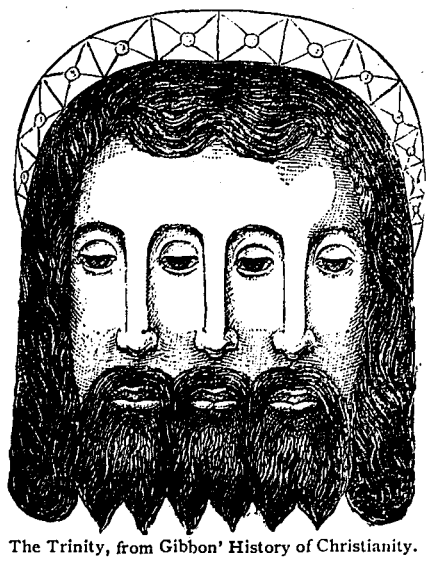
FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.



For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

That Badger Boy at Sunday-school.

THE LESSON OF THE CREATION.

"Now, boys, I will read you the glorious account of the creation;" and the teacher read that wonderful tale of handicraft up to the time before the creation of man, that Badger boy then diving in, as it were, for information.

"Please, mum, where did God get the dirt to make the world of?"

"He created it, James—there was nothing, and he made everything!"

"Cracky! wouldn't old Snooks, who owns half the village, like to make villages and farms out of nothin'? Where was God, mum, when there wasn't no heaven for him to liv in?"

"I don't know, James; and nobody must ask such questions."

"Why not, mum?"

"Because they hav no business to, my son."

"Don't God want us to know where he hung out 'fore he made heaven, mum?"

"Sh! child! you mustn't talk so."

"No'm. What's the spirit of God, mum?"

"I can't explain so you will understand, James."

"No'm. Is it like a boat, a fish, or a duck, mum?"

"Heavens! what a question!"

"Yes'm. Didn't you read that it moved on the waters, mum?"

"The Bible reads so, and that's enough, without any questions, you boy."

"Yes'm. What made God make the world in the dark, mum? Why didn't he hav a light in the first place?"

"That's what no one can tell, you wretched boy! And you just stop!"

"Yes'm. Was it 'lectric light, mum?"

"Yes, that's just what it was."

"Who put up the poles and wires, mum?"

"James Badger, I shall send you home."

"No'm—please. Why didn't God hav it light all the time and no dark, mum?"

"He made night for sleep, child."

"Huh! there wasn't nobody to sleep when he made the world, mum."

"But he knew there would be, dear."

"Yes'm. How'd he know, mum?"

"Because he knew everything, you boy."

"Yes'm. Did he know your pop and ma would git married, and you'd be here, mum?"

"You Badger boy, you stop!"

"Yes'm. Did God make the sun out of fire, mum?"

"Yes, he did." [This was an easy one, and the teacher "got there" readily.]

"Do you s'pose it's kerosene, mum?"

[No response, but James didn't appear to be hurt in his feelings, and asked:]

"Please, mum, did God make the moon of green cheese? Pop says it's green cheese, mum."

"James Madison Badger, I don't know what to make of you; and your father is awful to talk so to his little son."

"Huh! I'm made already, mum. You ain't God, and can't make nothing of me. [This was a bald-headed, naked fact—Comstock would hav gloated over it could he hav caught it on the fly—but the teacher looked as though she wished she was God for about two seconds, if no longer, when J. M. B. would hav been "made nothing of," or looks are to be largely discounted.] But you didn't tell me, mum, if the moon was made of green cheese—is it, mum?"

"No, it isn't, you ridiculous boy."

"Pop says it is, and I guess——"

"He's a wicked man to tell you so; and don't you mention such a thing again."

"Please, mum, what did God make the moon to grow big and then grow little for; then go all out and then come again?"

"I don't know, child; but for a good purpose, of course."

"How do you know, mum?"

"Oh! do stop, will you?"

"Yes'm. Do you cut your corns, mum, after the moon's full, so they'll go 'way with the moon? Ma does."

"Dear me, James Badger, do go home."

"Please, mum, don't make me go. I'll be good. When God made the big whales, mum, where did he get the lamp-oil to put in 'em?"

"James Badger, you'll drive me distracted."

"That's what ma allus says when I ask questions. Is all women driv distracted, mum?"

"They would be, I'm sure, if they all had boys like you." [Tartly spoken.]

"You hain't got no little boy like me, hav you, mum?"

"No, I hav'nt, thank the Lord!"

"Be you married, mum?"

"No, I ain't; and now you stop. I'm just tired out with you."

"Do you thank the Lord 'cos you ain't married, mum? You didn't say so."

"Yes, I—no—er—that is—will you ever stop asking ridiculous questions?"

"Yes'm. Did God make devil's darnin' needles—them long, slim, flyin' things?"

"To be sure he did, James. All such questions I am happy to answer."

"Does the devil darn his stockings with 'em, mum?"

"There you go again, from the sublime to the ridiculous in one step."

"What's the sublime, mum?"

"God is sublime."

"What's ridiculous, mum?"

"Why, the idea of the devil darning his stockings with young beetles, you young heathen."

"Why don't the devil darn his stockin's, mum? Don't you, when there's big holes in the heels o' yourn? Ma says she's seen the holes in 'em when——"

"There, now, you James Madison Badger, you go right straight home. I won't put up with you another minute. You are the wickedest boy I ever saw! The class is dismissed!"

Thus to an end came the "creation" seance.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

BIBLE MYTHS;

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

Odds and Ends.

JAKE: "The present year will be the longest on record." Pete: "How so?" Jake: "Why, it is 1 and three 8s already."

"WHATEVER is is write," said the weary editor of a country newspaper, whose patent outside had failed to appear on time.

STRANGER: "Excuse me, sir; but are you the sporting editor?" Editor (with indignation): "Not by a blankety-blank sight. I'm the religious editor!"

"YOU may bring me," said the Boston girl, "a small portion of Celtic disturbance." "A which, is it?" said the waiter. "Irish stew, you stupid," answered she.

"Is this Mr. Comstark?" asked a caller at the art censor's office. But there was no answer. The indecency of the name had reduced its owner to a shapeless mass.

JIGGS: "Miss D'Bonair has grown considerably since I saw her last winter." Wiggs: "How so?" Jiggs: "When I saw her then her dress came way up to her neck."

THE Greeks used to consider, as I hav been told,
The bow and the arrow as father and son;
If such be the case, a fact equally cold
Is that a bullet's the son of a gun.

MISS SMYTHE: "I hear that Mr. Flush proposed to you last night." Miss Van Dyke: "Yes, the forward thing!" Miss S.: "I don't see anything very bad about that." Miss V. D.: "Why, this is leap year!"

MR. WALDO (in the supper room): "May I hav the pleasure of a glass of wine with you, Miss Breezy?" Miss Breezy (of Chicago): "Thanks, Mr. Waldo; I believe I will take one more look at the ceiling."

"I WON'T make way for a fool!" cried an envious scribbler, on meeting Saphir in a narrow passage, where at first neither seemed disposed to giv place. "Oh, I will, with pleasure," replied Saphir, stepping aside and bowing courteously.

IN olden times Mars ruled the fights;
And, full arrayed, the doughty knights
Went forth to conquer with the blade,
In tabards gay and arms displayed.

In modern times how changed the plight!
'Tis Cupid rules, and dames that fight.
In scant array, with nature's charms,
They win—in their display of arms!

MISS VAN EMERSON (of Boston): "Madame Junot's 'Memoirs of Bonaparte' are very interesting. Don't you think so, Mr. De Sappy?" De Sappy (seized with a desire to show the extent of his reading): "Ya-as. And w-what a bully chance it was f-for Juno to get a whack in on P-Paris for giving Venus the aw-apple, don-cher-know!"

THERE was once great consternation in the office of Zion's Herald when the writer of an obituary article upon a mother in Israel having said in pious phrase that she died and "claimed the promises," the paper was made to aver that she had died "and cleared the premises." And it was out at Worcester, Mass., where, the Rev. George H. Hepworth having declared in a public address, "I am not a free lance," the sedate Spy gave him fame by printing the sentence, "I want a free lunch."—Boston Transcript.

AN Irish girl, looking at a large picture of the "Cherubs," asked her mistress, "And what is that?" "Those, Mary, are the Cherubs from the foot of the Throne in the Madonna St. Sistine." "There now!" says Mary, "And here was Bridget declairin' they wus hens—but I sez they wus bats."

"HERE, what are you doing?" asked the janitor of the Potter building of a wild-eyed Granger, who was rushing across the roof to the copings on the edge. "By ginger, that's queer!" was the astonished reply. "I stepped inter a little office when I come in, and the hull buildin' begin to sink. Fust thing I knowed, she stopped; and now, when I git out, I find m'self up 'n the air 'bout four mile. Queer place, this York."

THAT APPLE PROBLEM SOLVED.

One truth discovered is immortal and entitles its author to be so.—Hazlitt.

If circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the center [of an apple].—Shakspere.

How many apples did Adam and Eve
Eat in the garden, their dear Lord to grieve?
Not more than one into two equals cut;
Would barely one apple their Eden shut?

Then Eve ate one surely, and Adam two;
This makes them three, "if the 'rithmetic's true;"
Aye, Eve 81, and Adam 1,2,
Which makes ninety-three, whatever you do.

We mean simply that Eve 814 herself,
And old Adam, 2,814 himself;
To please his dear wife, he 814 Eve,
And Eve, 2,814 Adam; perceive?

So count (either way as you may) they've consumed up to date
Of apples three thousand six hundred and twenty-eight;
But, "What do I mean?" you ask in surprise,
As if I had sought my words to disguise.

Why, 'twas "the cool of the Eve" when she took her tea,
And 8140 only; this paradox see?
WhileAdam, tied tight to the apron string "sorter,"
At tea-time, though hungry, but 81,2,40.

Which is simply to say, these apples hav been Multiplied on the scale of "original sin;"
They crunched thus, by figures, which stack up so weighty,
Just eighty-nine thousand three hundred and eighty
"Apples of paradise!" ZOA TOPSIS.

Gems of Thought.

IT is indubitable that persons of piety, who are anxiously desirous of the knowledge of divine truth, are aided by the spirit of God in searching out the meaning of scripture, particularly in such subjects as hav an especial reference to faith and religious practice.—Horne's Introduction to the Scriptures. [Whenever an orthodox expounder of scripture, lay or clerical, clerical or lay, begins a paragraph as Horne begins the extract given above, every judicious and practiced reader looks out for most doubtful assertions, and he often finds silly twaddle, if not downright bouncers. I am not anxious to take up the discussion, and I shall therefore leave it to our dearly beloved cousin, Mr. Chadwick, to answer the venerable English divine, which he does with his accustomed neatness and perspicacity. Messrs. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, and not less Mr. Savage, of Boston, are always straightforward and direct, and while I do not follow them in all things, I admire their candor, the clearness of the exposition of their views, and the fairness with which they deal with other men's views, whether they lean to orthodoxy or to what they sometimes call Liberal Christianity—though the phrase has of late years fallen into disfavor—or whether they are dealing with radical philosophers and popular expounders of Infidelity. No truth seeker, Secularist, or Agnostic should fail to read what they say—but now for the counterblast against the aforesaid flourish.—Hylax.]

CERTAINLY, if the Bible is such a revelation as men claim, it has egregiously failed to answer the purpose for which it was intended, seeing that men equally able, earnest, and sincere differ among themselvs radically and hopelessly.—Chadwick's Higher Reverence.

IN ecclesiastical history we see Christians denouncing and excommunicating one another for supposed error, and every denomination has been pronounced accursed—anathema maranatha—by some portion of the Christian world; so that, were the curses of men to prevail, not one human being would enter heaven.—Dr. Channing.

THERE'S a knowing little proverb,
From the sunny land of Spain,
But in northland as in southland
Is its meaning clear and plain.
Lock it up within your heart,
Neither lose nor lend it—
Two it takes to make a quarrel;
One can always end it.

Try it well in every way,
Still you'll find it true.
In a fight without a foe,
Pray, what could you do?
If this wrath is yours alone,
Soon you will expend it.
Two it takes to make a quarrel;
One can always end it.

Let's suppose that both are wroth,
And the strife begun.
If one voice shall cry for peace,
Soon it will be done.
If but one shall span the breach,
He will quickly mend it.
Two it takes to make a quarrel;
One can always end it.

NOAH, when, after the deluge, the earth was resettled in its former condition, set about its cultivation; and when he had planted it with vines, and when the fruit was ripe, and he had gathered the grapes in their season, and the wine was ready for use, he offered sacrifice and feasted, and being drunk, he fell asleep and lay naked [and having no fear of Comstock before his eyes] in an unseemly manner. When his youngest son saw this, he came laughing and showed him to his brothers, but they covered their father's nakedness. And when Noah was made sensible of what had been done, he prayed for prosperity to his other sons; but for Ham, he did not curse him, by reason of his nearness of blood, but cursed his posterity. And, when the rest of them escaped that curse, God inflicted it on the children of Canaan. But, as to these matters, we shall speak more hereafter.—Josephus's Antiquities of the Jews

COME, let a proper text be read,
An' touch it aff wi' vigor,
How graceless Ham leugh at his dad,
Which made Canaan a nigger:
Or Phineas drove the murdering blade,
Wi' w——e-abhorring rigor;
Or Zipporah, the scaulding jade,
Was like a bluidy tiger.
—Burns's Ordination.

THE divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any state or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for, if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a church-tax upon the whole community.—President Garfield.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 7. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, February 18, 1888. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

THE REVIVAL AND ITS PROTOTYPE.

Notes and Clippings.

A BILL prohibiting the growing of any crop from which intoxicating drink can be made has been introduced into the New Jersey assembly.

A CITIZEN of Muncie, Ind., went to a religious meeting the other evening and read a newspaper most of the time. He was arrested, charged with "disturbing a religious meeting," tried, and acquitted.

THEY are paraphrasing the conversation between the governors of North Carolina and South Carolina in the following way: Said the governor of Dakota to the governor of Minnesota: "It is a short time between blizzards."

CONGRESSMAN WHITING will receive a national blessing if he succeeds in putting through his bill authorizing the issue of fractional currency, for the convenience of persons sending small remittances by mail. Members of both the Senate and the House hav received petitions for such a law, but Mr. Whiting is the first to formulate a bill.—Springfield Union.

THE first crematory in New England is likely to go up at Worcester. Some Boston folks tried to get up a company, but the Hub wasn't ready to burn its dead, and so its leading cremationists hav united with the Worcester association, which is incorporated as the Massachusetts Cremation Society, and they are raising $10,000. Worcester has given $4,000; Boston, $2,000; Springfield, $1,000; and Providence and other New England cities will doubtless add the rest.

THE opponents of a universal language used to say it was impossible. Now that it is not impossible, it is said to be unnatural. Who ever heard of a language being invented? they ask. But all their arguments, says the Galveston News, are set down in a written language every character of which was invented, and the spelling of which is about as clumsily arbitrary as any that could be contrived.

THE despotism of the "trusts" is reaching such an intolerable hight that all classes are now joining in a storm of indignation against it. Within a few weeks the leading sugar refiners of the country hav combined, shut down some works and thrown hundreds of men out of employment in the middle of winter, to make sugar scarce, and raised its price 1½ cents. This increase on the sugar used here annually amounts to $46,000,000, to be transferred to the millionaires' pockets.

AT precisely 10 o'clock on the evening of the 10th the Chinese merchants and shopkeepers closed their shops for the last day of their old year, the 5,777th in their calendar, and began preparing for their annual celebration, which consists in treating their famous Joss to many oriental delicacies that would giv cholera morbus to a Christian. The first sacrificial offerings were clear of all kinds of meats; even the bean extracts were fried in peanut oils. Candied fruits and vegetables in almost endless varieties were heaped upon the altars of Joss long before the celebrants had got their last annual ablutions and donned their New Year's apparel. When "Koto," or prostration, hour arrived the devotees confessed their numerous sins, which were written out in full by one of their most eloquent amateur prayer-writers and sold at the rate of twelve cents a yard. To save time, these were burnt the moment the sinner knelt before his Joss, who received the petition in a volume of smoke mingled with other incense paper. When a crooked fan-tan player burns ten yards of such prayers, he is said to hav his sins washed away for the next year.

A CAPE COLONIST who had been guilty of indiscreet remarks publishes this card in a local South African newspaper: "I, the undersigned, A. C. du Plessis, C. son, retract hereby everything I hav said against the innocent Mr. G. P. Bezuidenhout, calling myself an infamous liar, and striking my mouth with the exclamation: 'You mendacious mouth, why did you lie so?' I declare further that I know nothing against the character of Mr. G. P. Bezuidenhout. I call myself, besides, a genuin liar of the first class."

IT was not until last year that the Moors would permit any examination of the cliff dwellings which hav long been known to exist some days' journey southwest of the city of Morocco. This strange city of the cave-dwellers is almost exactly like some of those in New Mexico and other territories which archeologists hav explored. The dwellings were dug out of the solid rock, and many of them are over two hundred feet above the bottom of the valley. The face of the cliff is in places perpendicular, and it is believed that the troglodytes could hav reached their dwellings only with the aid of rope ladders. Some of the dwellings contain three rooms, the largest of which is about seventeen by seven feet, and the walls of the larger rooms are generally pierced by windows. Nothing is known as to who these cave-dwellers were.

THE Rochester Union and Advertiser is fearful that Anthony Comstock will visit that town, and prints this warning: "Anthony Comstock is a man who overflows with modesty, and is generally standing around in its slop, as the late Sydney Smith once remarked. He put his interfering injunctions on some Philadelphia pictures a short time ago, and the judge told him to keep in his own bailiwick, or words to that effect. Mr. Comstock is a regular traveling menagerie of meddlesomeness, however, and there is no telling how soon he may descend on Rochester. The possibility of such a visitation has probably struck some of our business men. I was in a nursery the other day and noticed that most of the trees had a petticoat of straw tied around their naked limbs, and the flower beds of a seed-house were well covered up from the gaze of the public. A number of laundresses in various parts of the city, however, leave their lines out in the back-yard frequently and without a stitch of clothing on them. He might proceed against these people. Then, there is the statue of the Venus of Milo out on East avenue, who actually hasn't a rag to her back. If Anthony comes this way, he will probably find something like the things we hav mentioned to get some notoriety out of. The idea of a horse chestnut tree being attired like a ballet dancer is bound to shock his finely attuned bump of grand foolishness, and when he comes to expose the naked truth regarding the toilettes worn at our Turkish baths, he will be worked up into a fine state of bodily perspiration and legal sweat."

Communications.

Blue Laws of New England.

When I started to write this article, I intended to giv quite an extensiv account of the trials and punishment of witches; but the record is too sickening and cruel. Many of those old laws and customs excite our mirth, but here the proceedings are so vindictiv, so heartless, that mirth givs way to pity for the unfortunate victims and disgust for the perpetrators of those wicked deeds. So, lest the reader grows as weary in perusing this article as I hav in gathering the evidences, I will giv this cursed blot upon our nation's history but a passing notice. How anyone could hav believed the absurd and monstrous tales that were sworn to in court, which convicted the witches, is more than we can understand, unless we accept Mr. Burnham's explanation of religion—that it is a species of insanity.

Barnes's Popular History says: "The delusion of witchcraft broke out in the family of Mr. Parish, a minister of Salem, where a company of girls had been in the habit of meeting with two West Indian slaves to study the 'black art.' Suddenly they began to be mysteriously contorted, to bark like dogs, purr like cats, and scream at some unseen thing which was sticking pins in their bodies. They accused an old Indian servant of bewitching them.

"On being scourged, she acknowledged the crime. A fast day was proclaimed. Cotton Mather, a distinguished minister of Boston, and a firm believer in the delusion, came to investigate the case. The excitement spread. Impeachments multiplied. A special court was formed to try the accused. The jails rapidly filled. Magistrates were busy. On the most foolish charges—as being seen flying through the air on a broom—respectable people were condemned to death. It was dangerous to express doubt of a prisoner's guilt. Fifty-five persons suffered torture and twenty were executed. All might hav escaped if they had confessed themselvs guilty, but, with noble heroism, they chose death rather than falsehood."

The afflicted persons would be severely scalded, pinched black and blue, haunted by abusiv specters; prodigious demons would ever, now and then, cover the "most corporeal things in the world with a fascinating mist of invisibility." And "there wanted not the oaths of good, credible people to these particulars."

At the trial of George Burroughs, a preacher, the bewitched persons pretended to be dumb. "Who hinders these witnesses," says the deputy-governor, "from testifying?" "I suppose the devil," answered Burroughs. The chief judge retorted: "How comes the devil so loath to hav any testimony borne against you?" And the question was decisiv. Besides, Burroughs had given proofs of great, if not "preternatural, strength." Cotton Mather calls the evidence "enough"—the verdict is guilty.

At the execution of Burroughs, Cotton Mather gave one of the most heartless and fiendish speeches that ever fell from human lips. He exults over the imminent damnation of the convicted wizard.

Another preacher named Noyes, on seeing eight persons hanged up together as witches, had the Christian charity to exclaim: "There hang eight firebrands of hell!"

While this delusion lasted, the clergy were its most earnest supporters.

The English government finally interfered, and the "craze" subsided; and when those very devout old Pilgrims came to their senses, they found that they were punishing innocent persons. Many persons in custody waiting trial were set free; but what could be done for those who had suffered torture or been executed? They first hanged the witches, and then found out they were innocent. Shrewd jurists they! But the magistrates atoned for their deep crimes—by casting all their sins upon Jesus. Judge Sewell was so deeply penitent that he observed a day of fasting each year, and on general fast day, in his place in the Old South church of Boston, in the presence of the congregation, handed to the pulpit a written confession acknowledging his error, and praying

> That the sin of his ignorance, sorely rued,
> Might be washed away in the mingled flood
> Of his human sorrow and Christ's dear blood!

These were good old days which no doubt modern theologians sigh for. They were palmy days for ecclesiastics. "Every rateable person who refuses to pay his proportion to the minister of the town or parish, shall be fined by the court two pounds, and four pounds every quarter, until he or she pay the rate to the minister." To laugh at one of God's chosen servants was an insult to the most high; and to charge the minister with being in error was to "openly contemn God's holy ordinances," and a violation of the laws of the realm, and the offender must pay a penalty of ten shillings. A person could neither vote, hold office, nor claim the protection of the law, unless he were a member of the approved church of New England.

We are principally indebted to the Puritans for our diabolical Sunday laws; and now, after a lapse of two and a half centuries, such has been their influence that Sunday is the most miserable and gloomy day of the week. After the laborer has spent six days in arduous toil, the law yet forbids his taking any healthful recreation on the seventh, and he must either stay close at home, or, what is yet worse, attend church, and listen to stale prayers and dull sermons. Though the law no longer forces people to attend church, yet it has practically that effect, for it closes all places of amusement and instruction on Sunday; and being unable to find entertainment or edification at church, it is no wonder that so many people hav endeavored to find relief from this dreary, gloomy day in the excesses of intoxication.

There are no longer taxes levied for the support of the clergy, yet they still hold a monopoly of Sunday, in that way making a good fat living, by working one day of the week, while the great mass of the people eke out a miserable existence by drudging through the other six. The Sunday laws are an insult to the intelligence of the age—they are the strategic point of our Secular movement. For the sooner the Sunday laws can be repealed and that day a holiday—a day in which one can do as he pleases, and engage in such recreations and pleasures as suit his taste, so long as he does not interfere in the rights of others—the better will it be for the moral and intellectual welfare of our people.

I know of no state in the Union but has enacted Sunday laws; but the older Eastern states are more heavily burdened with these obnoxious laws than the Western states. If we can rely upon a statement made by the New York School Journal about a year ago, the old Puritanical Sunday laws of Massachusetts yet remain unrepealed. And among these laws we find that people were compelled to attend church on Sunday or be fined. The Sabbath-breaker was to be "put to death or grievously punished at the discretion of the court." "The Sabbath shall begin at sunset on Saturday."

"No one shall run on the Sabbath, or walk in his garden, or elsewhere, except reverently to and from church." "No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep house, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath day."

They even struck at the sacredness of the family ties. The only day of the week when people, released from toil, could enjoy the company of their own household; the only day of the week when father, mother, brothers, sisters, could become acquainted; the only day of the week when the laborer could go with his family on pleasure excursions to the hills and groves, and listen to the babbling brooks, the music of the leaves, and the sweet caroling of woodland songsters, was denied them. If the mother on Sunday wished to clasp her offspring to her bosom and caress it, this diabolical statute, like a shaft poisoned with orthodox venom, was shot into her loving heart: "No woman shall kiss her child on the Sabbath or fasting day."

If the husband and wife would embrace each other on Sunday, it was a grievous sin, and this double-edged Christian dagger gleamed between them: "If any man shall kiss his wife, or wife her husband, on the Lord's day, the party in fault shall be punished at the discretion of the court of magistrates." And if we may trust tradition, this law was not a dead letter, for it says that a gentleman of New Haven, having been absent from home several months, returned home on Sunday, and, meeting his wife at his door, kissed her, and for his temerity in violating this sacred law was arraigned before the court of magistrates and fined.

Is it possible that the Puritans knew the meaning of that soul-thrilling word, liberty? If they were the founders of our free institutions, then every liberty-loving person should, at least once in his life, make a pilgrimage to Plymouth and kiss "Forefathers' Rock"—the blarney stone of New England.

It seems almost impossible that such laws could hav been enacted, or that such crimes could hav been committed in the name of justice. But with the Puritans, their faith was a living reality; it was their daily guide, their rule of action. Their burning zeal fired their fanaticism into a deadly activity. The fault, however, was not in the nature of the men, as men, placed under the same circumstances, will think and act alike; the fault lies in that system of religion that urged them on to such acts of extreme violence. It was the cursed doctrin of infallibility that lies at the basis of all religious persecutions. For any to believe that they hav absolute truth, and to sincerely believe that it is necessary for the welfare of mankind here, and the only way in which men can be saved from perdition hereafter is to accept that truth, naturally compels kind-hearted and well-meaning men to be cruel. Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles; neither can such wicked acts spring from true principles. Any system of religion that urges men on to such fiendish acts must be false.

At the present time a wave of Puritanism is sweeping over the country; the orthodox party are making desperate attempts to continue their power by enforcing the Sunday laws, and re-enacting others. There are, in fact, organizations springing up like fungi, all over the nation, whose express purpose is to get their God in the Constitution of the United States; Jesus Christ recognized as the ruler of nations; compel the use of the Bible as a text-book in the public schools, and enforce the "observance of the Lord's day." And this party is gaining political power far more rapidly than is commonly supposed. They hav the advantage of drawing around their standard the illiterate, the fanatical, and selfish politicians seeking power; and, what is yet to their greater advantage, they are forced ahead by the momentum of eighteen hundred years.

The only organization opposing this fanatical "Reform party" is the National Secular Union, composed of many good and heroic souls who are bravely battling for the rights of their fellow-men, regardless of popular applause or their financial interests. They hav not so much to fear from the activ opposition of Christians as from the supine indifference of the Liberals. If our hosts were properly organized, there would be no reason why we should not succeed, for we certainly hav the brightest intellects of the age with us, and, what is yet better, our principles are founded on equality and justice. But as a class, Liberals are content with theoretical advantages, and consequently the orthodox reap all practical benefits.

There are too many professed Liberals who giv no support to Freethought propaganda—they buy no books; read no papers; contribute to no lectures—their whole energy is bent to the acquisition of wealth, disregarding those noble principles which, if carried into effect, would contribute to the welfare and happiness of themselvs and their fellow-men.

There are others who will contribute to the support of the church and a system they know to be false and who in the privacy of their closets will whisper in your ear that they, too, are Freethinkers, but as Christianity is popular it is policy to countenance it—it would ruin their business to oppose it. Such as these are found among our business men, but most particularly among politicians who are seeking notoriety through some petty office. They must pander to popular prejudice; sordidly selfish, they are willing to sacrifice principle for profit, preferring the ephemeral praise of their "constituency" to the lasting plaudits of a grateful posterity. Such men as these, wherever found, are cumberers of the ground; they are stumbling-blocks in the path of progress; they are to be feared, for they are treacherous friends and dangerous foes.

For the sake of popularity they are willing to outwardly conform to the ceremonies of any religion. For the sake of wealth or power they would uphold the cross or kneel before the crescent; they would sacrifice to Brahma, or worship in a temple to the sun.

I do not wish to be understood that I would like to see Liberals raise a clamor on every street corner, or thrust their religious opinions in the face of every passer-by; I would not hav any Liberal make a nuisance of himself. But it is necessary that we be stanch and true to principle; never afraid to stand for the truth.

We should ever be ready and willing to help along a cause we believe is right; ever ready to lend a hand, helping our fellow-man to a higher plane of right living, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and to our posterity. But we must not forget that liberty can only be secured by a struggle, and maintained at the price of eternal vigilance. Let us press this intellectual contest on bravely, firmly, courteously. To falter now would be to giv up the fruits of a long and weary struggle; the scenes of that thousand years of midnight darkness would be acted once again, and the battles for freedom would hav to be fought once more.

The World's Advance.

In one of Colonel Ingersoll's splendid lectures there is one thought which struck me so forcibly as to invite further consideration. It is the idea that, no matter how bitter the enmity to Liberal opinions, just as fast and just as far as this spirit of Liberality has gained ground, the church has been advancing with it. Is not this the case? A glance at the annals of history for the past few hundred years provides convincing proof of the truth of this assertion.

Four hundred years ago the Ptolemaic theories respecting the earth and heavenly bodies were as yet still in their prime. Those who advanced any new astronomical or scientific discoveries were denounced as heretics and blasphemers against God and against religion. The history of Galileo, Copernicus, Bruno, and others who preferred the martyrdom of ostracism and torture, if not of death, to the favor of the church, is too well known to be repeated.

In their day those brave pioneers of thought and scientific inquiry were ridiculed and scorned. But as the years passed by their theories came to gain a hold upon the masses, and finally what had been so universally despised was accepted by the church and reconciled with their religion.

Time went on; men tried by force to make others think as they did. Education was confined almost entirely to the priesthood, and the tyranny of the church and the bondage of the masses seemed complete. Those who dared to defy the religious superstitions of that day were put to death in the most cruel manner.

Others who were quite as religious, but held different views respecting religious matters from those of the majority, were likewise subjected to persecution and to torture.

But a new world had been discovered where tyranny and persecution could not go. It was attempted by our Puritan fathers when they banished Ann Hutchinson, the Quakeress, and Roger Williams; but America was broad enough for all, and Roger Williams in his exile erected the first great monument to freedom and religious liberty. This country became the haven for fugitivs and refugees from other lands, and when the tide of emigration began to flow westward the religious tyrants saw that their day of power was over. The rack, the stocks, and the Inquisition were relics of a barbaric past, and the church lived and prospered under a more liberal dispensation.

But the institutions of learning, the schools, were still on the side of the most orthodox religion. Only about a hundred years ago, in our own country, Harvard would not allow the use of Gibbon's History on account of the skeptical opinions of the author. Harvard College is to-day a respectable and religious institution, but what would Cotton Mather, or even our Revolutionary fathers, hav said if they had witnessed the recent celebration in honor of the great boon of optional chapel, which has been granted to students of that college over twenty-one years of age?

Text-books far more liberal in their tendencies than Gibbon are now in common use in nearly every college in the country, and the church, without making complaint, seems even to encourage them. One hundred years ago the frightful dogma of a burning lake of fire and brimstone and eternal torture for the damned was universally preached. Sinners were continually warned what they would surely come to if they failed to meet the requirements of the church. But there were a few who dared to think and express their honest thoughts. In religious as well as in political matters men began to exclaim, like Patrick Henry, "Giv me liberty or giv me death." It was a land of liberty, and the day of the rack and persecution had long since passed by. Men began to throw off the bonds of creed and the shackles of such a faith as this. They revolted against this frightful nightmare of theology. Now the preacher does not exist who in a civilized community dares to preach or believe in such a hideous theory.

Baxter's "Saint's Rest" is now read only as an ancient curiosity.

Those few who believe in, or profess to believe in, eternal punishment for the wicked acknowledge their inability to describe it or its whereabouts except as a loss of heaven and eternal happiness, and if there is any real, positiv punishment it will be everlasting consciousness of having done wrong. This is a tame theory compared with those which were in vogue a hundred years ago, but it is as much as the ordinary church-goer, or even church-member, will tolerate to-day.

Aside from the Universalist and Unitarian churches, which hav prospered to a certain extent under Miner, Channing, and Savage, a new church known as the Independent Congregational church is the latest acquisition to the liberal ranks. With a creed scarcely less elastic than those just named, this church is rapidly growing in favor and promises to do much in the great work of religious reformation.

But what a change in public sentiment has taken place! The Unitarians were scarcely tolerated fifty or seventy-five years ago. The orthodox church would hav nothing to do with them. Their creed was much stricter then than now, but the prejudice against them has largely died away. They are not now considered as monsters or dangerous to society, and yet their creed, according to Minot J. Savage, renounces belief in the inspiration of any book, belief in hell and eternal torture for anyone, and even denies a faith in prayer as now understood and practiced by the praying world. Indeed, they are fully as liberal as Thomas Paine, whose "Age of Reason" and Infidelity created so much excitement a century ago.

The Bible has been read out of a large number, if not a majority, of our public schools. Sectarian text-books and those which teach our dependence on an infinit creator are carefully eschewed in many parts of our country. Does the church permit this because it approves? No, but because it cannot help it, and they see that silence will be more for their advantage than open opposition.

Many of the leaders in the church are still bigoted and narrow in their views, but the majority see that their star is waning and that in order to keep in sight of the leaders of progress and of thought they must make concessions, and their retreat from fortification to fortification as they are successivly dislodged presents a pitiful contrast with their former arrogance and power. Once they led and dictated to science and the schools. Now science leads, and falteringly but surely do they obey her dictation and follow on behind. They cannot stay for a moment the onrush of progress.

Only a few years ago the cause of the missionaries was presented with fervor and received with enthusiasm. To-day there is growing up a formidable opposition to such enterprises. Men and women within the pales of the church are everywhere denouncing the policy of sending money to India to convert the heathen when there are so many thousands in direful want and actually starving in our own cities.

This sentiment grows stronger every year, and especially since the Andover controversy men are thinking more than ever about it; especially when they realize that the dying heathen learn of the doubtful beauties of religion and the positiv evils of intemperance at precisely the same time. For every missionary that goes to foreign lands, there goes with him a large quantity of American or English rum.

We do not seek to discourage commerce, but on such a hypocritical basis as this the effect cannot be other than demoralizing.

But above all is the increased freedom of speech and right to express one's honest thought.

Agnostics and Infidels were once decried with horror, and pious voices, on every hand, were raised in bitter denunciation and abuse. The Darwinian theory, the investigations of Tyndall and Humboldt, the philosophical speculations and theories of Spencer, hav sown their seed, and we are beginning to reap the fruit. Both in and out of the church their influence is deeply felt.

Formerly, the young man who professed a doubt in regard to the doctrins of his fathers was shunned and ostracized. That day is practically over. The childish fables of the Bible are not attractiv to the youth of this generation, and they are not blamed so much after all for their skepticism and indifference. In fact, the reliability of a great portion of the Old Testament has been held in suspicion for years, and there are many who are now inclined to speak of it as a series of beautiful and mysterious allegories. But, until recently, the New Testament has been accepted practically intact. Even this is crumbling now. Professor Proctor has, this winter, dealt the foolish tale about the Star of Bethlehem a telling blow, and other signs of decay are ominous. How long will this go on? Forever. It is in the minds of some to be more or less superstitious. The immortality of man, around which so many poisonous vines hav twined, will, perhaps, never be disproved. Therefore, some will always liv and die in a faith that is not content with this life alone but reaches out into the realm of the unseen.

The childish superstitions of the Bible, or of any so-called inspired book, may die in time, but the battle will be a long one yet. Men are disposed to be conservativ on all matters pertaining to religion. As civilization advances, the church is bound to occupy higher and more Liberal grounds. This will be the natural result of general culture and of education.

The future seems full of hope and promis now. The air of freedom pervades every body politic and all religious sects. We need not fear that there will be any steps backward. The work has gone too far. The Rubicon is passed. The tendrils of charity and liberty for all men are reaching steadily upward, and our posterity, if not we ourselvs, shall see at last a world where peace and order reign, when bigotry and selfishness shall be unknown, and all that is, or ever will be, shall rest upon the corner-stone of justice.

GEO. A. CHAPIN.

Huntsville, N. J., Jan. 29, 1888.

The Story of a Calamity.

It has been my intention, from the first, to prepare for publication for THE TRUTH SEEKER an account, somewhat in detail, of the great storm that swept over this portion of Dakota on the 12th day of January, 1888. That intention has been strengthened from noticing as well the gross misrepresentations of facts contained in the great Eastern dailies as the meager and disingenuous reports of the Dakota press. I am an old Dakotan; hav witnessed several of these great storms, and since 1872 hav been caught away from home, and nearly always on the bleak prairie, at their commencement, and hav a right to believe that my judgment is cool and level in regard to them. Few old Dakotans lost their lives in the storm of January 12th. The event had those well-defined premonitory symptoms that experience has made familiar to the old resident. For twenty-four hours preceding the storm the wind had been blowing furiously from the southeast. It was of that peculiarly intermittent nature designated as coming in "puffs," and which always points unequivocally to a fierce storm from the opposit direction. An average depth of eighteen inches of snow was lying upon the ground. This had, however, been badly drifted, and had become packed and hardened by partial thaws and subsequent freezes. During the 10th, 11th, and the forenoon of the 12th, fresh snow had fallen to the depth of two inches, and this lay loosely upon the hard foundation of the previously fallen snow. About noon on the 12th, here in Bon Homme county, the wind from the southeast suddenly ceased, and five minutes afterward the storm came down upon us in unspeakable fury from a point between northwest and west. The two inches of loose snow that had recently fallen was instantly lifted from the hard underlying foundation, triturated into almost impalpable powder, and whirled madly in spiral columns through the air, completely blotting out all vision. At a distance of six inches from one's nose there was an impenetrable wall of white. The hand held up directly in front of the face was invisible. The wind that givs rise to this condition has usually a velocity of about thirty miles an hour, and descends, or "dips," at an angle of forty-five degrees. On many pleasant days in this country we hav winds of greater velocity, but without the "dipping" characteristic. The present storm was of duration, compared with some preceding storms since 1870, quite brief. Usually they endure for sixty hours, becoming very cold at the last. The present storm lasted only fourteen hours; but from the first the mercury fell rapidly—from thirty degrees at noon to minus eight degrees at nightfall, and minus twenty-four degrees at midnight, and minus thirty degrees at 7 o'clock on the morning of the 13th. The loss of life, with few exceptions, occurred within the first five hours after the commencement of the storm. There were few frames so hardy as to bear up under the terrors of such a tempest for more than two or three hours. There was, in very truth, the blast of death in it. Despite the extreme frigidity of the atmosphere, the moment the fine snow-dust struck the face it became changed into solid ice that clung tenaciously to the skin. It required constant and systematic effort upon the part of the poor storm-beaten wretch to prevent suffocation from the masses of ice deposited upon his face. I hav seen several cases of men, women, and children where death came from suffocation. Entire herds of cattle, and sheep, and hogs perished in the same way. It was a slow and gradual, or more rapid, shutting out from the lungs of air, and consequent fatal carbonization of the blood, the steps toward the fatal ending seldom, perhaps, noticed in the wild excitement of this fierce conflict with the elements. In such a storm one has no aid from the special senses. With the wind moving thirty miles per hour, it is with difficulty he can determin its direction. Surrounded by a dense wall of whirling, revolving white, he moves through the tempest bewildered and lost in a degree to which no one was ever lost or bewildered in the densest fog or darkest night. Add to this the constant imminency of freezing, or suffocation, or exhaustion, or all three combined, and the reader may form some poor estimate of one of our Dakota blizzards. To be caught out in such a storm is inevitably to become lost; and to become lost, except by merest accident, means death. To lose one's self-possession and self-confidence, is to leave all hope behind. One might as well be three miles distant from any objectiv point as thirty yards from it. I am speaking from personal experience, having been caught in the blizzard of the 8th, 9th, and 10th of January, 1873, as well as in this one. But I am not relating anyone's personal experience here. These storms are clearly of seismic origin. In every case they hav been contemporaneous with earthquake shocks, whose general movements were in the same direction. A "Reverend" Bradley of an adjoining county, in a published sermon says "the blizzard was sent to teach mankind a lesson." So you see we hav lunatics also out West. According to these superstitious fanatics, the best use we poor Dakotans can be put to is to destroy our lives as a valuable lesson to the rest of mankind. The loss of human life in Dakota is not in excess of two hundred. In Bon Homme county, the capital of which is my town, Tyndall, the loss is nineteen, four of whom, however, were not residents. The loss of cattle, and other domestic stock, is equal to one-third of the entire number in the county before the storm. The actual number cannot fall short of two thousand. Is it singular that, while our local papers giv, with close accuracy, the loss of human life, they are careful to reduce the loss of live stock to a percentage of what it really is? Nothing strange about it, when it is borne in mind how cheap is human life, and how valuable is brute life, the last representing dollars and cents. It would hurt Dakota a great deal more to hav a bad reputation as a stock-growing country than to be an unsafe one for human life. Everything is made subservient to the cause of immigration, particularly by those who hav town lots for sale. These are generally pious Christians. So far as I present figures, I hav the proof of their correctness at command.

This is a good country in some respects and a bad one in others. Its merits hav been much exaggerated, and its drawbacks, perhaps, too lightly colored. It is not the climate of the south half of Dakota that offers the most serious objection. The soil is not surely productiv except in favored localities near large water-courses. Agriculture has never been remunerativ generally. Ninety per cent of the farms, and fully the same proportion of live stock and other personality, is heavily encumbered by mortgage, with an accruing interest of from 8 to 40 per cent. Add to this the fact that the rate of taxation, including the school tax, is $3.50 per hundred of valuation, and that valuation closely approaching the market value of the property, and the disadvantages of our situation are clearly seen. The streets of Tyndall yesterday were thronged with people who came to town to pay their taxes—delinquent the first Monday in February next, under heavy penalties—and fully one-half of these taxpayers had to borrow money at from 24 to 40 per cent in order to meet their enforced tribute to the public. The grasshopper invasions from 1869 to 1878 and the drouth periods from 1884 to 1888 are responsible mainly for this condition of affairs. Still, we all believe that Dakota will eventually come out all right.

The climate is not unhealthy, and the country is magnificent in spring and summer, and the autumns are delicious. Yet it is true that a large proportion of our present population intend removing to Washington territory, Oregon, and California next spring; and I think that if they could sell out, three-fourths of our people would soon cease to be residents of Dakota forever. It is not the blizzards; it is not the severity of the winters; it is nothing in the climate that brings about this dissatisfaction. It is the general unproductivness of the soil, except in a few naturally favored localities; it is the enormous rate of taxation—greater than anywhere else in the United States except in Nevada. But there are some of us, myself among the number, who would not leave Dakota even under the most flattering conditions. We are in love with these beautiful prairies, and will remain until frozen to death in the blizzard, or starved to death by the drouth or the tax-gatherer.

O. Richmond, M.D.

A Visionary Foundation.

The idea of a god or gods is the root of every religion. Worship is the first religious act. If we accept the authority of the Bible, we must admit that both Jews and Christians worship their God in consequence of a dream.

The ancestors of Abraham, including his father Terah, served other gods (Josh. xxiv, 2). They dwelt on "the other side of the flood," which appears at that time to hav been the rightful territory of the other gods. When Abraham changed his residence and went to liv in Canaan, he abandoned his father's divinities, and adopted that of his forefather Noah. Years afterward his grandson Jacob, flying from his brother Esau, whom by a mean trick he had defrauded, came to a certain place where he slept in the open air with stones for his pillow. It was not a comfortable resting-place, and, his sleep being somewhat broken, he naturally dreamed. He beheld a "ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven, and behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And behold, the Lord stood above it, and said: I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac" (Gen. xxviii, 12, 13). Then Jacob made a bargain with this God, and promised that on certain conditions he should be retained in the family. "And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in the way that I go, and will giv me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God" (20, 21).

From this we learn that the God worshiped in every Christian church and Jewish synagog was chosen from among many others by Jacob on account of a dream. Besides this, the faith in Jesus as savior and messiah can be traced to a similar foundation. "Now, the birth of Jesus Christ was in this wise: when as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph before they came together she was found with child of the Holy Ghost. Then Joseph, her husband, being a just man and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily. But while he thought on these things, behold the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost. And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sons. Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son" (Matt. i, 18–22). It was by no means strange that Joseph should dream of a matter which greatly occupied his thoughts, or that in the visions of his sleep his own affairs should be connected with a familiar prophecy. Nevertheless, all who place their trust in Jesus as their savior, and who believe in his divine origin and the virginal maternity of Mary, must admit that, according to the gospel narrativ, their faith is founded on a dream.

So Christians worship a God because Jacob dreamed he saw him on top of a ladder, and hav faith in a redeemer because Joseph dreamed that an angel told him a pregnant woman was a virgin.

But this God they adore was, at one time, the God of the children of Israel only. The gentiles had no share in his favors. He commanded his followers to observe many ceremonial laws, and to abstain from various articles of food. Jesus said to the woman of Canaan who besought his help, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv, 24), and, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs" (26). He observed the law of Moses throughout his life, and his disciples continued to observe it for some time after his death. Yet but a very small proportion of Christians to-day are of Hebrew descent, and not one of them professes to be guided by the Mosaic law. To effect this change required, it appears, another dream: "Peter went up upon the housetop to pray about the sixth hour: And he became very hungry and would hav eaten; but while they made ready he fell into a trance, and saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, let down to the earth; wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air, and there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter, kill and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord, for I hav never eaten anything that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed that call not thou common. This was done thrice, and the vessel was received up again into heaven" (Acts x, 9–16). In consequence of this vision, Peter received Cornelius, the centurion, a gentile, into fellowship with the other disciples. The barriers of ceremonial law were broken down; meats, clean and unclean, were alike eaten. Gentiles and Hebrews were admitted to equal religious privileges, and the followers of Jesus ceased to be a Jewish sect. And all this because a hungry man dreamed of food.

The man who would be guided in the affairs of this life by visions which appeared to him in his slumbers, would be esteemed a lunatic. Yet here we hav a religion which claims to hav become known to mankind through dreams, each capable of a perfectly natural explanation. Bible believers, who affirm that "all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrin, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. iii, 16), should realize the visionary character of the foundation on which their faith depends. Dreams belong to a time of darkness, and as the light of truth breaks upon the world, the phantoms of the night of ignorance take flight. A ray of light penetrates the obscurity of a Christian's mind. Will he keep closed the shutters of superstition, and draw around him the curtains of blind credulity, or will he throw open the windows of his understanding and welcome the coming day? There is a passage in his Bible which seems to suit his case, and it says, "Now it is high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand; let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light" (Rom. xiii, 11, 12).

E. J. Bowtell.

Our London Letter.

The week of universal prayer does not appear to hav had a very exhilarating effect upon some of those more activly engaged in it. Mark Guy Pearse, of the Wesleyan connection, took a very gloomy view of the present state of Christendom. He told his hearers that Christianity had become a poor, shriveled, miserable selfishness, and asked, if England was a fair example of Christianity, was it worth while to train men and send them to the ends of the earth to convert other nations? Every man was seeking the salvation of his own little soul and only sighing over the world. Strange that he and men of his class should only now be finding out what Freethinkers hav always known and been persecuted for saying in public. Although he plainly sees that there is no power for good in the religion he professes, he still supports and preaches its doctrins, never taking the trouble to look round for some other system to take the place of such a miserable failure as his precious gospel has been.

With all the misery continually increasing, it is extremely difficult to find a remedy that will meet all cases. Socialism is considered by some a panacea for most human ills, but those who advocate this are not able at present to unite on a fixed plan to enable them to carry their theories into practice. Mrs. Besant is a firm adherent, and has thrown her heart thoroughly into the scheme. With a few more similarly determined leaders, much might be done. Other prominent Freethinkers are strongly opposed, believing that Socialism will by no means meet the exigencies of the case. There is certainly one very strong argument in its favor, and that is, the opposition of the large majority of the clergy. A missionary of the London city mission has given his opinion, based on a visitation at the East End for three weeks. He is righteously indignant at the complaints of the poor, nearly starved folks among whom he went. In his report he states that he was allowed to occupy the Socialist platform, and "in the kindliest, most friendly, and most unprovocativ manner" he more than once "criticised unsparingly their airy, bombastic, unrighteous program, with the result, I am certain, of making the ignorant and the more easily gulled portion of the audiences to see that the whole thing was only a vision, an unrighteous vision, impossible of realization." This last sentence is a very fine piece of unconscious satire, for it is only the ignorant and more easily gulled who will believe the rubbish talked by these servants of the Lord. It is really a wonder that these well-fed and well-dressed impostors can safely go amongst people nearly driven mad by hunger and wretchedness, and be allowed to abuse them for their discontent, and then go away with a whole skin. The patience of the poor is marvelous, but they cannot be induced to believe that trust and faith in a beneficent creator, who does nothing to assist his creatures, is of any good to them, and this fact has been so thoroughly impressed on the clergy that, in despair, they hav pitched their tents in the West End, with the avowed object of evangelizing the wealthy, or in other words, they think where there is most money their chances of grabbing a goodly share are better.

J. D.

London, Jan. 31, 1888.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Canon City, Col., Jan. 22d, 23d.—I hav been delighted more and more each day since reaching "Wonderland." The glorious mountains, with their crowns of snow—to gaze upon them, to realize their stupendous grandeur, raises the spirits and inspires one with noble desires. I am glad, yet not surprised, to find the people of Colorado intelligent, wide awake, warm-hearted, and hospitable. I met a joyous welcome at Canon City, and enjoyed every moment of my sojourn there. Canon City is situated in quite an extensiv opening in the valley, surrounded by majestic mountains, which, like grim sentinels, seem to guard the charming, thrifty, prosperous town. The lectures were delivered at Armory Hall. The first lecture, on Sunday afternoon, was fairly attended and very enthusiastically received. Sunday evening, in spite of crowding in all the chairs possible, only about half the crowd could be accommodated. Monday evening the attendance was overwhelming; standing-room was unattainable a few moments after opening the doors, and the interest and enthusiasm were of the highest. I had a very large sale of Liberal publications.

It is quite a consolation when worn, weary, and heart-sad with homesickness, yearning for sight of dear loved ones so far away, to hav persons come to you and express gratitude for the light imparted by your lectures, and to hear their earnest declarations that they will investigate, and henceforth think for themselvs. Many valuable additions to the Liberal ranks were made by the lectures at Canon City. John Locke is the acknowledged and loved leader in the good work here. Most unfortunately his good wife, and ever faithful co-worker, was suffering from severe sickness, so I had little opportunity to visit with him; but that stanch old veteran Geo. Towers, his good wife and noble young son Frank, forming one of the happiest of Infidel families; Tom Stafford, the energetic, typical Western man, of magnificent physique, with a heart as large and as full of kindly impulse as the mountains of precious ore, and a whole host of jolly good Liberals made my life glad and my work a very labor of love.

I had the pleasure of an interview with the noble old warhorse Father Picard, a pioneer of Liberalism and a contributor to The Truth Seeker, to whose outspoken Infidelity and untiring efforts in disseminating the light of Freethought Canon City is greatly indebted for its noble army of Liberal men and women. I found him very sick, confined to his bed, but his mind clear and vigorous. Despite his sickness, he was preparing an article for The Truth Seeker on "Why I Left the Pulpit," he having been for many years a zealous minister.

On Monday morning friend Stafford hitched up his powerful team and took me up the mountain to the ranch of M. P. Felch, of the United States geological survey. He is a genuin Liberal—how could he be otherwise, living on the mountains, with nature's great book ever open before him? He showed me fossils of reptils that had been exhumed from under one thousand five hundred feet of rock, and in the vicinity of these petrified bones were found turtle and sea shells, proving the monster reptils (extinct thousands and thousands of years ago) must hav roamed on the seashore; and the foundations of the very mountains on which I stood had once formed the bed of the ocean. Thus geology exposes the absurdities of Genesis. Genesis locates fish, birds, and whales on the fifth day, and declares reptils (creeping things) were not created till the sixth day, while nature with the iron pen of truth has engraved upon the everlasting rocks the fact that fish were developed ages and ages before birds and whales.

(Hundreds and thousands of years elapsed before the development of each of these orders of animals.) Fish were among the earliest animal productions, birds only appearing in the Triassic period, and whales in the Cretaceous. Reptils, instead of being created after birds, preceded them, forming the link between fish and birds. These truths are impressed upon the mind with wondrous power, standing on the mountains hundreds and hundreds of feet above the level of the sea with an experienced scientist like M. P. Felch to point out the various parts of the skeletons of petrified anima's imbedded in the rock.

ELIZABETH, COL., Jan. 25th, 26th, 27th.—Thanks to the enterprise and public spirit of such stanch Liberals as Fred Folster, his business partner, the jolly F. J. Huber, and the gentle, genial Henry Greve, Elizabeth has made wonderful progress. They hav a handsome, spacious hall, devoted to lectures, dances, and general public purposes, and a number of comfortable, pretty dwelling-houses. It did seem to me, though, when looking over the village, like a very small place to expect to obtain anything like an audience; yet I had nearly one hundred ladies and gentlemen at the first lecture, and nearly three times as many at the last, the first Liberal lectures ever delivered in this section. After the last lecture, on Friday night, the friends had a grand dance, and festivities were continued till near sunrise. I had heard a great deal about rough Western folks, the wild West, and so forth. The fair ladies were as intelligent, courtly, and dressed as prettily, and many quite up to the style of their more favored sisters of New York, Boston, and Chicago. And as to the cowboys and ranchmen, they are much more lithe and stout of limb, yet quite as gentle and gallant, if not as conceited and affected, as the bon ton of our Eastern cities. Quite a large delegation of friends came from a distance—from Kiowa, a village six miles east, and from Elbert, a village ten miles south. John Pace, the pioneer Liberal, who did valiant service in the Confederate ranks (being a nativ of the Sunny South), came from his ranch ten miles away, and remained at Elizabeth to attend all the lectures. He is the tried and trusted friend of George Aux, of Elbert, a thorough Union man, one of the most successful and enterprising ranchmen of Colorado. Both unite in earnest, self-sacrificing endeavors to advance the cause of Freethought. The leading Liberals present at the lectures were Fred Folster, John Pace, E. P. Clark, Fred Miller, F. J. Huber, Judge Geo. Fahrion (county judge), Henry Greve, Joseph Marden, H. Willard, I. Canada, and Geo. Aux. An able physician, who would open a first-class drug-store, would find this an extraordinarily good place to locate. A speedy competency awaits the right man. Surrounded by very rich farming and well-watered grazing country, rapidly being settled by most intelligent and enterprising people, Elizabeth is insured an immense trade. An enterprising merchant, who would purchase all produce offered (the railroad facilities for shipment to Denver are unsurpassed), and sell at reasonable rates all the groceries, clothing, merchandise, and agricultural implements the farmers and ranchers desire or need, would be sure of an immensely large, profitable, and constantly increasing business. I hav not, in all my travels thus far, found a more desirable location, or one that offers so many inducements and advantages to earnest, thrifty workers to make a home and insure a good living. Elizabeth is a Liberal town, with a brilliant future before it. I sold a large quantity of Liberal publications, and secured several subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

ERIE, COL., Jan. 29th, 30th.—So named, I presume, because in every conceivable particular it is as unlike Erie, N. Y., as possible. Erie is a mining camp, pure and simple. Place and people rough but jolly, enterprising and progressiv. A religious sect, aptly calling themselvs "the Ranters," had possession of the town hall on Sundays, but were induced to giv way. Their services concluded at a quarter before 3 P.M. on Sunday, and enabled friends to fetch in more seats and be ready for lecture at 3. Four team-loads came from Longmont, the present abode of that radical, outspoken veteran of Freethought, Colonel Kelso. I rejoiced to meet this brave old warrior for freedom and Freethought. This was the birthday of Thomas Paine, and the Longmont friends had purposed to hold a celebration, but concluded they could not better advance the cause than by attending the lectures. Sunday afternoon, house fairly filled; great enthusiasm. Sunday evening, house crowded to suffocation; Monday evening, additional seats were crowded in. Half-hour before time announced for lecture every possible available place was utilized; even the little platform was densely crowded. I could not move or make a gesture without danger to some one's nose or toes. The entire town was deeply interested. Griff Lloyd and Evan S. Davis are the main leaders and burden-bearers. H. B. Williams, a veteran Liberal, keeps a miners' home or hotel, and he and his good wife and daughter, Mrs. Anna Montague, know how to keep a hotel and make a pleasant, comfortable home for all who sojourn with them. About a score of stalwart, jolly miners board at Williams's all winter, working in the coal-mines, most of them prospecting or working in gold or silver mines up the mountains during spring and summer.

Erie is a town of Liberals, composed of miners; it is the exception to find a miner who is not intelligent, and consequently Liberal. Familiar with the wondrous formations of strata, fossil, and mineral ores; delving into the very heart of the monster mountains, and wresting from Nature's stronghold her hidden treasures, they every day hav evidence of the gross absurdities of the Mosaic account of creation, and being intelligent men, they logically and correctly conclude, since the Mosaic account of the creation and fall is allegorical, the New Testament account of the redemption is farcical.

I am anxious to secure lecture engagements in New Mexico and Arizona during the last of February and early part of March; then I expect to enter and lecture all through southern California, reaching San Francisco in May; from thence to Sacramento, on to Oregon, Washington, dropping down to Utah about last of July, then up into Montana, thence east to Dakota, Minnesota, etc. Address me care of TRUTH SEEKER.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Blasphemy and Worship.

Extract from Colonel Ingersoll's Argument in the Reynolds Case.

What is blasphemy? I will giv you a definition; I will giv you my thought upon this subject. What is real blasphemy?

To liv on the unpaid labor of other men—that is blasphemy.

To enslave your fellow-man, to put chains upon his body—that is blasphemy.

To enslave the minds of men, to put manacles upon the brain, padlocks upon the lips—that is blasphemy.

To deny what you believe to be true, to admit to be true what you believe to be a lie—that is blasphemy.

To strike the weak and unprotected, in order that you may gain the applause of the ignorant and superstitious mob—that is blasphemy.

To persecute the intelligent few, at the command of the ignorant many—that is blasphemy.

To forge chains, to build dungeons, for your honest fellow-men—that is blasphemy.

To pollute the souls of children with the dogma of eternal pain—that is blasphemy.

To violate your conscience—that is blasphemy.

The jury that givs an unjust verdict, and the judge who pronounces an unjust sentence, are blasphemers.

The man who bows to public opinion against his better judgment and against his honest conviction, is a blasphemer.

Why should we fear our fellow-men? Why should not each human being hav the right, so far as thought and its expression are concerned, of all the world? What harm can come from an honest interchange of thought?

I hav given you my definition of blasphemy, and now the question arises, What is worship? Who is a worshiper? What is prayer? What is real religion? Let me answer these questions.

Good, honest, faithful work is worship. The man who plows the fields and fells the forests; the man who works in mines, the man who battles with the winds and waves out on the wide sea, controling the commerce of the world—these men are worshipers. The man who goes into the forest, leading his wife by the hand, who builds him a cabin, who makes a home in the wilderness, who helps to people and civilize and cultivate a continent, is a worshiper.

Labor is the only prayer that nature answers; it is the only prayer that deserves an answer—good, honest, noble work.

A woman whose husband has gone down to the gutter, gone down to degradation and filth; the woman who follows him and lifts him out of the mire and presses him to her noble heart, until he becomes a man once more—this woman is a worshiper. Her act is worship.

The poor man and the poor woman who work night and day, in order that they may giv education to their children, so that they may hav a better life than their father and mother had; the parents who deny themselvs the comforts of life, that they may lay up something to help their children to a higher place—they are worshipers; and the children who, after they reap the benefit of this worship, become ashamed of their parents, are blasphemers.

The man who sits by the bed of his invalid wife—a wife prematurely old and gray—the husband who sits by her bed and holds her thin, wan hand in his as lovingly, and kisses it as rapturously, as passionately, as when it was dimpled—that is worship; that man is a worshiper; that is real religion.

Whoever increases the sum of human joy is a worshiper.

He who adds to the sum of human misery is a blasphemer.

Gentlemen, you can never make me believe—no statute can ever convince me—that there is any infinit being in this universe who hates an honest man. It is impossible to satisfy me that there is any God, or can be any God, who holds in abhorrence a soul that has the courage to express its thought. Neither can the whole world convince me that any man should be punished, either in this world or the next, for being candid with his fellow-men. If you send men to the penitentiary for speaking their thoughts, for endeavoring to enlighten their fellows, then the penitentiary will become a place of honor, and the victim will step from it—not stained, not disgraced, but clad in robes of glory.

Let us take one more step.

What is holy? What is sacred? I reply that human happiness is holy, human rights are holy. The body and soul of man—these are sacred. The liberty of man is of far more importance than any book—the rights of man more sacred than any religion, than any scriptures, whether inspired or not.

What we want is the truth, and does anyone suppose that all of the truth is confined in one book—that the mysteries of the whole world are explained by one volume?

All that is—all that conveys information to man—all that has been produced by the past—all that now exists—should be considered by an intelligent man. All the known truths of this world—all the philosophy, all the poems, all the pictures, all the statues, all the entrancing music—the prattle of babes, the lullaby of mothers, the words of honest men, the trumpet calls to duty—all these make up the bible of the world—everything that is noble and true and free you will find in this great book.

If we wish to be true to ourselvs—if we wish to benefit our fellow-men—if we wish to liv honorable lives—we will giv to every other human being every right that we claim for ourselvs.

Every Christian and Infidel Should Hav It.

From the Ottumwa, Iowa, Industrial Appeal.

We last week received a package of pamphlets from the TRUTH SEEKER office, among which was the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC. This ALMANAC is something unique and original—it is good for saint or sinner. The pictures or cartoons that adorn its pages illustrate prominent occurrences in the Bible. Christians should hav this ALMANAC by all means, as it will lead them to search the scriptures for the purpose of comparing the text with the illustrations, and Liberals and Agnostics should hav it for the edification and amusement it contains. Children, big and little, cry for this book.

AN ARTISTIC CURIO.

From the San Francisco Jewish Times.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1888, from the press of the New York Truth Seeker Company, is one of the neatest works of the kind we hav seen. It has a characteristic calendar of its own, and its contents are full of interest to those for whom the work is intended. In addition there are twenty-four portraits of eminent American Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers, and numerous other engravings to divert the minds of the ungodly. The price of the ALMANAC is twenty-five cents, and as a literary and artistic curio combined it is certainly worth it.

MR. HESTON'S IRREPRESSIBLE PICTURES.

From J. D. Shaw's Independent Pulpit.

The ANNUAL (which fully sustains the reputation achieved by its predecessors) contains several excellent articles by noted writers, also twenty-four portraits of distinguished American Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers. Those irrepressible Bible pictures by Heston, which appear in its pages, we do not think add to its dignity, although they afford a great deal of amusement to many. Price twenty-five cents.

Bible History and Evolution.

In the introductory chapter to his searching examination of the Pentateuch Bishop Colenso writes these very significant words: "The result of my inquiry is this, that I hav arrived at the conviction—as painful to myself at first as it may be to my reader, though painful now no longer under the clear, shining light of truth—that the Pentateuch, as a whole, cannot possibly hav been written by Moses or by anyone acquainted personally with the facts which it professes to describe, and further that the (so-called) Mosaic narrativ, by whomsoever written, and though imparting to us, as I fully believe it does, revelations of the divine will and character, cannot be regarded as historically true." In our previous articles we hav shown that, whatever "revelations" the Bible imparts, it cannot be regarded as scientifically true.

Is it historically true? Colenso says not. A more competent authority could not be named. If the Bible history had been at all reliable or even plausible, who more ready to accept it than the late bishop of Natal? Surely none. Yet to this brave divine truth was of more importance than fiction, even though it bore the stamp of alleged divine authority.

History, forsooth! Who that has cast away the spectacles of faith, and opened wide the eyes of reason, can consider for a single moment that the Bible is historically true? History means—if it means anything at all—a faithful narrativ of events that hav happened, stated exactly in the order in which they hav occurred, without any fictitious adornments to make them pleasant, interesting, or palatable reading.

No doubt the writers of Genesis believed that God made man in his own image a few thousand years ago, but their belief did not make it a fact. And if God did not create man, as man, but imparted the potency and power of all forms of life to masses of protoplasm, then, in this respect, Genesis is wrong and unhistoric. On the other hand, if God made man perfect, it is folly to talk of a perfect man doing something that showed him to be imperfect.

Nor can it be regarded as historically true that Adam lived for nine hundred and thirty years, or Methuselah for nine hundred and sixty-nine years, without the supposition that years did not mean, in those days, so long a period of time as they do now, or that human beings had a materially different kind of organization from ours—suppositions for which there is not the slightest warranty in fact.

Then, how could we regard it as historically true that Cain went into the land of Nod and married a woman who was not his mother, when there was no other woman in existence? The story of the flood, whether regarded as universal or local, is too ludicrously absurd to be seriously discussed, since there is not enough water in all the oceans, seas, rivers, and lakes in the world to cover the whole face of the earth, much less the mountain of Ararat.

Nor need the story of "the tower of Babel," with an omniscient God coming down to see if information, seemingly made known to him surreptitiously, was true, and who, finding it reliable, was so wroth that he confused the tongues of the people in order to prevent them from doing what he must hav known was an impossibility, that is, building a tower that should reach to heaven—wherever that may be—be gravely considered, for it bears, on the face of it, all the characteristics of a silly legend which was, probably, believed by an ignorant and barbarous people.

The lives of the saints—such as Messrs. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob—are purely mythical, founded, for the most part, upon astrological phenomena.

The story of Abraham preparing to plunge a dagger into the heart of his only son, to demonstrate his faith in Jahveh; and the fascinating narrativ of Joseph's treatment by his brethren, and his subsequent triumph over them in Egypt, may be regarded in the light of primitiv dramas; they are certainly not historical truths.

When we come to Exodus we are confounded with even more extraordinary narrativs than those in Genesis. The poor Egyptians, who, in their history, suffered the most appalling injustice from various nations, happily for them, never suffered the infliction of the horrible plagues said to hav been wrought by Moses at the express desire of Jehovah.

It may be safely affirmed that the heart of Pharaoh—stony as it may hav been—was never hard enough to suffer all the land of Egypt to be covered with lice, and then, in order that his magicians might show their power, call upon them to produce more.

It would be equally safe to assert that the plagues of Egypt did not kill the same cattle many times over, or that, when the sheep had been slain several times, the blood of young lambs, the children of the defunct sheep, was sprinkled on the door-posts, so that the angel of the Lord might know the houses to pass over in his work of destruction.

These things are not historically true. It would be difficult indeed to say what in Exodus is historically true.

It is quite within the range of probability that a few priests might by constant practice hav been able to devour a large number of pigeons; but when in addition to the pigeons they were required to eat an ox or two apiece, we may respectfully object that, however capacious the stomachs of priests were in those days, our capacity for belief is not quite so large.

To record all the unhistoric statements in the Old Testament would require a volume almost as large as the holy book itself. I must be satisfied, therefore, to name a few events which, I think, may fairly come under the above category,

Let me state here frankly that I do not think it is historically true that Jehovah had a wrangle with Moses, and in a paroxysm of passion begged of the holy man to "let me alone that my wrath may wax hot against them" [the Israelites] (Ex. xxxii, 10), nor that Moses spoke to God "face to face as a man speaketh to his friend" (Ex. xxxiii, 11), or even that he was privileged to hav a back view of deity (Ex. xxiv, 9, 10). Leviticus I pass over; its injunctions are simply atrocious, whether historical or otherwise.

In Numbers we come across the story of Balaam and the intelligent quadruped that saw an angel. It has been said that asses are the only creatures that ever hav seen an angel—but no matter.

Balaam's ass not only saw an angel but admonished a prophet.

If the holy scribe who contributed this story to the book of Numbers had but enlightened us on one or two points, we might hav been stupid enough to hav believed it also.

For example, he might hav told us in what language the ass spoke; in what dialect, at what school he acquired it, and what theological ass taught him.

In the absence of such details I feel bound to pronounce this story as unhistoric, though I dare declare that I hav myself heard many a theological ass speak.

The thirty-first chapter I sincerely hope does not record historical facts; the "revelations of divine will and character" which it makes manifest are anything but pleasing. Of Joshua I need only say that, when he called upon the sun to stand still, he did what any other fool might hav done with as good a result.

It is not historically true that Samson slew a thousand people with the jawbone of an ass. The revised version concedes that this is poetry. It was, therefore, a poetical jawbone that overcame the multitude.

It is not even true that Samson at his death pulled down the house upon the heads of the Philistines, except in a poetical sense. Samson "brought down the house" in the same way as the actor or vocalist—with laughter or applause. Nothing more.

As to how much, or how little, of such books as Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles is literally true, it is impossible to tell, but it will be obvious after a careful perusal of them that they are largely diluted with the fabulous. Such dramatic and poetical writings as Job, Isaiah, and Proverbs will be dealt with hereafter; though there is little to be said in reference to their historical value. But in the light of evolution the whole of these books or pamphlets, and others which are comprised within the covers of the Bible, like the sacred books of all other nations, hav great value to the seeker after truth.

The book of Genesis is a pueril production if compared with the scientific and historical works of today. Exodus is full of fictions and follies if regarded as divinely inspired. Joshua and Judges are ludicrous and barbarous if taken as revelations from God. But if these productions are regarded, as they should be by all sensible men, as the earnest guesses after truth by our early ancestors, they contain for us much that is valuable, much that is bright and even beautiful. They contain, indeed, the stepping-stones to knowledge upon which philosophers and scientists in subsequent ages planted their feet, and which helped to those notable successes which hav done so much to brighten the lives and enrich the minds of mankind in their struggling pilgrimage through the world.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

"The Distribution of Wealth."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Denslow, in continuing the subject of the "Distribution of Wealth" in your issue of January 28th, covers almost a page with reasoning and sophism to prove that the "concentration of wealth into the hands of the few is the best and cheapest," and as such, has aided to the higher civilization. Is it true? Most assuredly not. He who reads history aright will only hav to take a glance back in the dim distance to ancient India and he will see her grandest achievements, her better civilization, was at the time when her wealth was more equally divided; that her downfall began coequal with the concentration of the wealth into the hands of the few. Class and caste kept unequal pace, and Imperial India fell.

Egypt once had a name grand and glorious as any written in the bright ages of the past. Egypt's greatness became on the wane. Why? Her wealth was in the hands of the few. One per cent owned nearly all; ninety-nine were serfs and slaves. Egypt died, and her death-dirge rings in the ear of the world: "Concentration of wealth did it."

"Then came golden Babylon, an 'empire of glory,' and the grandest city the sun ever shone upon; matchless in beauty and wondrous in extent; sixty miles around; battlements three hundred feet high; fifteen hundred streets crossing at right angles; laughing fountains amid enchanting vistas. There towered up to the blue above minaret, shaft, and obelisk, and there looked down, like sylphs of the empyrean, upon the Gherric lake and Aranan walls. Thus Babylon stood transcendent in ravishments—the city of the globe."

Her glory was the price of blood. Concentration of wealth did it. Four per cent of her people owned all, and ninety-six per cent were tenants, paupers, and slaves.

Medo-Persia, next to follow in the grand train, outstripped in ravishing beauty those that had gone before. Plato says: "Luxury to madness, on one side, and wretched poverty and abject servitude, on the other." The "concentration of wealth," Mr. Denslow, that you so treacherously advocate, was the cause that placed in the hands of less than one per cent all; more than ninety-nine per cent were driven to vagabondism, serfdom, and slavery. A beautiful system you are teaching.

Greece is another example. It first became great among the nations of earth by putting in practice the principles that all men are created equal and with rights that should not be infringed. "The love of labor removed the vices and the passions which generally occasion the ruin of states. They led a laborious life, intent upon the cultivation of their land and the arts, and not excluding the husbandman nor the artificer from the first dignities of the state, preserving between all the citizens and members of the state a great equality, void of pomp, luxury, and ostentation. He who had commanded the army for one year fought for the next in the ranks as a private soldier," proving conclusivly the fact that men are equal in emergencies under similar circumstances and conditions, and while thus preserving their equality grand old Greece prospered; but, sad to tell, a Denslow appeared, and by "bribes conveyed into the hands of foreigners the substance of Greece, and her liberty was lost." America's grandeur is beginning to die as did that of noble old Greece, and by the same traitorous hands. Monopoly did it to Greece. "The bread-winners sank beneath a burden of woe, down, down, down, till tears baptized the land, and the cry of the poor filled the air." Concentration of wealth was the death-warrant, for four per cent owned all the land, and ninety-six per cent of the people owned none—"were tenants, serfs, and slaves."

Rome's richest achievement was when eighty-five per cent of her people had title in land; then indeed did she prosper; then no earthly powers did she fear; her foundation was solid rock. But here a treacherous Denslow appeared, to deceive the people; make them believe that it would be better to let their wealth go into the hands of the few; that the equality that had built up a powerful nation was a fraud, a lie; that there was no equality; that they must hav captains, lieutenants, and so on up to chieftain, to manage their affairs, when anyone out of his forty thousand was as capable to fill an office as the one they put there. And thus through villainy were the eighty-five per cent robbed of their possessions through the concentration of wealth into the hands of the few. The masses were driven into pauperism and slavery, and mighty Rome, who failed to profit by the lessons of the past, went down to an ignominious death. A few Denslows, greedy for self, and who think they hav no equality with other men, are steering the grand old ship United States on an air line direct for the same reefs that all the others went to pieces on, and unless they change their course soon, the brightest star of all will sink to rise no more. Talk about equality! Why, Mr. Denslow, I can go into a million hovels blindfold and put my hand on the head of your equal, and millions more that will not manifest the sordid selfishness that you hav in the production you hav offered as a panacea to suffering humanity.

It is said, however, that history repeats itself, and we are destined to go as all others hav gone before. The masses are too confiding, i. e., they do not suspect the dishonesty of the few who are concentrating the wealth till too late, and thus when the reaction comes it brings ruin, and the nation is lost.

Helena, Neb. W. P. BROOKS, M.D.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I submit the following, versus Mr. Denslow's "Distribution of Wealth" in your issue of January 28, 1888. Mr. Denslow supposes a case in which a man givs up the attractions of city life, goes up to the north woods, buys a farm of two hundred acres for $50, and twenty years after the change of values raises that of his farm to $20,000. He supposes, also, another man, who prefers to take the higher wages he can get in town to the poorer fare of the woods. Mr. Denslow inquires: "Can he, after living on such higher wages and better fare for twenty years, then turn round and seize also the land which he refused as a gift twenty years before? Having eaten all his own cake, what entitles him to half of another's?"

Now, we think Mr. Denslow's summing up of this case incomplete. Let us suppose both men die and leave each a son. Helpless Labor, the son of him who ate his cake, goes to Value Sense, the son of him who ate not, and says: "Sir, I hav no means of support. Can you not giv me work and wages, that my distress be relieved?" Value Sense replies: "My friend, I cannot do it. My overseer has all the labor he needs. In fact, as I hav recently converted one-half my agricultural lands into a deer park, I shall be obliged to discharge one-half of them."

"But," says Helpless Labor, "will you not allow me to cultivate even an acre of your deer park, that I may remain in my nativ country, and not be obliged to ask for or accept charity?" "No," replies Value Sense. "I will not do it. I acknowledge that I enjoy a large rent roll, and that I could furnish you with land whereby you might employ yourself without reducing my income one penny. But, sir, charities generally breed the evils they are aimed to cure. You are afflicted with enforced idleness, and land would only aggravate your condition. It is your want, sir, that makes my land valuable. It is not to my interest to supply your want. Besides, it is against the principles of our Noble Order of Concentrated Capitalists for the Suppression of Altruism. Therefore, my good man, move on, or I will invoke the aid of the tramp act."

Now, let us balance the accounts, and see which of the first two men is the debtor to society. The mechanic probably livs on as poor fare and low wages while learning his trade, as does the farmer while subduing his land; thus far they are even. At the end of twenty years the mechanic has drawn $20,000 and the farmer can get $20,000 for his land. Even again, do you say? Let us see. Twenty years of farming and washing by freshets has reduced the productiv power of the land thirty-three and a third per cent; five hundred thousand feet of lumber destroyed in clearing the land. The land is worth for agriculture $10,000 less than if it had never been touched. In addition to this is the $10,000 worth of lumber that would hav remained but for his occupation of the land for agricultural purposes. Society has paid him the market price for his labor in the shape of produce for twenty years. In addition to this, Mr. Denslow would reward him for his destruction of natural agents, and for his ability to "steer" other men off his land. To be brief, Mr. Denslow wishes to pay men for their ability to create want. He says: "Organize your state Socialistically and nationalize your land, and you would then stand exactly where you now do." In the next column he assures us that such nationalization would "strike the earth like a universal epidemic of insanity." In this instance unlike causes produce like effects, with slight variations. Does he really believe the peasantry of Ireland would flee to South America if the landlord industry were abolished? He refers us to the lash of the Messrs. Pharaoh for an explanation of the state's kindness as an employer. We would suggest the United States postal service as being equally illustrativ of the same. Would individual interest conduct a more perfect or economical system? Would private capitalists hav gone to "rack and ruin" in an endeavor to establish an agricultural department? Would private capitalists, actuated by selfish individual interest, hav built up our public school system? Does not Mr. Denslow tremble at the corruptions of the system, and the power of the demagogs who can compel the thrifty and provident to furnish to the offspring of shiftlessness the tree of knowledge? Does this gigantic governmental charity breed the evils it is aimed to destroy? Has this "short step" toward Socialism desolated our land?

After conveying the impression that the Socialist is a bloodthirsty wretch, he grows pathetic over the dear capitalist, who, after satisfying himself that the collateral is good, is then filled with a patriotic desire to double his money by putting down the Rebellion.

One man, subordinating self-love to the love of others, believing that the greatest good to the greatest number is a principle dear to the hearts of all true men, believing that human slavery cannot exist in a land of the free, voluntarily submits to military despotism, for what? That his commander may be emancipated? Or is it that the mutual rights of men shall be equal?

Another, whose father did not possess the value sense very large, is born into the world a "helpless laborer." He involuntarily submits to hav his "will power reduced to zero," subordinates his rectitude and conscience, and why? Simply that his employer be relieved of the necessity of labor, and his own helplessness made more sure. Mr. Denslow can see no reason for any difference in the mental state of those two men to affect in the methods by which their superiors maintain command; none in the motivs actuating them, or in the ultimate objects both are seeking to attain.

He further says: "Corporations are seldom human; hence, the most beneficial labor. Involuntary good arises out of industrial pursuits conducted from a selfish motiv." For instance, when the mine-owners get together and decide to put their men on half-time, the men are "involuntarily benefited" by being relieved of half their labor, half their wages, and none of their wants; the railroads are benefited by being relieved of half their business and profits in moving coal; and the consumer is relieved of a fire half the time, his fire for the other half costing him as much as it would for all the time if the men in the mines were running full time. The great "steerers," in this case, are a millstone around the neck of industry. (We suppose it is a case in which "great values cost.")

The citizens of Nebraska hav decided that without the people the railroads would be valueless; without the railroads the people's produce would be valueless; that it is "intrinsically unhealthy" for the railroads to reduce the said citizens' will power to zero; that the "involuntary good" resulting from such reduction is not as acceptable as the cash; and, finally, that the success of the railroads is of no more importance than the success of an equal amount of capital and labor engaged in other industries. We hav, therefore, established a commission, the "actual constitution" of whose nature has, up to date, remained exactly "aplomb" to the true interests of society. If their natures get out of plumb, they can easily be replaced by men whose natures are "aplomb."

Our commission was established by a "selfish" majority, and its whole business is to work for the selfish interests of its constituency. Hav we not pitched it on the right key, Brother Denslow?

Human nature was once "obstinately and indestructibly firm" to the creeds of the Catholic church; the "actual constitution of human nature" was once aplomb to the practice of human slavery; "individual selfish interest," or "business motivs," fed an army of patriots on "decayed cow and bean coffee." Four years of bloody war and two hundred thousand of the flower of American youth sacrificed, and Mr. Denslow givs all the glory to the man who furnished the money—on good collateral—for the sake of "profits."

He alludes to a gratitude which lived sixty years, and then asserts that the gratitude of the helpless laborer to the state for acts of "priceless beneficence" will not survive from one election to another. Mr. Denslow's deductions are:

1. Human wants must be gratified.
2. In order to gratify human wants, humans must want.

The worst predicament he can conceive of is that of the millionaire who could oblige no one to cook him a breakfast.

Hoping Mr. Denslow may succeed in smoothing the millionaire's path (by compelling some helpless laborer to walk in it and carry him), I will close.

L. BRADEN.

Our Surplus.

Wealth comes to a nation just as it comes to an individual, namely, through the profitable exchange of the annual surplus produced.

If one man gets a surplus of anything and cannot sell or trade it for other things he wants, he is no richer. If a farmer cannot dispose of his surplus grain, it were better for him that it had not been produced. So with everybody, no matter what may be his calling. Now, the state is only a collection of many individuals.

The United States for some twenty-five years hav not been getting rid of their surplus to other nations to any great extent. Our increase of wealth has come almost entirely through immigration to this country and the wealth developed by that increased population. The surplus made has been principally consumed at home. It can be shown that but for the wealth brought here by immigrants and developed by the spread of new populations over new lands we had stood still.

Yet other nations, like England for instance, while sending to us millions of their wealth-producing population, hav been growing rich all the time, notwithstanding such depletion. It is true that some individuals here hav accumulated great fortunes, but their wealth has come to them by being appropriated. Labor has made their wealth, and grown poorer while so doing. Hence the strikes, riots, and general discouragement among the workmen of towns and the farmers. A small community cannot grow richer by trading their annual surplus with each other. Say a community is composed of farmers, manufacturers, and mechanics, and each one every year produces a thousand dollars' worth of surplus in his line. As soon as all shall hav as good houses and other improvements as they want, by exchanging with each other, what shall each do with his surplus which no one else wants? Unless there comes a demand from outside of that community, they are at a standstill. They must open up trade with other communities.

Every restriction upon trade is but a hindrance to the disposal of the surplus, and the surplus that can not be disposed of for something we want is worse than nothing. We can only burn it as fuel, as our farmers did their corn.

As nations make their own money, they do not sell and buy like individuals. And, even were they to do so, it never pays to run vessels or vehicles loaded one way and empty another in competition with a trade that permits full cargoes both ways. Our American trade has suffered wonderfully on this account. We hav put heavy restrictions on thousands of articles in order to build up a dozen or so great industries like steel rails and sugar. Some great nativ American industries that ought to hav expanded enormously hav been blighted and limited mostly to the home demand. Several productions and manufactures that began about 1850 and grew so amazingly hav stood still or withered away. Several, like the export of fresh beef, that started up years ago with great promis, hav soon dwindled because the ships had to come back empty.

The exercise of common sense on the subject will convince anyone capable of reasoning that for a new people like our own to restrict imports by law is preposterous. No imports, no exports. The probability is that but for our debt we could not export anything. And yet we ought to export four times more cotton, ten times more tobacco, and immensely more grain and beef than we do. Look at the census of 1860 and see. We hav now three times more people than we had in the middle of that decade. Yet the reader will be astounded to see that we do not produce for export in the same proportion.

Why? Simply because we are restricted in the disposition of our surplus. HOLT.

Faith, Frescoes, and Furnaces.

My brother writes me from Vermont that "they hav overhauled the old church, frescoed it, and put in a furnace, thus making it very popular." "But," he says, "they dare not let any religion get in, for fear of losing the popularity; so, you see, times change."

Well, I am reconciled to hav it thus. Popularity is preferable to religion any time. Popularity is peppermint essence, but religion is blue-mass. When religion itself was popular, humanity had to stay out—not out in the cold, exactly, but out of reach of both justice and mercy, and trembling beneath the thundered threatenings of eternal torment. So the new fashion in churches, of frescoes and furnaces, is a happy improvement on the orthodox pattern shown in the Westminster catechism—holy faith and hell-fire; and besides, the modern music serves to awaken attention to an occasionally sensible remark from such preachers as, though they know little enough, may know better than to decry all science as foolishness, whilst our sires endured the pulpit-pounders of the past through ability to go to sleep amid the description of universal cataclysm.

Perhaps some Post Mills people will say I hav forgotten my early training. I hav forgotten many things not worth remembering, but memory will hav to be a total wreck before I shall forget the outrageous threat, from one whose religion outranked the firmest natural ties, that the devil would pick my bones as I would pick a chicken, and that as fast as he picked the flesh off me God would make more meat grow on, and when all the fuel to roast me should be consumed God would create more pitch and brimstone—all for saying God ought to obey his own laws.

I am rejoiced to see such piety played out as that which "peopled earth with demons, hell with men, and heaven with slaves." When religion ruled Europe, the springs of learning dried up and the fires of persecution flowed. When religion bossed America, gallows-building was a regular trade, and machine-shops were not. When God was supposed to rave around like a lunatic monarch, the priests were in their glory, and the world in an uproar. Now that God has been relegated to some far corner of the universe, there is a chance for peace on earth, and the priests hav to be content with what they can get.

The gospel once cast its glamor over hall and hut, and the requisits to earthly comfort were neglected for the sake of salvation from the wrath of the maker of poor wretches hereafter. Now we hear nothing of gospel ginger except in the sickly songs of Sankey and the mawkish twaddle of such men as Moody; and the Salvation Army is simply a circus where all the performers are clowns. If the church will taboo religion, it has my leave to substitute anything but liquor.

Yes, the church has become popular, but by dropping its holy hideousness and putting on some of the second-hand garments of civil society. When it shall hav done with its mimicry of old superstition and become entirely a place of quiet amusement and logical instruction in good behavior, its popularity will be of a sort not to be despised.

Good News.

We hav received from C. P. Farrell the following card:

"February 10, 1888.

"The Ingersoll-Field discussion is now in the binder's hands, and will be out very soon. Price in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, $1."

Orders therefor may be sent in at once, to be filled as soon as the book is received, probably by the time this reaches our readers.

Girard College.

It has been well known to the Liberals of the country for many years that the magnificent bequest to humanity made by Stephen Girard has been captured by the church, and the funds left in trust for the secular benefit of the orphans perverted to religious uses. The matter has now been reviewed and plainly put by Judge Westbrook, of Philadelphia, in a volume entitled, "Girard's Will and Girard College Theology," in which he intimates, also, that the courts may soon be asked to interfere.

Mr. Girard left to the orphans' home and school $2,000,000, forty-five acres of land where the college now stands, and the residue of a portion of his estate, which has proved immensely valuable. The report for 1886 puts the Girard college estate at $10,684,580.22, and the superintendent assured Judge Westbrook that it was worth fully $20,000,000. The college grounds and buildings are said to be worth $10,000,000. Besides the main college hall, there are now nearly a score of auxiliary buildings and a costly church edifice on the grounds. The present annual income of the college is over $500,000.

In making his will devising this charity to Philadelphia Girard said:

"I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in the said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of the said college. In making this restriction, I do not mean to cast any reflection upon any sect or person whatsoever; but, as there is such a multitude of sects, and such a diversity of opinion amongst them, I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans, who are to derive advantage from this bequest, free from the excitement which clashing doctrins and sectarian controversy are so apt to produce; my desire is, that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into activ life they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer."

On account of this provision, attempts were made to break the will, on the ground that the foundation of the college upon the principles and exclusions prescribed by the testator is derogatory and hostil to the Christian religion, and so is void, as being against the common law and public policy of Pennsylvania; and this for two reasons: first, because of the exclusion of all ecclesiastics, missionaries, and ministers of any sect from holding or exercising any station or duty in the college, or even visiting the same; and secondly, because it limits the instruction to be given to the scholars to pure morality and general benevolence, and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, thereby excluding by implication all instruction in the Christian religion.

The final argument was heard at the January, 1844, term of the United States Supreme Court, a Mr. Jones and Daniel Webster appearing for the plaintiffs, and Horace Binney and John Sergeant for the city and executors. The will was sustained.

The next question for Girard's executors is, What did he mean by these provisions? That he had the right to make them is forever settled, and it only remains to put in force his will or intention. The evidence is conclusiv that Girard was a Freethinker, believing only in practical religion. The books in his library, the names of his ships, his heroic efforts to relieve sickness and distress, all testify this fact. In the life of Girard, written immediately after Girard's death, Stephen Simpson says: "The names of those vessels bespeak with sufficient accuracy the bent of his mind and the nation of his birth. The Montesquieu, Helvetius, Voltaire, Rousseau, show the combination of philosopher and merchant, and indicate the high respect and reverence which he cherished for those illustrious names, their imperishable works, and their beautiful but dangerous doctrins. . . . That Girard had no religion, and looked upon its professors with no friendly eye, I well know." And in his will he makes his desire clear that no religion should be taught in the college. He says: "My desire is that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into activ life they may from inclination and habit evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer." This is plain as need be. The boys were to be taught the purest principles of morality, and left to choose their religious tenets as their matured reason should prefer when they came to enter into life. Girard separated morality and religion. The first was to be positivly taught the inmates of the college; the second left to their discretion when they should leave the institution. Girard also contemplated that this instruction should be given by the regular teachers and instructors in the college, and not by outside preachers in a building erected on the grounds called a chapel. This cannot be doubted.

How hav these intentions and provisions been carried out? The first thing, says Judge Westbrook, that strikes our attention as we look over the college grounds is an imposing edifice, called a chapel, of a most elaborate and approved style of ecclesiastical architecture. The building has a marked ritualistic form, and at once suggests "high church." Here, every Sunday, missionaries from orthodox churches, and especially from the Young Men's Christian Association, are admitted, and from the pulpit are openly taught the distinctiv dogmas of orthodoxy. The Protestant Bible is not only read, but it is expounded according to the evangelical creeds. Visitors pronounce these sermons equal in piety and sectarianism to sermons ordinarily delivered by ordained pastors in outside churches. Recently a preacher there not only delivered an orthodox sermon, but openly ridiculed Thomas Paine, a man whom Girard strongly admired, and with whom he probably agreed on religious questions. Another preacher at the chapel admitted to the scholars in his opening remarks "that the founder of the college never contemplated nor intended such a service as then and there engaged their attention." He knew Girard's trust was being perverted, and threw the responsibility for the perversion upon the Lord, by thrice quoting in a significant tone, "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform." Other missionaries, says Judge Westbrook, hav justified the defeat of Girard's intentions by quoting, "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee," meaning that Girard had been outwitted and his benefaction applied to what he did not intend—the promotion of Christian dogmas, when he only thought to promote the purest principles of morality.

When the scholars enter the pews of this chapel, they find there for their use "A Manual for the Chapel of Girard College." This Manual contains liturgical selections for morning and afternoon, for every day in the month, besides special services for Sundays, Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and other holy days. It also contains numerous forms of prayer, consisting of excerpts from the "Book of Common Prayer of the Protestant Episcopal Church." In addition to the prayers and litanies the Manual contains nearly two hundred hymns. The prayers are distinctly evangelical, one for the sick and dying asking that the departing soul "may be cleansed in the blood of Christ." A responsiv hymn, addressed to "the everlasting son of the father," thus informs Christ: "When thou tookest upon thee to deliver man, thou didst humble thyself to be born of a virgin." On the same page this declaration of belief is found: "We believe that thou shalt come to be our judge." The hymns, selections from which Judge Westbrook givs, reek with sectarian piety. The fourth hymn has this line:

"The God incarnate! Man divine!"

The eighth hymn pictures "thousands of children in heaven," and tells how they got there:

"Because the savior shed his blood
To wash away their sin;
Bathed in that pure and precious flood,
Behold them white and clean."

The first verse of the sixty-ninth hymn is:

"Holy, holy, holy, Lord God almighty,
Early in the morning our song shall rise to thee;
Holy, holy, holy, merciful and mighty,
God in three persons, blessed Trinity."

Hymn 189 is a doxology:

"Glory be to God the Father,
Glory be to God the Son,
Glory be to God the Spirit,
Great Jehovah, three in one."

Hymn 193 is similar. Hymn 73 is:

"In thy promises I trust,
Now I feel the blood applied;
I am prostrate in the dust,
I with Christ and crucified."

Hymn 74:

"Wash me, cleanse me in the blood
That flowed on Calvary."

In hymn 75 occurs this verse:

"I lay my sins on Jesus,
The spotless lamb of God;
He bears them all, and frees us
From the accursed load.
I bring my guilt to Jesus,
To wash my crimson stains
White in his blood most precious,
Till not a spot remains."

The chorus of hymn 82 is:

"Sing, O sing of my redeemer;
With his blood he purchased me;
On the cross he sealed my pardon,
Paid the debt and made me free."

Hymn 134 is devoted to frightening the children with hell:

"Buried in sorrow and in sin,
At hell's dark door we lay;
But we arise by grace divine
To see a heavenly day."

These hymns are the childish twaddle of Methodism, though the Manual is principally an Episcopal compilation. But no sectarianism to be found in the evangelical creeds is slighted. The Manual teaches, says Judge Westbrook, the orthodox dogmas of the fallen, lost, and helpless state of the human race, the incarnation of God himself through birth of a virgin mother, to atone for man's sin, and to wash away his guilt in the sacrificial blood of the God-man, thereby securing to believers eternal salvation through the grace of "God in three persons, blessed trinity." In short, the orphans are taught the narrowest kind of sectarian Christianity. The question then resolves itself to this:

Girard left his property to found a college to be completely non-religious. He had the right to do this. His trust was accepted by the city of Philadelphia. But the directors, the majority of whom are appointed for life by the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, hav perverted this trust, and not only teach religion openly, but sectarianism as well. In this they violently antagonize the expressed intention of Girard and violate a most sacred trust. What shall be done with them?

The directors admit that they ought to keep to the purpose of Girard, but they say that the first directors knew better than they what that purpose was, and that, as the first directors provided for religious services, they feel "sure that it is quite within the purpose of Mr. Girard that the principles of our common Christianity should be taught to his pupils." The directors disclaim that sectarianism is taught, but Judge Westbrook points to the Manual, and to the fact that no preachers but evangelical ones are ever admitted to the pulpit of the chapel, and the directors are silent. They hav perverted a magnificent trust, and they know it. When endeavoring to break the will, Webster argued that Girard intended to exclude the teaching of any and all religious tenets. "Is not the teaching of laymen as sectarian as the preaching of clergymen?" asked that great lawyer. "According to my experience, a layman is just as likely to launch out into sectarian views and to advance clashing doctrins and violent, bigoted prejudices as a professional preacher." Webster was right, but the court decided that Girard had the legal right to exclude all religious teaching. By Christian dishonesty, however, the directors hav done what Webster could not do, practically broken the will. "If the courts do not interfere in this matter," says Judge Westbrook, "and by mandamus or other judicial proceeding compel the directors to execute the trust committed to them in accordance with the provisions of Girard's Will, there is no use in having courts and no use in making a will. The question is one that interests the whole world, and the time will certainly come when another 'notable case' will be heard in the Supreme Court of the United States—not to break Girard's Will, but to determin whether the present directors are not shamefully betraying a sacred trust in teaching sectarian, religious tenets in spite of Girard's requirements and the decision of the court in eighteen hundred and forty-four."

The Churches and the Indian Schools.

The Independent charges that the national administration is, for political purposes, favoring the Roman Catholic church by giving it an unfair share of the public funds devoted to educating the Indians.

The Catholics maintain an Indian Mission bureau at Washington, and through this bureau, says the Independent, not only the contract schools, but the government schools, supported wholly by the government, are also rapidly passing into the control of this bureau by the appointment of Catholic teachers, even where the Indians are all Protestant. For contract boarding-schools, carried on by missionary and other bodies, where the government pays a certain amount per annum for each Indian scholar's support, the United States government expended last year the sum of $308,299.98. Of this sum the Catholics got $168,959.13, and all others, including Hampton and Lincoln, got $139,340 85. For contract day schools the government expended $9,847.27. Of this the Catholics got $7,632.92, and all others got $2,-214.35. Summing them together, the government paid for the education of Indian youth in contract schools the sum of $318,147.25; of which $176,-592.15 went to Catholic schools, and $141,555.20 to all other schools.

The Independent argues that as the Catholics of the country number only from one-sixth to one-tenth of the whole population, and the Protestants from five-sixths to nine-tenths, this giving the former fifty-five and one-half per cent of the money expended on the education of the Indians, and putting the latter off with forty-four and one-half per cent, is unfair.

If we look at it in that light—that the Indians and other heathen are fair prey for the Christian sects, to be divided pro rata and the government robbed according to averages—we agree with the Independent. But our religious contemporary should look out. If it asks for a pro rata division of the government funds for Protestant Indian schools, how can it refuse to accede to the Jesuits' pro rata demands for their parochial schools? It seems to make a world of difference to Protestants whose ox is gored, for in regard to the Catholic Protectory bill providing that that institution shall hav a share of the public school fund, the Independent says:

"If any religious sect not satisfied with these schools chooses to establish private schools and teach its own peculiar religious tenets in the same, then it has a perfect right to do so. Nobody denies this right, or objects to its exercise. But when any sect asks the general public to help it in this work of religious propagandism, then a very different question is raised. The people as citizens and property-holders hav no objection to being taxed for the support of non-sectarian public schools, in which they all hav a common interest; but they do decidedly object to such taxation for the support, either in whole or in part, of sectarian private schools. Let those who want such schools hav them to their heart's content, provided always that they are content to pay the bills."

Why not apply these words to the Indian schools, and hold them up before both Catholic and Protestant?

The Congo Mission.

The row over one of Bishop Taylor's missionaries to the Congo develops points not very creditable to any of the parties thereto. Bishop Taylor is the gentleman who, with more zeal than sense, has started to Christianize Africa and make the Dark Continent tributary to the Methodist church. In furtherance of this scheme he begged money enough to build in sections a steamer to ply on Stanley Pool, and Mr. J. C. Waller volunteered to go as cook on the boat, expecting to get thereby his own living, the living for his wife and children, and a chance to make money by trading with the nativs. When he got to Africa, his wife and children grew sick, he became discouraged, and returned. The family arrived in this city, homeless and penniless, and Mr. Waller asked the committee which sent them out for temporary relief. He was refused any aid, and had it not been for a kind-hearted saloon-keeper on West street the family would hav been left on the street to freeze and starve. The newspapers heard of Mr. Waller, investigated the matter, and published his statements. Mr. Waller, it appears, is one of those good but ignorant Christians who obey the "voice of God." He heard this voice say, "Go to Africa," and he went. Whether the voice told him to trade with nativs he does not say. At any rate, he desired to be a missionary on the Congo, which desire was fulfilled. Bishop Taylor received him and set him to work chopping wood, carrying water, and doing other divine things. The steamer on which he was to be cook and commissary, and by means of which he was to trade with the nativs, lay on the banks of the Congo in the original packages in which she was shipped to Africa. Before the trading opportunity could come Mr. Waller was obliged to return to this city to save the lives of his family. The story of his return is thus told by a writer in the Christian Advocate:

"When he arrived in New York penniless, with his sick wife and children, it was by the Wisconsin, of the Guion line, on Friday morning, December 23d, and it was noon before the baggage was passed by the revenue officers. In all the great city there were but two men with whom Mr. Waller had any acquaintance, or on whom he felt at liberty to call. These were the Rev. Asbury Lowrey, D.D., editor of the Divine Life, vice-president, and Richard Grant, Esq., treasurer of the Taylor Transit and Building Fund Society. He went immediately to the office of the treasurer at 181 Hudson street, and made himself known. Mr. Grant was out, but the clerks seemed to understand his case, and referred him to Dr. Lowrey, on Second avenue, near Fourteenth street, and thither, after some misgivings, he went, only to learn from the servant-girl that the doctor was out. He then returned to the office in Hudson street, where he was told that nothing could be done for him there, and that the vice-president was the only man who could do anything for him, and to him he must apply. Again he wended his weary way to Second avenue and back, with the same result as before. In vain he pleaded with the clerks at the treasurer's office that he was a stranger, without money to buy food and shelter for his sick family; in vain he complained of his weary, fruitless journeys. With a cruelty inexplicable, they insisted on his retracing his steps once again over those weary miles, with the encouragement: 'The doctor must be in by this time;' and the poor man went again, finishing his third trip of four miles each with no better success than before.

"Here was this wretched man. Night coming on, offices closing, exhausted, disheartened, penniless, his loved ones sick and alone on the great steamer, no hospitable door open to them, the only ones to whom he had dared to appeal for aid had 'shut up their bowels of compassion from him!' He turned his weary feet toward the steamer, reflecting, as the hot tears coursed down his cheeks: 'Do they count me their enemy because I come home to save my family alive?' Even so. On the steamer the fires were out, the doors were open, the winter wind blew cold through the saloons; the young mother, her eyes red with weeping, with her little ones huddled in a state-room, was vainly striving, with her scanty wraps, to shield their wax-like forms, from which the African fever had burnt the red blood. Little Harry, looking out at the great city over which the shades of night were slowly settling, and shivering with cold that December night, asked, plaintivly: 'Mamma, ain't there any warm houses in New York?'"

Finally, he made his wants known to a hotel and saloon keeper in West street, who took him in and kept him till some men who did not edit Divine Lifes raised funds for him to get back to his old home at Burlington, Vt.

The explanation of the committee in charge of the cis-Atlantic end of Bishop Taylor's "mission" is a curious one. They say in substance that Mr. Waller ought to hav stayed in Africa and died, after burying his family. For sending missionaries into a country where white men cannot hope to liv, they hav no apologies to offer. They say:

"We meant to do it, we hav done it, with our eyes open. Bishop Taylor and the committee hav told every candidate that we only wanted such as would go with their minds made up to suffer and die and be buried in Africa for its redemption. If any come back and complain, as Mr. Waller does, of disappointment, we are in no way responsible. It is the result of their own insincerity, their cowardice, or their want of consecration. Nor do we repent for what we hav done. If this be sin, make the most of it; we are incorrigible. We propose to repeat the offense; we call now for a thousand men and women, and money to transport them to Africa, within the next four years; we expect to get both, and we will send this army into the jaws of death, if it be the will of God, in the interest of Africa."

And this is Christ's work, as understood by the Methodists! This is the result of the African mission work, the "opening of the Congo to civilization," about which we heard so much a few months since. Was there ever a more cruel scheme of fanaticism, greed, and ignorance?

It is pretty generally understood by the common-sense world that missions to the heathen are humbugs, spiritually and materially. The converts are bribed or bought; they are from the lowest class of nativs, the more intelligent looking with contempt upon the theology of the missionaries; and the trading spirit manifested is alone sufficient to disgust the heathen with the emissaries of the new religion. Mr. Waller affirms that even in the Congo state "the missionaries as a class, in consequence of their poverty, their lack of becoming self-respect, and their trafficking habits, are held in contempt by the nativs and by the local government." The good done by these missions is generally good done to the missionaries themselvs; but, to a land like Africa, it is little less than murder to send white men. A fanatic like Bishop Taylor may take his life in his hand, and liv there; but that an organization should exist to coax men ignorant of the conditions of the country to go there to die is monstrous. The whole business is a disgrace to the church which supports it.

Editorial Notes.

JOHN H. KEYSER, the stove-merchant philanthropist who has been feeding the poor of New York, has had to stop, owing to the great number of applicants for aid and the shortness of his own purse. Speaking of the opposition his enterprise encountered from the churches and professional charity organizations, Mr. Keyser told this story: "There is a church across the street from the eating-room, but never even offered the men a cup of cold water. One of the deacons did say that we were doing 'nice work,' and that if we would send the men over to the church they might be converted." Mr. Keyser is a heretic.

HENRY GEORGE is now charged by Dr. McGlynn with treason to his party. At a meeting at Pythagoras Hall last week the ex-priest said: "Henry George has practically declared himself for Cleveland, and some of the editorial writers on his paper, the Standard, hav tried to side-track our party. We will not be side-tracked nor will we be a wretched bit of a tail to a Democratic kite. If Cleveland is defeated, we will not put crape on our hats. If Henry George does not see fit to be our candidate or support our candidate, we hav plenty of good material without him. Mr. George will hav to take a very humble position among us if he persists in supporting Cleveland. Now I hav opened my mind to you. If he did consent to run, I doubt very much if he would get much of a showing from our party." The way of the political reformer in this city is not only hard, but its deviousness is like the purposes of God—past finding out.

STORIES having been lately revived that Dr. McGlynn contemplated going to Rome to ask for rehabilitation as a priest, the land reformer made the following declaration last Sunday night before the Anti-Poverty Society: "Without a moral revolution, I shall never preach in St. Stephen's church, or in any Catholic church, again. The machine won't send me back, and now let me end the matter—I don't want to go back. I can't go back without retracting all I hav said here, and I will never take back one jot or tittle of that. will never, never, never allow any man or men to supervise my doings among my fellow-men. The first letter which I shall send to Rome on this business—and one which I shall send speedily—will be one disavowing the actions of kind friends who hav sought, with my tacit consent, to reopen my case there. Hav no fear for me. I defy the malignity of Rome. I giv them warning now that if they attempt to hound me with the arts of which they are such masters, I will expose them. I hav only told things which politicians and well-informed people hav known in the past, but I giv them warning that I am full of knowledge of events the tale of which will make the country too hot to hold them. They had better let me alone."

Letters from Friends.

HARVARD, ILL., Dec. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Let me say those two letters of R. G. Ingersoll's to Mr. Field are worth one year's subscription to the paper; he reasons so grandly.

Please send me the "Nine Demands of Liberalism." I want to hav it framed and hung up in my house. Also send E. C. Walker's little book on "Bible Temperance."

I see that some people think Heston's pictures are injurious to the paper. If such is the case, those people had better throw away their old Bibles, for all are taken from their old Jew book. Yours truly, ABRAM CARMACK.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Jan. 1, A.S. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Now, as Congress will soon adjourn their annual debauch, we may rest assured that they will Take physic, prompt;

And expose themselvs to feel what wretches feel.

And in this condition of mind there will be nothing to hinder them from shaking the "superflux" with lavish hand and in unsparing profusion among our much maligned and downtrodden aristocracy. If the tale be true that history repeats itself, and also that no lawyer living can possibly do anything without a precedent, what is to hinder Congress from legislating specially for our millionaire aristocracy? They can't help it; they must do something to kill time besides drawing their salaries, and if there has ever been a law enacted in Congress exclusivly in the interest of the people at large, your humble servant has failed to find it out.

Yours truly, NELSON HUNT.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Christian temperance advocates hav revived their enthusiasm by a grand rally here recently; and it must hav struck the consistent ones in attendance as somewhat ludicrous to see emblazoned above the rostrum, in letters which seemed ready to burst with a sense of their own absurdity, "In God we trust," while upon the rostrum stood the shining lights of theology, begging with tears in their eyes, imploring in attitude and eloquence, for just one more addition to their treasured and most potent power, the almighty dollar. Most effectivly did they beg, for thousands of dollars were contributed.

Their shrewdness far outmeasures their consistency; otherwise they could not be theological adherents. How strange that men, endowed with reason, as all are, should cling, as though, forsooth, life and morality depended upon them, to the foolish assertions, inconsistent traditions, and monstrous iniquities which are portrayed in the Bible?

Suspect a man continually, and sooner or later he will fall; but let him know of reposed confidence, and how exalted he becomes in the great majority of cases! Man can be taught to do right, because it means his own good and happiness for time and eternity. It appeals to his reason, to his sense of justice, to his love for all those about him, of which not one is entirely void. But get up and wildly threaten a man; tell him to "believe as I do or be damned, conform with the customs of this church or be visited by the most monstrous and unending injustice which an almighty mind can conceive"—can such blasphemy lead to the well of an undeveloped soul? I trow not! It has caused many to hastily don the sheep's clothing, and is the very essence and source of hypocrisy. FANNY DE VILLO.

BEARDSTOWN, ILL., Jan. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The following is a sample par excellence of the stuff to which the Methodist church is resorting for drumming up recruits:

The greatest investment of the age at the Methodist Episcopal church! Opportunity to invest day and night. Hours of business at 2 o'clock every afternoon and 7 o'clock every evening. Come, everyone, and take stock in the wonderful enterprise!

When such claptrap as the above is harnessed in to do service in the name of religion, no honest man can hav one particle of respect for such religion. And "the pillars in the church" exercise no more forethought than the preacher in permitting their "holy religion" thus to be hawked before the public as does a charcoal-man or a peanut-vender his goods. The latter hav the advantage in the fact that the one can warm the cold, the other feed the hungry; while "the greatest investment of the age" is the quickest way of enriching only its blatant advertiser, the preacher.

This advertisment, in flaming bills, has been scattered over the city, and appears in all the stores. And the majority call it a "shrewd, businesslike scheme!" To our certain knowledge, we remember that when, not long since, a lecture on Freethought topics was announced in dignified terms, by similar means, the bills were cautiously and scrupulously, or otherwise, gathered and chucked into the fire. They were even torn down from the fences and buildings. But when anything of a church nature is started, however demoralizing in its nature and tendency, as these "revivals" undoubtedly are, the thought of shielding their children from its baleful influence never rises as an issue. The preacher's public plea is that it will help the young man in business if he comes to Jesus and joins the church. "Godliness is profitable," when one is fit for no better religion. ZOA TOPSIS.

BEAR CITY, ARK., Jan. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as long as that will pay for it, for James L. Berry, Crystal Springs, Ark.—a whole-souled Liberal, and one of our future millionaires, and I promis you he will be a permanent subscriber, and will remit again before the present subscription expires. I most heartily indorse THE TRUTH SEEKER, pictures and all. I hav never found an editorial in it to which I could not say, "Them's my sentiments, better than I could express them."

I want no Anarchism or Communism in mine, but free speech, a free press, and a free country; the greatest possible individual freedom compatible with everybody else's having the same privilege—in fact, perfect freedom to do right, but no license to do wrong. We must hav government in order to secure justice, but want very little of it—just as few laws as possible, and those only the best.

The mines of Arkansas are all right, and in a few months we will be shipping bullion by the carload, both gold and silver—gold predominating—and people will be astonished to learn that Arkansas is the richest mining field on earth; but it is the plain, unvarnished truth.

And we hav a number of broad-gage Liberals here who will soon be classed among the wealthy ones of earth, and will know how to use their wealth for the good of mankind, the Secular Union, and Liberalism generally, including the Nine Demands. Hold your grip, Brother Stevens, a few months longer, and we will strengthen your hands. I hav had Jamieson and Remsburg lecture in my home town in Missouri, and hav been born again free from superstition and error, with an everlasting salvation, world without end—Amen!

You may see me in your sanctum when the leaves begin to turn—I mean next fall—if the mines pan out so soon. Always for truth, Yours, JOHN Q. CARTER.

BRUNSWICK, GA., Jan. 1, A.S. 288.

MR. EDITOR: At the beginning of another year we mostly think more of the course of life than on any other day. Thoughts of that kind are crossing my brain, and as they are mostly related to the cause THE TRUTH SEEKER so grandly advocates and expresses, I think I had better tell you about my New Year's conclusion. Before me lies the last copy of the most valuable and Liberal paper I know of, and if I am an Infidel to-day, I can honestly declare that THE TRUTH SEEKER has done the most to make me one, and if I go to hell—it is THE TRUTH SEEKER's fault.

Another year has to-day made its appearance. What it will bring us no one knows. Who at the beginning of 1886 thought of a Haymarket riot, and who on the morning of the year just passed had an idea of the fivefold murder committed on November 11th? Nobody. And so we are standing again before another short space of time. We do not know how much good it may bring us, and at least we hav hope that it will turn out good instead of bad. Let us hope the best for the sake of universal mental liberty.

Now, I do not think it very proper for me to go into a lengthy argument with Mr. Swan, of Kent, O., but simply refer him to Sister Maggie Hope Graham's letter from far-off Washington territory in defense of Anarchism. She says: "What fools you are to think you can hang an idea!" And right she is. You cannot hang an idea, nor put it out of existence by force nor punishment, but simply and only by solid argument or by removing the cause that creates the idea or effect. "There will come a time when our silence will be more powerful than the voices you now strangle to death"—the dying words of the leader of the Anarchists—will remain in the history of the struggle for liberty forever. The time will come, though we may not liv long enough to participate in it, when people will think otherwise of those five than they do now—at least, the majority.

I do not think that I hav to be an Anarchist to respect those men. Why? You yourself, Mr. Swan, make the remark that there are many good men who believe in the Bible stories, and that we are bound to respect them. Why not those Anarchists? Judge by the cause that made the men Anarchists; I look on the question from the side of humanity. Their purpose was to free the working class from those who are gradually murdering them. Did they themselvs in the least benefit by it? Does anyone dare to say that their purpose was the expectation of personal gain? I am not an Anarchist, but there is much good ethics in Anarchism which "we are bound to respect," as you would express yourself. I again repeat my words that there is no limit to free speech, and I ask anyone to correct me.

Perhaps a world with free speech is only imaginary, because I myself think that at least it will take a long course of time to prepare people for this Utopia of liberty. But maybe I am wrong. I believe in the truth of the human character, which is not naturally bad and mean, but which has evolved this way in the struggle for life and existence. I am not an Anarchist; nor do I believe in the destruction of property, because this would mean a loss to the community; nor hav I the idea that there can be a world where each one has just as much as the other one. My whole religion is based on justice and equal rights. No one should possess what he or she has not earned by his or her labor. One should hav the same chance for making a living as another. The soil should belong to all, and no one should own more than he or she can use for a livelihood. I further think that a person should work from twenty to fifty years by gradual decrease of working hours; and also advocate that each and every worker should receive what he produces, and am opposed to having things so that if a woman sews a shirt for a merchant, it costing him perhaps twenty cents and he selling at seventy-five cents, making fifty-five cents, the seamstress gets three to five cents for hard work, and he eleven times the amount for doing little or nothing. That is mainly the religion the Anarchists advocate, and I see no wrong in it. I refer you respectfully to Mr. Ingersoll's second letter to Field, and his definition of right and wrong and good and evil. Mr. Ingersoll says a person making a living by religion is despicable, and also I say that any person making his living by the missteps and wrong interpretation of the law, or the violation of the law, above all others is detestable.

I trust in the honor of man, in the voice of conscience that will tell everyone what is right or wrong. O Mr. Swan! don't think that it always takes a policeman to keep up virtue, but think that people will worship virtue for the reward of virtue in itself. From your standpoint you must indeed think very low of human character—that no one would be honest and virtuous if a man with a club doesn't watch him. Isn't it just the principle of doing good for good itself that has made us Freethinkers?

Hoping the best for the cause of humanity for the coming year, I am, Yours, FRED. L. HOFFMAN.

KENT, O., Jan. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: There seems to be a great strife at this present time between Christian religion and scientific Infidelity. The one is founded on faith in something unseen, unknown, and undemonstrable by any known process of reasoning or scientific proof. The other, whether true or false, is the outgrowth of investigation by those who for centuries hav stood at the head of what we call Naturalists, and who hav ferreted out and deciphered many of the difficult problems of nature's mystery. They hav learned of the great laws by which nature is governed. These laws govern both organic and inorganic nature. The first-mentioned place behind this what they call God, and ascribe to him the same principles and attributes as found in man. He is said to be vicious, full of jealousy, hatred, revenge, and to be guilty of bringing into existence a portion of the human family on purpose to glorify his name, the rest to show his infinit goodness in casting them off and punishing them in unquenchable fire throughout eternity. With these bad qualities they ascribe to him the power of love, affection, forgivness, etc., making a being that is on the whole worthy of our love and esteem and one to be adored. The Infidel (which simply means "an unbeliever in the other faith") seems to doubt the existence of such a deity, but places "behind the scenes" a being of infinit greatness, of whom he has little or no knowledge, as his real worth is so great that the mind of man can hav of it no conception. They demonstrate to a certainty that he does all by a great and unchangeable law, and asks not the council or advice of his subjects. While the Christian believes that God has violated his own law at sundry times and performed miracles on earth, and is ever ready, when earnestly called on through supplications in faith from his faithful followers, to show his all-wise and supreme power to further the end of belief in his own existence; on the other hand, the unbelievers claim that all the fervent prayers of heaven and earth united would not remove one grain of sand on the seacoast. They claim that all such prayers could not put out one little fire in an Indian's wigwam when fed by good fuel and the conditions of burning kept perfect. I do not wish to ask, Why this difference of opinion? but ask, Why not either prove or disprove the truth in everything as far as possible? If the Bible God will do as his followers and teachers claim, why not test the question and learn the facts? Certainly there are those who love to pray and who claim an unbounded measure of faith. Then why not call for a day to be set aside for devout, fervent prayer by the millions, and ask his majesty to perform some noble and miraculous deed to prove the truth of his infinit greatness? Could he not say to the nations of unbelievers, "Assemble at such a place, at such a time, and witness the burning of a live coal beneath the briny deep, or look ye and see the mighty oak come forth in full size and vigor in a day that I usually grow by my natural laws in a few hundred years?" This would be convincing proof to many, although Theosophists tell us that many pagan Hindoos can do all this from their knowledge and control of the natural forces. Would not such a demonstration of power from the great all-wise creator described by the D.D.'s of our land settle the matter for all time to come?

For centuries past these ideas, the superstitious and the scientific, hav lived side by side like the thistle and lily, but unfortunately the former has been skilfully husbanded and made to grow, while the latter has been forced to submission, and only allowed to grow where it was unknown and unnoticed. But truth and virtue will prevail, and the great law of growth has forced new life into the subdued and enfeebled roots of the beautiful, and now the petals of reality begin to show their colors of truth, undaunted and fearless of the powers of superstition. How long, I ask, will this condition of affairs continue to exist? How long will the poor man be found dropping into the coffers of the clerical hat the hard-earned coin that is needed to enhance the comforts of his own family? How long will the poor widow be compelled to sew until midnight to pay the tax on her own little home while the millionaire's cathedral goes untaxed? How long will those mighty spires continue to look down in disdain upon the humble cot of the poor man who by economy and hard work has gained a shelter for his wife and little ones to protect them from the wintry blasts? How long shall the female domestic continue to pay to her priest the price of the shackles that bind her to superstition and her will to his? May I ask, How long will Ignorauce hold the torch that furnishes light for him to be robbed of all the comforts in this life, only to be prepared for a life we know not of? The Infidel's God speaks in thundering tones and says: "One world at a time. Do as you would be done by in this. Liv to enjoy home and friends in this world and you will be prepared for the next when it comes. Where can heaven be found better than on earth?" But I must answer, not here as long as superstition and bigotry reign supreme.

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage in a late sermon in Brooklyn said the fact is that "about all the brain and the business genius is on the side of religion. Infidelity is incipient insanity. All Infidels are cranks." Such are the words of him who asks you in the name of his God to love your enemies and your neighbor as yourself. O thou falsifier of the truth! you would keep in ignorance your fellow-man, that you may liv off the sweat of his brow instead of your own. You care not to speak the truth, only as it suits you; by the errors of the past, and dare not for one moment listen to the trumpet of science that would so justly condemn your oft-repeated fables to the regions of the deep. How can you wrench from your fellow-man that liberty and freeborn thought that speak a solace of happiness, and would make his breast heave with inspired love for all the blessings he could obtain, only to pacify your love for notoriety and financial support, when you know you cannot sustain by actual truth one word you say? You hav not the excuse of a criminal lawyer who pleads for the acquittal of his client whom he knows is guilty, and works hard to show his ability to disprove the truth. If you had one excuse for your hypocrisy, the more honest might excuse you. I again ask, When, oh, when will the truth prevail and the ashes of the terrible monster, Superstition, act as a fertilizer to make grow the great truths that it is man's privilege to obtain? A. D. SWAN.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., Jan. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The pioneer of Liberalism here in this place informs me that the money is made up by subscription to procure J. E. Remsburg to pay us a visit in the near future and deliver three lectures in our town on Liberalism. The above event is looked forward to with anticipated pleasure, and, as the Methodists say, we hope that great good will be accomplished in this part of the moral vinyard.

Several counties in this part of Texas hav suffered severely for two years past with drouth, crops being almost a total failure, causing hundreds of people to leave the country and considerably weakening in the minds of those remaining the belief in the old passage of scripture, "Once I was young, but now am old, yet never did I see the righteous forsaken or his seed begging bread." If any of our ancestors were righteous, the above quotation is certainly exploded in these parts. It may yet hold good in Brooklyn or New York, but won't do in western Texas in a drouth like the past. However, we liv in hope.

The minds of our people are tending toward Liberalism. Several hav subscribed openly to the above fund. Others say to Friend Lewis: "Yes, I will subscribe something toward the lectures, but don't put my name down on the list." Now, the above indicates a strong tendency toward Freethought, and we expect a good time here if we can hav a succession of Liberal lectures at this place the coming year. The shackles of fanaticism and superstition are weakening with us.

The question whether Ingersoll has beheaded Dr. Field, amputated his tail, or pierced his heart remains an unsettled question. But all admit that Field is dead, killed by his own medicin, upon the gory field of superstition, and that he is wrapped in the mantle of conviction ready for theological interment. And our proposition is that a tombstone be erected over Field's tomb bearing the following inscription: "Hurrah for the colonel!" GEO. WHITAKER.

BELVIDERE, ILL., Jan. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot imagin how Mr. Shoemaker and Mr. Cretors can be so unreasonable as to charge you with sympathy with Anarchy. In all your editorials on the subject I hav never seen one word in which you favor or defend it. Before those gentlemen make the charges, it would be better for them to point out the editorial in question. It is your opinion that the Chicago Anarchists did not hav a fair trial. That is Robert Ingersoll's opinion. And my opinion exactly coincides with yours and his. Ingersoll and yourself hav felt free to speak your mind. All honor to you for it. What is THE TRUTH SEEKER for, if not for the purpose of Freethinkers' expressing their candid views? If it is not for the purpose of Freethinkers' expressing their free thoughts, then I do not see what purpose it is for. It had better be discontinued, and let us all take the New York Observer, or some other religious paper that forbids the voice of Freethought. Because you hav given your opinion of the Chicago trial, Mr. Shoemaker stops his paper, and Mr. Cretors tells you to smear it over with printers' ink. He finds fault with you for printing six words of Herr Most's opinions. Why, great Scott! you hav printed columns and columns of Christians' opinions, and they hav butchered millions and millions of the human race, while the Anarchists are only supposed to hav killed seven people.

That supposition is the only question in dispute. You thought that there was a link lacking in the chain of evidence, and you said so. Mr. Ingersoll thinks so, and says so. And there are thousands who think so, and say so. And again, there are thousands who think so, but are too timid to say so, for fear of being called Anarchists.

O. S. Barrett, one of your correspondents, wants to bet $1,000 that the man who says "Hats off" to the men who were hung in Chicago is himself an Anarchist. I'll take the bet. I say "Hats off" to those men—not because they were Anarchists, but because I think they were well-meaning—though mistaken—men; men who were slain, not because a case was proved against them, but because public clamor cried out for revenge. To appease this cry, they were made victims. The wretch who committed the crime was unknown. The motiv that prompted him or her to commit it is unknown; for how can his or her motiv be known if the criminal is unknown? But those who hanged the men supposed that the unknown one was prompted to do so by the teachings of those men. Justice and law would never consent to hang them upon any such supposition, but blind revenge and popular clamor would. When I heard of their deaths I mourned for them. My heart ached with a heartfelt sorrow. I sympathized with them on account of the injustice dealt out to them. When I think of this injustice, in the fulness of my sorrow I reverently doff my hat and say to those who see this injustice: In the name of Jesus Christ, Bruno, Galileo, Servetus, and all who hav fallen victims to revenge and public clamor, instead of justice, Hats off, gentlemen! those men are worthy of our reverence and respect.

Now, I do not believe in either Anarchy or Socialism, but I incline to free trade Democracy. Years ago I voted the Republican ticket. Now, the fact there are ten Republicans to one Democrat here does not deter me from speaking my political views. The same in regard to religion. I was once a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. I held an office in the Sabbath-school; I changed my views; I expressed them in the Bible class, and got kicked out of the church in consequence. The minister came out to my place and begged me to conceal my views, for my family's sake, for my reputation's sake, that I might not lose caste in society, etc. I told him I would not play the hypocrit to please him, or my family, or my friends, or for the sake of my character. I did not care if Mrs. Grundy thought I was the greatest rascal in the world. I meant to be honest with my conscience, no matter what was the consequence. Now, if I was convinced that Anarchy was right I would brave all public opinion and say so, but I do not think it is right, and I say so. Now, will Mr. Barrett go to work and prove that I am an Anarchist? I am worth about $8,000; if I was in the habit of betting I would not be probably worth as much, but on a dead-sure game like this I am quite willing to stake $1,000.

I believe in hanging men who murder their fellow-men, but if a Digger Indian, or a papist, or even a Presbyterian was hanged under the same rulings, I would feel equally indignant and grieved at the injustice shown.

ROBERT SWAIL.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Jan. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Once again we are made happy by the return of John Peck to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Peck's "Absurdities of Christianity" are some of the most convincing arguments I hav ever read, and it is with real pleasure that I see they hav been issued in pamphlet form. They should be read by every Christian in the world. I am glad to say that this part of the world is not so badly priest-ridden as it used to be, although there are a good many churches. It is just the opposit here from what it is in Ohio, where I was raised. There it is big church and small school-house, and here it is big school-house and small church—and still smaller congregation, unless some gospel foghorn comes along and stirs them up a little, just enough to get a good collection, and then leaves them in the rut of superstition as deep as ever.

We can boast of more and better school-houses than any other state in the Union. Our school-children are bright and intelligent, and a very noticeable feature in our schools is the absence of the Bible. A great many of our school boards are composed of men who do not wish such nonsense and vulgarity taught their children as is found in the Bible, and a very noticeable feature in church is the absence of the old-fashioned hell-fire sermon of some years ago. And another new departure of the churches of this place is the taking down of their tall steeples—all except the Presbyterians—which the preachers used to tell us pointed to heaven and everlasting happiness, but now they are somewhat at a loss to locate heaven, harp, golden streets, etc., and consequently down come their pointers.

Burlington is taking a great deal of interest in Freethought work. In the past year, we hav had several good lectures here. J. E. Remsburg has been here twice, and given us four lectures: "False Claims," "Sabbath Breaking," "The Apostle of Liberty," and "Bible Morals." "Bible Morals" brought the house down with applause. "The Apostle of Liberty" went right to the heart of the vast audience and brought tears to many an old veteran's cheek. His appeal to the better man was tender and touching, and every heart sent forth a thrill of joy as he pronounced his eulogy on the grand old hero, Thomas Paine.

The Hon. Wm. Cunback rendered his "Invisible Some People" to a crowded house, and opened the eyes of the credulous very wide. He was not advertised as a Liberal, and consequently the good sisters and brethren came out in full force.

And now we hav had our almost-crucified Reynolds, and again we are at the pinnacle of happiness. Mr. Reynolds is more than fluent; he is eloquent, logical, and truthful. We can now boast of an organization, thanks to Mr. Reynolds.

C. K. LEVERING.

PURDY'S STATION, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. John R. Kelso, in a very interesting letter, some months ago published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, wanted to know if there is any such thing as Liberalism, and if there is, what it is. My answer is, Liberalism as an abstract matter does exist, but people who call themselvs Liberals are not always worth that name. Some Christians may be true Liberals, and some Freethinkers may be bigoted. Ingersoll's definition of Liberalism is the best I ever heard. Says the colonel: "By the word Liberal I mean not only free, not only one who thinks for himself, not only one who has escaped from the prisons of custom and creed, but one who is candid, intelligent, and kind—that is to say, Liberal toward others." Nothing can be clearer than this. To allow every human being to think, to investigate for himself, to express his opinion—this is Liberalism. To allow every man to liv, work, and act according to his own wish and fancy, so long as his actions are not calculated to limit our happiness—this is Liberalism. Not to condemn any theory before you hav investigated it thoroughly—this is Liberalism. The trouble with many people is, they haste to applaud or to condemn things without having any knowledge as to the meaning of those things, and the less they know of any subject the more they talk of it. I am acquainted with many Christians, or at least, people that call themselvs Christians, who know so much of their religion that they consider Bible-reading an unnecessary luxury. Some of them hardly ever hav read twenty chapters in the holy book. They "know" that the Bible is God's word; that it is a book superior to any book written by human genius; that to giv up that book is to giv up our civilization, charity, and every good thing which makes life worth living. More than that, they "know" that the Bible is written by a ghost through the aid of human secretaries, and if you hav courage to inquire the authority of that book, you are in danger of losing your soul. And yet they do not take pains to examin the book for themselvs, to find out what kind of matter they are obliged to believe. The parson told them there is no book in the world which can be compared with the Bible, and that is enough for them. Ask those people why they don't buy any books; they will tell you they cannot afford to spend money on useless books—they hav one book, the Bible, which is the beginning and the end of wisdom. The parson told them the Bible is a book of perfect harmony; that almost in every chapter of the Old Testament, from the first historical statement in Genesis to the last prophecy in Malachi (or, as Ingersoll would say, from the first mistake of Moses to the last curse of Malachi), you will find prophecies concerning Christ. That is enough for them. I am almost inclined to think that the reasou why there are so many Christians is because they do not know what the Bible really is. Let them read the Bible for themselvs; they will discover that it is a book full of absurd and even disgusting stories; that its moral teachings are by no means perfect. They will find out that the Bible God, the divine being whom they worship, has a human character of the most cruel kind, and if they only hav any respect for themselvs as men and women, they will be ashamed of bowing their heads before such a being.

In the town where I liv I heard some people condemning the land theories of Henry George, and yet they are unable to tell you what is the meaning of Mr. George's theories. Some people think so: "My neighbor So-and-so is an honest man and he votes the Democratic ticket. Now, if the Democratic party is good for him, why shouldn't it be good for me?" Other people say: "My father is a good and sensible man, and he is a devout Christian. Doesn't it prove that Christianity is a religion of goodness and wisdom?" I know an old gentleman, a steady reader of a New York daily paper, who does not know the difference between Socialism and Anarchism, and yet he condemns both theories alike. Some time ago I asked a Christian lady who, according to her opinion, is the worst, Paine or Ingersoll. "The latter," she answered; "so far as I understand Ingersoll, he is not only an Infidel, but a Socialist also." One might think that before pronouncing on him, she would become at least a little acquainted with his writings. No, she has never read a page of Ingersoll's works. The same lady regards THE TRUTH SEEKER as a "curse to the country," notwithstanding the fact that she is acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER just as much as with the writings of Ingersoll.

Still, I must admit that some Christians are "candid, intelligent, and kind—that is to say, Liberal toward others." Among my acquaintances there is an excellent Christian lady whom I hold in the highest esteem. She believes in the existence of God, in the inspiration of the Bible, in a future reward and punishment. Yet she knows that many passages in the Bible are unfit to read, that many things of the holy writ are absurd, that a man ought not to be held responsible for his opinion, that the doctrin of eternal punishment is cruel. Nevertheless, she clings to the Bible. It givs her pain to think that the whole Christian business is an illusion and fraud. But she is intelligent enough to hear both sides, candid enough to listen to an argument without making a wry face, and in many respects she is better than the minister, who told me that Infidels ought to be imprisoned.

It givs me pain to state here that some Freethinkers are no less intolerant than Christians. Some readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER objected to Mrs. Lucy N. Colman's articles. One of them even gave up reading them. Now, if her statements are not true, anyone has the right to correct them. But not to do so, and then to say to the Editor, "Please don't print those articles, they are incorrect—or, they hurt my feelings"—is anything but Liberal. Some of the Investigator readers "stopped their paper" because its editor does not share their Anarchistic tendencies, and some of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers discontinued their subscription because they think the Editor to be an Anarchist. Mr. A. D. Swan, of Kent, O., says the editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 24th headed, "Bloodthirsty Chicago," is a shame. Another gentleman of Paris, Ill., wants the Editor to "giv the space occupied by them [letters or editorials in favor of the Chicago Anarchists] in his copy a smear with printer's ink." Now, let it be understood that the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has no sympathy with Anarchy as a political doctrin, nor with the Chicago Anarchists as believers in abolition of government as a polity for abolishing all our miseries. But he is true to his honest conviction. He believed that the Anarchists hav not had a fair trial, and he said so. It was not only his right, but his duty, to protest against the execution of men whom he believed to be innocent. Of course, he may be mistaken in his opinion; he does not expect you to tell him, "Thy name is infallible," but he should expect people that call themselvs Liberals not to make such wry faces because they cannot agree with him on some point.

Brother Liberals, let reason be your guide. Do not haste to denounce any opinion as a useless, infamous, or dangerous thing simply because it is in disagreement with your thinking. Do not follow the example of Christians, who are in the habit of condemning Freethinkers simply because they are "terrible Infidels." CLEMENS P. BRYSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Boys We Need.

Here's to the boy who's not afraid
To do his share of work;
Who never is by toil dismayed,
And never tries to shirk.

The boy whose heart is brave to meet
All lions in the way;
Who's not discouraged by defeat,
But tries another day.

The boy who always means to do
The very best he can;
Who always keeps the right in view,
And aims to be a man.

Such boys as these will grow to be
The men whose hands will guide
The future of our land; and we Shall speak their names with pride.

All honor to the boy who is
A man at heart, I say;
Whose legend on his shield is this:
"Right always wins the day."

—Golden Days.

Why Am I a Liberal?

First, I will giv the meaning of the word Liberal. It means free by birth, gentle in manner, befitting a free man, woman, or child; bestowing a free hand in all humanity; educating greater freedom of speech, especially in religious or political matters.

1. The reason I am a Liberal is because it is practical to be so in life. To those who practice its principles the world owes its greatest gratitude. If it were not for what little Liberalism there is in the world, it certainly would not be worth living in.

2. All the greatest men and women of the past, as well as present, were, and are, Liberals; their writings and sayings are the best the world ever produced.

3. True Liberalism does not require any penitentiaries.

4. Where true Liberalism is practiced, repentance is not necessary.

5. To be Liberal is to differ from the hyena, the hog, and the church bigot.

6. I am a Liberal because I like the territory the word covers.

[Age ten years.] ELLA HUNTER.

I send my essay, "Why I Am a Liberal." It is my first attempt of anything of the kind. I am eleven years of age.

My first reason is because I like Liberality in all things, and I cannot see any in religion. Another thing, I think, if there is a God who knows and controls everything, why does he let such dreadful accidents occur? The Christians say it is to punish you for your sins. There are many innocent babes who lose their lives, as well as adults, in those accidents. I do not think they hav any sins to answer for. It seems to me, if God can govern all things, he could govern this also; that is, if he knows all things. I hav read a little in the Bible, and I do not think that it agrees as other histories agree, for I do not think it is anything but a history. In one place it says, "The earth was without form." Now, I never heard that anything as bulky as an earth could be made without some form or another. In another place it says, "Let us make man in our image." I thought that God was alone, but from what it says it seems not. There are many other reasons why I am a Liberal, but think I hav said enough, so will close. ANNIE RYAN.

Orange, N. J., Oct. 10, 1887.

Where We Went and What We Saw.

Come, sit you down and listen while I tell you about our visit to Greenwich. You don't know where Greenwich is?

Well, we didn't until a few days since. But we found it, Mona and I, miles away on a line out of Boston, nestled among the snow-clad hills, with groups of spicy pines and cedars dotting the landscape here and there like bits of emerald set on frosted silver. Ravines, long and narrow, wooded paths, and graceful little winding streams went in and out amid the valleys under the hills.

Mt. Lizzie is a real mountain, and appears for all the world like an immense sugar-loaf, with the sunbeams rippling on her snowy crest; and Mt. Pomeroy, not far away, seems as if forever giving an invitation to everybody to "Come up higher." Mona and I thought we would like to climb those hights in summer time, and from the summit I know one might gather fresh inspiration and a more glorious understanding of the love and fellowship of Nature with her children.

Greenwich is a pretty spot, even when robed in the snowy mantle of the winter. The country is always beautiful. There you feel like expanding your lungs and taking a good long breath. You know in cities one feels—at least I do—cramped, stifled, crowded amid the high roofs and compact buildings, with only a dot of sky now and then to see. But in the great wide fields of the country we get broad and wonderful views, not glimpses merely, of the vast domain overhead decked with floating, fleecy, feathery clouds, sailing on and on, like ships at sea. And such deep, sweet draughts of pure, untainted air as one may hav among the hills and vales! There is nothing like it in the city—such trees and rocks, with plenty of room to grow and expand.

I shall not soon forget one big elm in Greenwich, with its wide-reaching, all-caressing branches, that seemed like a father among trees. Some one has said: "Of trees, it is only the elm that has a soul." Perhaps so, but all trees hav hearts, and they shelter many birds from the pitiless storms of winter and invite them to nest-building in summer, as you know.

But enough of this. Now let me tell you how on a Sunday morning, when the snow was crisp and sparkling, a double sleigh was sent out in that town of Greenwich, Eugene driving, and picked up the little ones and those who lived afar off, and right merrily they rode. Where? Well, to meeting, of course. Where else on a Sunday morning? Then the same sleigh came and took Mr. Smith, Helen (I am not sure that is her name, but we will let it go so), Susie, Mona, and me, and carried us to the same destination. Now, that little Gothic chapel, with its windows of stained glass and lovely frescoed walls and ceiling—I want to tell you about that.

It is not just like any church you ever saw, for it is independent in character, broad and Liberal in its teaching. It stands like a beautiful jewel, radiating far and near such bright, effulgent light and glory as must some day make this old world a better place for man to dwell in, because lighted by sincerity and truth.

Many appropriate mottoes are on the walls, each one a lesson in itself. "Wisdom," "Truth," and "Love" are represented by three stars, forming a most holy trinity, the holiest of the holy; while "Liberty," "Justice," and "Fraternity" make a grand and glowing link, uniting all in the great brotherhood of the human race. When you enter the building you immediately notice a picture of the sun rising from an ocean of billowy, floating, misty clouds, at the extreme end of the chapel, above the wide rostrum, the real sun shining through the gayly colored windows, lighting the painting with a thousand dancing sprays of light and loveliness. At the opposit end of this unique temple is an inscription in Latin: "Mors janua vitæ," which means, "Death is the gateway of life."

Up in the belfry is a bell, bearing on one side this inscription: "I ring for Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. Washington, Lincoln, Garrison, Phillips." On the other side of it is inscribed this: "Presented by the friends of humanity."

They hav meetings in this quaint jewel of a chapel Sundays, but on this particular Sunday of which I am telling, the speaker who should hav been present was not there, but there was some speaking and sweet music, too, at the appointed hour.

And then, at noon, there was a picnic!

Wait, now—don't be in a hurry—and I'll tell you.

The people that make up the audience there come from several miles round about, and to stay all day, must bring with them a lunch, of course.

Under the room I hav briefly described is another apartment, which I should call the children's room. In the rear of that is a cosy kitchen or dining-room. Around a table there we all gathered, little folks and big folks, like one big family, with a goodly supply of bread and butter, pie, cake, coffee, etc., upon the table.

Didn't I think of you all, my darlings, and wish you were all there? You would all hav thought it very nice, indeed.

Well, after the lunch, there was another meeting—a session of the Children's Progressive Lyceum. There was music again, readings and recitations by young ladies and dear little flaxen-haired, blue-eyed boys and girls—Laura, Bessie, Dena, Mabel, and others, but little Cretie was not there that day, and some others were absent. Readings, responses, and more music made the time pass very pleasantly; then there was marching with banners, symbols, and beautiful badges, and I thought these young soldiers the noblest and bravest I had seen for many a day. There was an introduction of a visitor, who is always a dear lover of children, a brief address, and the exercises closed by singing and a distribution of candy and fruit by the conductor, who is also the builder and owner of the lovely little church among the hills.

I had almost forgotten to tell you there was a library there of good and entertaining books. Now, what do you suppose was the chief charm of all this, to me? What, except that no error, no falsehood, no superstition, mingled with the teaching there; but the children are taught the truths of science instead of the tangles of false systems of bigotry and superstitious fancies?

Would you like to know the name of the one who has set this shining light in Greenwich and made the old town historic—who has builded even better, far better, than he knew or thought—who has planted a little seed that is growing to a lofty tree that shall bud, blossom, and bear rich fruitage that yet shall bless the world with the blessing of universal mental liberty?

His name will go ringing down the centuries as that of one who fought a good fight and won a great victory, and who opened a way for vaster issues and grander possibilities for the humanity we all love so well. And when you hear people speak of Henry W. Smith, you may know it is the name of the founder of the Independent Liberal church in Greenwich, Mass., who has glorified the term "Liberal" by good and gracious works, and who has made the world better by living in it.

Correspondence.

NEWPORT, ME., Feb. 5, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try and write a few lines to the Corner. This is my first time, so I will not write much. I hav no dogs, dolls, or kittens to write about, as I am not a silly little boy. I go to school. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, physiology, and geography. My father is an Infidel. I hav three sisters and three brothers. I think I hav written about enough this time, so I will close. Yours truly, LESLIE NASON.

LOUP CITY, NEB., Jan. 27, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav got the mumps and cannot go to school, so I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner. I will be seven years old the 13th of February. I study reading, writing, and arithmetic. I like to hav mamma read the Children's Corner to me. Sometimes I learn a piece there to speak in school. I am too sleepy to write any more. HARRY BELL.

PATCH GROVE, Jan. 17, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines. I enjoy reading the Corner very much, and also looking at the pictures. I am a little girl about thirteen years old. I would like to belong to the Speak No Evil Society. I think it will be a good thing. I hope there will be a good many join. We liv on a farm about three miles from town. I will close for this time. I remain, Your friend, GLENNIE BAILEY.

[Glennie's name heads the list of members of our Speak No Evil Society. We hope to receive many more names, all of which will be printed in the Corner.—ED. C. C.]

GRANTFORK, ILL., Feb. 3, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you hav been so kind as to publish my first letter, I hope you will see fit to publish this too. I take a great delight in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and especially the Children's Corner. Through your valuable paper I received numerous papers on Freethought and liberty, and I hope Freethought and liberty will remain forever. I am reading the book of "Ingersoll's Forty-Three Lectures," and I think that every Freethinker, that can afford, ought to hav that book. I would like to correspond with Fred L. Hoffman, if he should happen to see this. I would like for him to reply through the Children's Corner whether he would like to correspond with me or not. Hoping that you will see fit to publish my letter, I remain,

Yours and the children's friend,
NICHOLAS S. KRAFT.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Poetry.

A Farmer's Soliloquy in the City.

Oh, giv me back the country, forest, field,
Where apple-blossoms their sweet fragrance yield,
Where buzzing insects hum a cheerful lay,
And joyous nature celebrates the day!

I hate the pent-up city's somber walls!
I hate the strife of editorial halls!
I hate the frantic rush for paltry gold—
The place where men for cash are bought and sold!

Oh, giv me back my farm—that little plot—
My prattling children and my rural cot;
The trees I planted, vines, and shrubs, and flowers,
The garden, warbling birds, and shady bowers.

I hate the tumult of the noisy throng,
Nocturnal revels and the midnight song!
I hate commercial contests, and the tricks
Of artful combinations, rings, and cliques!

Oh, giv me back my sturdy team and plow,
The lambs with snow-white wool, and gentle cow;
The little children that were wont to ride
"On papa's shoulder," with delight and pride.

I hate the watered milk and addled eggs!
I hate the pork and tainted mutton-legs!
Detest the "tinkered" butter, white-oak cheese,
The shriveled corn, and beans, and dried-up peas.

I was a prince among my flocks and herds;
The feathered tribes were glad and joyful birds
At my return. If absent but a day,
The cattle mooed and horses whinnied "Neigh."

But in the peopled city I'm alone,
At busy marts of traffic quite unknown!
No solitude is like the crowded street,
Where walls re-echo to the tramp of feet.

My faithful dog and cat, and cooing dove,
Which taught me lessons of paternal love,
Watched, till the twilight, round the cottage gate
For my return, where anxious children wait.

But mortals here may die and turn to dust
(As everyone, or soon or later, must),
Unknown, unmissed (whate'er may be their lot),
Unmourned, unwept, entombed, and, aye, forgot!

Oh, giv me back my rural cottage home,
Where thieves and pilfering cormorants never come!
Where sympathy and love each bosom swell,
And confidence in every creature dwells.

Restore the spots that my young manhood knew,
The rural sounds and scenes I loved to view;
Giv back the babbling brook, the pond and coves,
The wild old woods, the glens and shady groves.

Familiar friends and neighbors true and kind
(For in the city these we seldom find),
And requiem of zephyrs soft and low—
I ask no other paradise below.

Then, when they come to stretch me for the last
Beneath the coffin-lid, and all is past,
How cheering is the thought that 'round my grave,
Shall guileless children play, and tall grass wave—

Above my sleeping dust, that every spring
The birds shall teach their fledglings here to sing,
And age and youth shall pause and drop a tear
O'er ashes once by throbbing hearts held dear!

Seasons and times shall come and pass away;
Years shall revolve, and night succeed to day;
The sun in splendor shall go down and rise,
The silver moon shall journey through the skies—

Unnumbered millions liv and fade away;
Convulsions shake the earth; nations decay;
But naught shall more disturb that last repose,
Than summer evening sigh that shuts the rose!

Literature of the Day.

"THE SECRET OF THE EAST."

Among the writers for periodicals of the better class of late years whose papers hav attracted considerable attention, Felix L. Oswald is by no means the least conspicuous. Sometimes—speaking from general recollection—he has wandered into channels of thought where men with any sober, conservativ tendency hav hesitated—often refused—to follow. But in all cases, whether supporting positions held in common with a majority of thinkers, or making raids—if one may so describe them—into fields of thought which but yesterday were wholly forbidden, his writing has always been characterized by vigor, boldness—absolute fearlessness, indeed—a crisp clearness that leaves no possibility of mistaking the writer's meaning—but along with these characteristics a rather too combativ tendency—pugnacious, indeed—a way of stating things that, to a reader of an opposing bent of mind—the reader who, of all readers, needs to be persuaded, not antagonized—conveys an impression of aggressiv and extreme views. However clearly a cool reader may see the vigor and incisiv pungency of the style and treatment, when the probable effect on minds not in full accord with that of the writer is considered, there rises up in the mind, unbidden, that line in the old school-reader rhyme, "Vinegar never catches flies."

This kind of impression is left by reading his "Secret of the East," a duodecimo of one hundred and forty-two pages recently published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. The secondary title of the volume is, 'The Origin of the Christian Religion, and the Significance of Its Rise and Decline," and it is dedicated "to the memory of Jordanus Bruno." One need scarcely be told anything more to feel sure that the book is an attack on the Christian system of religion. But one gets from the title an idea of the truculent fierceness of the assault—an assault in which "no quarter" is asked or given.

The book begins with a brief but vivid word-picture of conditions at three periods of history, the culmination of the Greco-Roman civilization, the night of the Dark Ages, and the birth of modern civilization. The reason most commonly given for this latter is that it is the outgrowth of Christianity. This Professor Oswald denies, and presents seven objections, which, he says, cannot be overlooked, and to transcribe which will giv a fair idea of the book as to both style and significance. "1. That the rise of the Christian faith coincides with the sunset of the great south European civilization. 2. That the zenith of its power coincides with the midnight of medieval barbarism. 3. That the decline of its influence coincides with the sunrise of a north European civilization. 4. That all the principal victories of freedom and science hav been achieved in spite of the church, in spite of her utmost efforts to thwart or diminish their triumph; that only in consequence of the futility of these efforts the heresies of one age hav become the truisms of the next, so that Christianity has always marched in the rear of civilization. 5. That the exponents of the Christian dogmas persist in their hostility to the progress of a reform which they recognize, only by condescending to share the fruits of its former victories. 6. That the worse enemies of political and intellectual liberty were firm believers in the dogmas of the New Testament, while the direct or indirect repudiation of those dogmas has been the fundamental tenet of nearly every great thinker, scholar, or statesman, till the degree of Protestantism has become the chief test of intellectual sanity. 7. That among the contemporary nations of the Christian world the most skeptical are the most civilized, while the most orthodox are the most backward in freedom, industry, and general intelligence."

This voices the general position, and following this comes the reason why all this is true, in the author's opinion, which is in substance that Christianity is an offshoot of Buddhism, to fortify which the author compares the two systems from various points of view. Both, he says, are forms of pessimism, alike in countless matters of detail, but most essentially so in their disdain of this life and all its aspects, in what he calls their nature-hating character. In this connection, after pointing out some of the parallels between them, he says that to suppose Buddhism borrowed anything from Christianity, as some hav supposed, is as absurd as it would be to suppose that Homer took the idea of his great poem from the Iliad of Alexander Pope. The author charges, in rhetoric that is well-nigh lurid with invectiv, that Christianity has postponed the progress of the race at least fifteen hundred years, and he displays great wealth of learning in sustaining this theory, and also in arranging the parallelisms between it and Buddhism. Many of his pages are startling in their boldness, but the curious reader must be left to satisfy his curiosity from the book itself.

Two reflections will arise in the mind of the reader. One is that the author has omitted wholly to allude to a modern fact which leans toward supporting his theory of kinship before named between Buddhism and Christianity. That is the curious growth of late years of Buddhistic philosophy in the favor of Christian writers and thinkers. He does not fail to point out that while the two systems are like each other, both are utterly unlike any other religion, but he does not speak of the lately manifested tendency of the advanced philosophies of both to coalesce, the force of which, in his general view, it would seem should be obvious.

The other reflection is that his notion that Christianity has been, as regards the progress of the race, a wholly obstructiv force, does not at all fall in with prevailing theories of evolution. Not that there are not eddies and backward-flowing currents in the tidal movement called evolution, but that one of such magnitude and duration and force as he postulates of Christianity is too colossal for a mere eddy, and, if a necessary attendant of the great movement as a whole, it cannot be fairly stigmatized as obstructiv. There is much in this truculent and acrid indictment which deserves attention and respectful thought from "the champions of the faith," but if one stands outside and looks calmly on, it seems that the author does not, as he should, distinguish between the responsibility that attaches to the church as a system of human construction and that which attaches to the essence of the religion, whereon the ecclesiastical system has been built, as a motiv of human living. For all that, however, there is great force in his objection that Christianity has too much degraded the life that now is in favor of a dogmatic assumption to fix the form of a life that is to be. In any event, the book is one of singular boldness and force, and not at all one whose facts and arguments can be disposed of by the convenient, but generally meaningless, stigma of "blasphemy," to urge which is simply to beg the whole question.—Chicago Times.

House-Girls and House-Wives.

"Why can't we get good house help?"

The question still brews; girls still sit in sunless rooms sewing from dawn till midnight for sums less than sufficient to purchase the nourishing food they need; and girls continue to loudly declare they will drudge at any independent home work, no matter how small the pay, rather than submit to the tyrannies of the average mistress.

That's it; the duties of house service are too slavish. I do not wish to be understood that all ladies are tyrannical to their servants. I know of a few who make their home duties no more than are just, and I also know those ladies hav rarely any trouble about keeping good help.

A few years ago I heard a physician vituperating because girls insisted on ruining their health in factories, rather than share a comfortable home and help do the work in it. He wanted a girl in house badly. He rarely kept one longer than from six to ten months, though paying first-class wages. Why? I will explain. His wife was an amiable lady who would drive no one; his daughter, however, liked to be waited on; so did his son. Expecting wife and daughter to help some, he hired but the one girl. The result was that both his women shirked—they had too much fashionable twaddle to attend to—and all the work of a large house, and fastidious family, fell on the shoulders of one girl. I knew several of these girls—mostly daughters of independent farmers—and I also know they all went into his house in robust health, to quit, in less than a year, utterly broken down. One girl contracted consumption working there part of a winter season, and in less than two years from the day of her entrance—a healthy country lass of nineteen—into his family, she lay an emaciated corpse in her coffin.

Thousands of such families are crying out because they can't find good house-girls. They are not vicious people, but they shirk—sometimes unconsciously of the wrong of it—the obligations which especially belong to mistress and family, thrusting all on the "girl." General housework is the hardest life in the catalog; and I, for one, do not marvel that all sensible girls and women object to situations where they are more than liable to be driven to their death—driven, too, under purposed humiliations oftentimes.

Her room is poorest—hottest in summer, coldest in winter. The furnishings all poorest quality, even scanty in most families. Yet she must be the first one up in the morning, the last one to retire, as a rule. Sickness in the family or any want calls her from her bed at any hour. When the house is "red up" she must do the mending, the plain sewing, tend babies, chase into attic or cellar according to some whim of the mistress, who hates to quit a comfortable posture. Alas! I hav seen more of this house-girl slavery than I like to remember—seen it in the homes, too, of my most amiable friends. They would be shocked if told they were tyrannical with their girls. But they were, they are. As house service now stands, it is the custom to be tyrannical. Aud the custom is so old, it is hardly realized by anyone save the unhappy victim—who is flesh and blood, unfortunately. And let me say that until there are framed some laws or regulations respecting house service, good help will continue to be difficult to obtain.

The factory girl, shop girl, school-teacher, governess, etc., hav certain hours in which to labor; these over, the remaining hours are for their own independent use. The gaunt-eyed seamstress works no harder than the "hired girl," and feels comparativly free. The house-girl has no such sense. The twenty-four hours of every day of her servil existence are subject to the family employing her. She may not even speak to a member of the family in a familiar tone. She must serve humbly or expect an ignominious discharge. Now, what is the remedy for this state of affairs? To me it looks evident. Frame a code of laws for house-girls to observe, and you'll hav no further trouble in obtaining help. "Indefinit obligations" is not an inviting text, except it be to lovers. Who wants to serve anybody where the duties are "indefinit?" I would sooner tramp the streets and beg my bread. I would rather pick up chips by the bushel. I blame no girl for shunning the house service which represents an indefinit amount of work—varied work. Let me advance a plan for honest housewives to adopt who can afford but one or two servants at most. Write out a list of obligations for the servant. Demand them done inside of a certain number of hours—hours that will correspond with the duties and purposes of your establishment and shall be convenient for you. When these hours are worked out, giv a loose rein. Hav no more to say or do with the girl than as if she hired a room in your house and her work was independent of you. Honest, quiet conduct is all you need expect of one who hires a room of you. Yes, let her feel an independent lady after she has dutifully done the day's work you set her. And in the mean time do not shirk your obligations. They will be light. They should be methodical as well. When once you fall into these regular methods you will enjoy them—find it easier to observe than to neglect them. Let the children, also, hav their daily tasks about the house. See that they are executed, and do not let them fret the "girl" beyond the prescribed amount. All this is easily, gracefully accomplished, without lowering the dignity of mistressship. Respecting the rights of a servant is a long way from "serving the servant." A true lady will be just, keep up her dignity, and not infringe on her laws a hair's breadth. M. E. C. FARWELL.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

ARGUMENT BY Robert G. Ingersoll, IN THE TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS FOR "BLASPHEMY," AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. News of the Week.

RUSSIA continues to harass Bulgaria in every way short of declared war.

THE new high license law will reduce the number of saloons in Philadelphia from 6,000 to 2,500.

CHINA has now been forced to appropriate 2,000,000 taels to fortify its frontier against Christian Russia.

PORTIONS of the striking miners of Pennsylvania seem to be breaking ranks, conquered by starvation and cold.

THERE is a deplorable increase of drunkenness among Englishwomen, which is attributed to "grocers' licenses."

THE anti-foreign craze in France grows. The minister of agriculture has directed his subordinates to employ none but Frenchmen.

THE Indiana war monument, for which the legislature appropriated $200,000, to be used with other funds, is soon to be erected.

THE dynamite air gun, just perfected at Sandy Hook, is the latest boon produced by Christian civilization for a suffering humanity.

ELECTRICAL motors are to be introduced on the London underground railroads. A street railway company of St. Louis is also adopting electricity as a motiv power.

THERE is to be a grand international exhibition in Berlin next May of hunting trophies—of all sorts of game, ancient and modern arms, and implements used in hunting.

THE government of Morocco, at the suggestion of the Spanish government, has sent a special deputation to Rome to congratulate the pope on the occasion of his jubilee.

INVESTIGATORS of the advisability of the government's owning the railways declare the present profits to be enormous, and allege that people can be carried across the continent for less than $6 each.

A RECENT inquiry into the condition of the Vienna poor attending school discloses that 4,000 are suffering severely from hunger, many on the verge of starvation, and several now actually dying from inanition.

MAYOR HEWITT of New York in his message to the board of aldermen proposes that the city take charge of all its lines of transportation, which are now run in such a costly and unsatisfactory manner by corporations.

BROOKLYN has formed a powerful Evangelical Alliance, allied with the national Evangelical Alliance, with the object of reaching the non-church-going masses, studying social problems, and applying to their solution the principles of the gospel.

IT is reported that at last the Chinese representativ at Washington has announced himself in favor of the utter exclusion of Chinese from this country. Perhaps he has at length concluded from what he has seen that his countrymen can manage pretty well to dispense with Christendom.

AMONG the church rows of the week is one in the First Presbyterian church of Albany, N. Y., between cliques supporting and opposing the Rev. Mr. Nicholas. This gentleman is described as "quite wealthy on his wife's side, owning a steam yacht, and one of the most enthusiastic sportsmen in the state."

RUSSIA is endeavoring to establish extradition with the United States. Had the fathers of a hundred years ago received this proposal to arrest and return their co-patriots seeking to combat despotism in other lands, their answer is easily imagined; what the answer given to-day will be, is not to be looked forward to with as much confidence.

THE Irish societies of the Fenians and Invincibles met on the 13th at New York and decided that "Irish mothers must teach their children that it is no murder to kill English officials in Ireland; that all such coming there must be killed, and that it is no crime to apply the torch to English towns." The Irish societies are composed of Roman Catholics.

DURING the reign of Queen Victoria $100,000,000 has been paid to her, $25,000,000 to the rest of the royal family, and $50,000,000 more expended on residences, parks, packets, and other conveniences. There hav been supported in the higher offices of the public service 520 relations of dukes, 626 relations of marquises, 3,390 relations of earls, 963 relations of viscounts, 2,492 relations of barons, or 7,971 relations in all.

ONE OF MOSES'S FIRST MISTAKES.

And it came to pass, by the way in the inn, that the Lord met him, and sought to kill him.—Ex. iv, 24.

Odds and Ends.

THE clergyman who is vio'ently opposed to men working on Sunday looks through the papers on Monday, and feels sore and grievously offended if his sermon is not reviewed.

VISITING minister: "That's a fine rocking-horse you hav, my little man. Papa buy it?" Charley: "No; I won it at a lottery." Minister: "Ah, don't you know it's naughty to gamble or take chances?" Charley: "Why, it was at your own church fair, Mr. Broadbrim."

HE (with deep passion): "O Geraldine, my darling, I love you so—I love you so. Be mine, dearest, be mine." She (with suppressed emotion): "O Harold, you are so sudden; I must hav time to——" He (unguardedly): "Don't mention it, darling. Time is nothing; money's the thing, and you've got plenty."

GENTLEMAN: "What do you mean, Uncle Rastus, by going to my wife with the story that I said she must assist you? When you came to me to-day, I told you that charity began at home." Uncle Rastus: "Yes, sah, an' I s'posed yo' meant dat I was to go to Mrs. Smif. I may be ingnerunt, Mistah Smif, but I'se hones'; 'deed I is."

THAT big "bucket shop," the stock exchange,
Where options from hundreds to thousands range;
Where the pious deacon can join the roll
Without the least fear for his saintly soul;
And even the "dominie" takes a chance
When he gets a "tip" on a sure advance—
From one of his flock
Of a certain stock
That is going on like the hands of the clock—
Is trade, not a game.
Why, fie, for shame——!
These goody, goody ones gamble, man? Pshaw!
They hav the right, and they break no law.

But the wee little bucket shop over the way,
Where the clerk goes in for a lighter play—
Instead of thousands, a ten or a five
He puts on some stock to see it thrive—
Why, that is an outrage against all law!
Between thousands and tens there's a line to draw—
A moneyed line,
Which a big "combine"
Can draw where it pleases, and not too fine.
As when one O'Neil
Made his appeal—
Then later came Sharp with his dollars, and won,
While Jaehne went up like a shot from a gun.

The car-driver breaks every "Sabbath" day,
Yet the Christian rides to church that way;
That sinner, the cook, will roast the meat,
And the prayerful churchman will surely eat;
Except in church, it is wrong to sing,
And yet quite right for the bells to ring.
To preach and pray—
That must be play;
For, surely, no parson would work that day!
What is labor for one,
For another is none—
And it's queer such a difference there should be
Twixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee!

CLEOPATRA'S FAREWELL.

"We are dyeing Egypt—dyeing
Her a deep and ruddy hue—
'Tony, in thine arms thus lying,
Let me liv and die with you.

"'Tony, drink and let thy sorrow
Drown in floods of rosy wine;
Drink! we may be dead to-morrow—
I will take a pearl in mine.

"Drink again; fill up the glasses;
Drain the draught that fires the brain—
Water is for swine and asses—
Ho, there, slaves! bring more champagne."

Thus spake Cleo., radiant, dusky,
Egypt's regent, 'Tony's mash,
Suddenly her voice grew husky,
And her features pale as ash.

"'Tony, tell me," trembling spake she,
"Is yon serpent but for me?"
And she pointed to the snake she Saw, but 'Tony did not see.

"Are those rats? here on my forehead
Are those buzzing objects, flies?
Yonder frog? Oh, this is horrid!
Are these real or fantasies?

"Did the waters blue of Nilus,
Or my fevered, heated brain,
Yield that dreadful crocodilus?
That pink mouse! there it is again!

"'Tony, 'Tony, hasten hither;
Take the horrid beasts from hence!
Tell me quickly, truly, whether
I'm indeed bereft of sense?

"Nothing see'st thou? art quite certain?
Then my ailment is d. t.
Leave me, 'Tony; draw the curtain:
Send my poisoned asp to me.

. . . . . .

"I am dying, Egypt, dying
From the snakebite of an asp;
And my spirit, upward flying,
Bears away my final gasp.

"May it be a hint to 'Tony,
When he sees me lying dead,
Not to start out with a crony
To adorn the land with red!

"Is this death, this sudden freezing?
Must I die thus all alone?
'Tony! Egypt! hear me wheezing;
I am going—going—gone!"

Gems of Thought.

A MIRACLE is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience that can possibly be imagined. Why is it more than probable that all men must die; that lead cannot of itself remain suspended in the air; that fire consumes wood and is extinguished by water, unless it be that these events are found agreeable to the laws of nature and there is required a violation of these laws, or, in other words, a miracle, to prevent them? Nothing is esteemed a miracle if it ever happen in the common course of nature. It is no miracle that a man seemingly in good health should die on a sudden, because such a kind of death, though more unusual than any other, has yet been frequently observed to happen. But it is a miracle that a dead man should come to life, because that has never been observed in any age or country. There must, therefore, be a uniform experience against every miraculous event, otherwise the event would not merit that appellation. And as a uniform experience amounts to a proof, there is here a direct and full proof, from the nature of the fact, against the existence of any miracle; nor can such a proof be destroyed, or the miracle rendered credible, but by an opposit proof which is superior.—Hume's Essay on Miracles. [NOTE.—We hav in this extract the gist, the sum and substance, of Hume's celebrated "Essay on Miracles" and against it all the waves of controversy hav raged in vain for a hundred years. Dr. George Campbell was the first oppouent that appeared against the Essay; but for many years every young man of talent that aspired to a leading pulpit in Scotland, or to a bishopric in England, did not fail to pitch into Hume and to "let him hav it 'ot." The controversy has now practically ceased. Archbishop Trench is, I presume, the last of the giants that will hav a tilt with "honest David," and henceforth sucking curates and other small fry will hav the field to themselvs. The Essay is now to be had for ten cents, and I earnestly recommend it to anyone who wishes to test his appreciation of a logical argument. The Essay is one of the completest and most irrefragable pieces of argumentation that the English language can boast of, and I wish every young man to "read, chew, and thoroughly digest it."—Hylax.]

It isn't all in "bringing up,"
Let folks say what they will;
To silver-scour a pewter cup—
It will be pewter still;
For e'en old Solomon,
Who said, "Train up a child,"
If I mistake not, had a son
Proved rattle-brained and wild.

A man of mark who fain would pass
For lord of sea and land,
May hav the training of a son,
And bring him up full grand;
May giv him all the wealth of lore,
Of college and of school,
Yet, after all, make him no more
Than just a decent fool.

Another raised by penury,
Upon his bitter bread,
Whose road to knowledge is like that
That the good to heaven must tread;
He's got a spark of nature's light—
He'll fan it to a flame,
Till in its burning letters bright
The world may read his name.

If it were all in "bringing up,"
In counsel and restraint,
Some rascals had been honest men;
I'd been myself a saint.
Oh, it isn't all in "bringing up,"
Let folks say what they will;
Neglect may dim a silver cup—
It will be silver still.

JACOB had four wives—Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah—and the abundance of his wives, as well as of his children and cattle, is spoken of as proof of the divine favor, just as it would be to-day in Utah. The element of the crime of David [the man after God's own heart!], which Nathan rebuked, is not the polygamy, but the manners, in robbing Uriah of his wife, when Uriah, instead of an opulent flock of women, had only "one little ewe lamb." But it is "the Lord God of Israel" who says to David, "I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul, and I gave thee thy master's house and thy master's wives into thy bosom." It is needless to cite a single further text to prove that the God of the Old Testament directly sanctioned polygamy.—V. B. Denslow, LL.D.

LITTLE do men perceive what solitude is and how far it extendeth; for a crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal where there is no love.—Bacon's Essays.

IN the darkest hour through which a human being can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain: If there be no God and no future state, yet, even then, it is better to be generous than selfish, better to be brave than to be a coward.—F. W. Robertson.

TRUE, Sterling had his "religion" to seek and painfully shape together for himself, out of the abysses of conflicting disbelief and sham-belief and bedlam delusions now filling the world, as all men of reflection hav to do.—Carlyle.

THE superior worth of simplicity of life, the enervating and demoralizing effect of the trammels and hypocrisies of artificial society, are ideas which hav never been entirely absent from cultivated minds since Rousseau wrote; and they will in time produce their due effect, though at present needing to be asserted as much as ever, and to be asserted by deeds; for words, on this subject, hav nearly exhausted their power.—Mill's Liberty.

OUR PRESIDENT'S FLIRTATION.

Notes and Clippings.

An Anglican curate performed the marriage ceremony for a child eleven years old in Kensington, England, recently.

Minister (dining with the family): "You were a nice little boy in church this morning, Bobby. I noticed you kept very quiet and still." Bobby: "Yes, sir; I was afraid of waking pa up."

A New England church fair had as its prime attraction two side-shows, in one of which two young women were seen sawing wood, and in the other two young men piecing patchwork.

Thinking of Anthony Comstock, Life says: "Philadelphia may be slower than a lame snail in a molasses jug, but in the matter of throwing humbug moralists out of court the Quaker City is a marvel of celerity."

New York dame: "Who is at the door?" Daughter: "A strange gentleman wishes to see you. He says his name is Comstock." "Horrors! Your great-grandmother's illustrated Bible is on the parlor table. Hustle it to the dark closet."

A bill has been introduced into the Maryland legislature to compel all registered voters to cast their ballots at each election under penalty of a fine. The bill requires the registers to furnish a list of all the registered voters to the state's attorney in the cities and counties. It is made the duty of the judges of election to furnish after the election to the same officers a list of all persons who voted. Then the state's attorney is required to compare the two lists, and to summon before the criminal court all persons whose names were on the registry who had not voted, when, upon conviction of not having voted, they are liable to a fine of $5 or thirty days in jail.

A citizen of Winterville, Ga., having broken the knob of one of his doors, put on in its place a coffin handle which he happened to hav in the house. It is said that there is not a negro in the place that will open that door. If this is true, why wouldn't coffin handles work first-rate on smoke-house doors?

A murderer, in jail in England, wrote this letter to his relativs: "I am glad to tell you that I am more happy in my mind, and I felled mor comfortable in my sold, for I hav learn my duty towards my God, as wall as my neighbor. I am ever so much better since I been at Herford, and prais God for given me his help."

A farmer in Clinton county, Mo., who learned that the grand jury was trying to haul him up for working on Sunday, at once had his four sons summoned to appear before the jury as witnesses against him. He was fined $1 and costs, a total of $5. His sons' fees and mileage amounted to $2.60 each, a total of $10.40.

At Worcester sessions, England, last week, Magistrate Willis Bund passed sentence on a boy named Joseph Slatter, who was convicted of stealing three eggs, value threepence, of fourteen days' hard labor and five years' confinement in a reformatory. The boy bore a good character, and the jury who tried the case were scandalized, but the magistrate refused to change the sentence.

"And a little child shall lead them."—She declined for two or three nights to say her prayers. One night her papa covered his face with his hands, and said: "It makes papa feel sick to think Margaret won't say her prayers." "Papa feel sick?" "Yes, dear." "Papa better take casser (castor) oil." The subject of prayer was no longer discussed that night.

There are certain clergymen, says the Denison, Texas, Gazetteer, in every community who are continually preaching about the evils of dancing, and picturing in strong colors the immoralities that result (in their lively imaginations) from attendance upon the ballroom. But did you ever notice that you see in the newspapers mention of a dozen clerical scandals where you see one allusion to a woman who has gone wrong on account of a ballroom acquaintance? Bear this in mind in your daily reading and see if it is not so.

It appears from a search of the county records that about 1,800 divorces hav been granted in Hennepin county, Minnesota, since 1853. The first divorce granted was in 1855. Two divorces were granted in 1855. In 1856 there were none; in 1857, three; in 1858, eight; in 1859, two; in 1860, three; in 1861, six; in 1866, seventeen; and in 1871, seventeen. In 1886 there were one hundred and seven divorces, the most granted in any one year. There were one hundred and sixty divorces asked in 1887, and some of these cases are still pending. Of the whole number of divorces thirty-five per cent were by reason of cruel and inhuman treatment; twenty-five per cent for desertion; fifteen per cent for drunkenness; fifteen per cent for adultery, and ten per cent for other causes. About sixty per cent of these divorces were granted to Americans. On an average from year to year there has been a divorce for every ten marriages.

A Denver minister, in a sermon on the immorality of men, said: "I was in Pueblo when the police made a raid on the houses, and I never saw such a commotion as there was in the police court the next morning. There were Baptist deacons, Presbyterian deacons, and Methodist deacons in the gang. It seems that when night comes then mankind goes out to commit devilment." The Rocky Mountain Herald adds that if the houses of ill-repute in Denver were raided the same proportion of church officers would be found.

The solons who make the laws of the little commune near Mons, in Belgium, hav passed a law making it a serious offense to be palpably drunk in Belgium. These local wise men concluded that the law was too severe, and that they would content themselvs with making drunkards useful and diminishing drunkenness at the same time. When drunkards appear on the streets of this village the garde champetre takes them politely home. The next morning he goes to the houses of all those whom he had found drunk the night before, and presents to each a broom for sweeping the streets. The drunkard is allowed to choose between working for the commune for one day and being prosecuted for drunkenness. He invariably elects to sweep the streets. The village streets are in consequence marvelously clean, and the sweepers, after swallowing more than their natural share of dust, pass mental resolutions of sobriety, and keep them.

Communications.

The Old and the New.

Two antagonistic doctrins or theories in regard to man's origin, purpose on earth, and final destiny prevail in the world. The oldest of these rival philosophies may be appropriately termed the "blue Monday" or "black Friday" theology. It has afflicted mankind for hundreds of years. It is a melancholy doctrin, teaching that man is all wrong. It is Calvinism boiled down.

The idea that man is born into the world totally depraved is the corner-stone of Calvinism. It was this thought that made Paul say, "The carnal mind is enmity against God." John, too, was imbued with this soul-cramping notion when he said, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world."

It is a doctrin that runs up-stream; it "goes against the grain." It teaches that man has two natures, opposed to each other.

It teaches us to crucify all the nobler sentiments, all the finer feelings, all the purer affections, and liv a life of seclusion and asceticism.

It was this gloomy thought that dictated the unfeeling words, "Let the dead bury their dead." It is this moping, morbid theology that teaches us to forsake father and mother, wife and children, the pure love of the fireside, the sweet influence of home and kindred, to abjure every human pleasure, in order to please God.

It is a non-progressiv faith; it moves only in a circle. In the past, its greatest delight was to strangle the aspirations of science.

This narrow, selfish creed entered largely into the speculations of Plato. It is believed in by one-third of our race to-day, being the groundwork of Buddhism. Gautama taught his followers that all evil flows from men's desires; that to suppress their desires was to insure salvation.

This philosophy would hav us quench the spirit of aspiration, the yearning for knowledge, the love of discovery, the search after truth. It has rested on the face of improvement like a deadly incubus. It imprisoned a Galileo, and fettered a Columbus with chains in a felon's cell.

It tells us every natural impulse is evil; that we must hate what we ought to love, and love what we care nothing for.

Out of it has grown the unpleasant muddle of predestination, sanctification, and endless punishment of which Jonathan Edwards was the New England exponent. It is the basis of the doctrin of "conversion" in all Protestant churches to-day.

It portrays God as the sum of all good, but pictures man as a malignant viper.

According to this faith, the saints are "spirits of just men made perfect;" they were "sanctified" on earth, were purified by death, and become holier throughout the eons of eternity in heaven; while the sinner, having been given over to "a hardness of heart and reprobacy of mind" in life, increases in malignancy and cussedness forever in hell.

This religion makes a man a hypocrit, inasmuch as it makes him think he is better than his neighbor.

Its tenets are the wild vagaries of a past and ignorant age. It is founded on dreams.

Its ancient exemplars were steeped in crime and fraud. No offense known in the annals of man was too heinous for them to commit in order to propagate this "holy faith."

Its votaries sought the royal road to happiness, but finding none, were duped by a designing and salaried priesthood, who pretended to stand between land and sea and declare the mysteries of fate.

All the operations of nature were attributed by them to a supernatural power residing somewhere beyond the cognizance of human senses, which was called God.

All the operations of the human mind that were unusual were attributed to an origin in a world peopled with spirits who once lived on earth.

These views were the burden of Milton's "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained," which are a burden to any sensible man to read.

This old faith grew in the infancy of our race. It was of pagan origin; it was the stepping-stone to the Nirvana of the Buddhist heaven. It has come to us as a legacy from the past. It had its inception from the brain of man as he was emerging from an era of sensualism which was but a remove from the beast of the jungle.

Its original form was a kind of fetichism. Man began to observe the phenomena of nature. Sometimes the chase was successful, sometimes not.

Moonlight hunts were better than those of daylight; here originated the belief in the signs of the moon.

Man in his early simplicity and ignorance sought to appease or propitiate the powers or Gods of nature, and thus secure good seasons for hunting and fishing.

But as men learned more they began to discard many of their preconceived notions. The world was then thought to be flat. One old book taught that it had "four corners."

To these simple-minded denizens of forest and plain, this world of ours was the big thing; the stars were but to ornament the night as gems. The sun and his starry retinue revolved around the earth as a center every twenty-four hours as a kind of a panorama for them to gaze upon.

In process of time science made her advent. The mists of superstition and old notions began to fade before the dawning light.

Astronomy, with its mathematical eye, began to radiate its dazzling brilliancy on the morning darkness. It revealed to earth's worshipers a universe in space beyond this speck of a world. It extended men's knowledge of space, as geology increased their knowledge of time.

Chemistry demonstrated the wonderful precision of the assimilation and union of elements and substances. The original four elements, earth, air, fire, and water, were found to be inadequate to solve all the phenomena observed.

An increase of elements, or powers, required an increase of gods. Polytheism now appeared on the scene.

Motion was, to the old observers, the work, the effect, of an invisible agent—an action without a visible actor. The motion of the stars, the flowing of streams, the reverberating of thunder along heaven's archway, the moaning of the winds, were all supposed to be produced by invisible beings who could wing their way through space.

Thus originated the doctrin of a plurality of gods; every force observed was supposed to be a god.

Every planet had its ruling god, and the sun was the chief of the gods because he opened the portals of day and dispensed the ever-recurring change of seasons.

This led the way to the ancient Sabean or solar worship, traces of which are to be found even now in the Christian system. Example: Deity is from deus, traceable to dies, a day—a period of time measured by the sun.

Astrology was the forerunner of astronomy, and alchemy was merged into the nobler title of chemistry.

The alchemists sought for the origin of things in fire; hence fire worship.

Under the old régime it was supposed that Gautama was the creator of all things. He was triune: the creator, preserver, and redeemer of those who followed him.

Later on, a similar trinity, the God of all worlds, died on a cross in an obscure country to remove the stigma of depravity which he himself had placed on man's brow.

The reader can easily perceive the transition from the pagan to the Christian faith; the latter is a new but not an improved edition of the former.

Polytheism has been discarded in name, but not in fact. It is evident that the writers of the Christian's Bible believed in a plurality of Gods.

"Let us make man," is an example.

The pagan trinity accepted and adopted by Christians postulates a plurality of Gods as much as does the Hindoo theology or the Grecian Pantheon.

True, Christians claim their triad of Gods are one; in the same sense the Hindoos claim their thousand gods are one. Indeed, Hindoo worship is science beside Christian jargon, because the former prays only to one supreme ruler, while Christians pray indiscriminately, synonymously, and obfuscatedly to the father, the son, and the Holy Ghost.

All this worship is idolatry; the image is in the mind, if not carved out of wood or stone. The God of the Christian Bible is represented as possessing all the organs and passions of a man; in fact, a man-made God in every detail. Jesus Christ was a perfect embodiment of this idea; he was a visible representativ of the invisible—indeed, a demi-God, a man with God-like attributes, or a God with human organs and perceptions.

To summarize: the Christian's father God is invisible; the son was once visible, but now invisible; and the Holy Ghost was once visible in the form of a dove, but now invisible—defunct.

So with the other leading religions, Buddhism and Mohammedanism. Their personified gods, principles, or heroes, as you please to call them, were once incarnated in human form, but are now presiding beyond the clouds.

All these vagaries were prevalent up to a period less than three hundred years ago. They assumed a violent dogmatic form. Their devotees failed not to mete out dire punishment on the heads of all who dared to doubt the genuinness of their claim to infallible truth.

The feeble rays of science were struggling to penetrate and disperse the gloom of ignorance and superstition.

About this time Bruno with sublime enthusiasm consecrated his life to the cause of science. The church burnt him at the stake for daring to assert its truths. Copernicus, when about to die, lost all fear of persecution and published his discoveries, but the church suppressed his works. Even Luther, the so-called great Protestant reformer, called Copernicus a fool.

Galileo had the temerity to assert in the teeth of the church that the world moved. He paid the penalty by being thrust into a dungeon's gloom. Kepler, the founder of astronomy, was deposed from the university where he had so long been honored, because its teachings did not harmonize with Genesis. Bacon, Newton, Descartes, Laplace, Leibnitz, and Humboldt, all grand heroes of science, suffered from the venomed shafts of Christian ridicule hurled by an enraged priesthood.

But the Rubicon had been passed. Science had reared her pure white banner of blessing, nevermore to trail in the dust. The noble souls who suffered martyrdom at its shrine only added brilliancy to its increasing light. Every effort of the church to trail its fair flag in the dust only the more fully unfolded its starry folds higher aloft before the gaze of an unwilling but an astonished world. Up to this period, say the year A.D. 1600, Christendom literally clanked with the manacles and chains fastened on all who dared to say the religion of the church was not true, or who had the boldness to declare a scientific fact which did not harmonize with the teachings of the Bible. The Bible had been the only authority allowed as a guide to men's actions or faith. Church leaders were not only dogmatic, but fanatic. But men began to dare to think for themselvs, and to doubt the infallibility of the book and its self-styled expounders. These daring men were denounced and anathematized as Infidels. They cared not for church bulls when shorn of the power to punish on the rack or twist the thumbscrew. A new theory of man's origin and purpose on earth and final destiny began to prevail. In this new theory it is considered that man is equally good with all other things; that man is not naturally mean and vile, but is what circumstances, training, and education make him; that it is not wrong to desire wealth and the good-will of our fellows, or to aspire to honor or worldly fame.

The new theory teaches further that man needs no reversal of his natural motivs; that he was not made wrong-end foremost; that his heart is naturally in the right place; that he does not need any other.

According to the new, no dire calamity has been entailed by a blunder made thousands of years ago by an original pair dumped in Eden. According to it there is no royal road to happiness, and no standard or guide for conduct other, or better, than human experience.

And human experience teaches that there are a great many things in the world we naturally desire to do which are injurious, and which we cannot indulge in excessivly with impunity.

It teaches us that there are many fruits pleasing to the senses which turn to ashes and bitterness when eaten. It is experience only that teaches us to "let alone severely" this "Dead Sea fruit," and choose that which elevates and purifies without leaving the sting of sorrow behind.

Too much nectar cloys and satiates the appetite. Too much study overworks the brain. Too much exercise weakens, instead of strengthening, the muscles. Too much food is repulsiv to the stomach. Too much light injures the eye. Too much drink, even of cold water, floods and vitiates the natural processes of life.

In short, too much enjoyment of any kind destroys the capacity to enjoy.

Too much concentration of thought on one subject incapacitates the mind for study on any subject. Too much religious excitement is as harmful as the excessiv use of any other faculty or organ.

Experience teaches us that we may "overdo" the work necessary and throw life out of proportion, producing results contrary to those desired, or those which are best.

To this new channel of thought the world is indebted for the blaze of civilization which sheds its halo of blessing on the toiling masses. To it are we indebted for all the discoveries in science, the improvements in the arts, and elevation of ethical culture.

It is the star of hope to redeem the race from the thraldom of superstition, and sever the chains of ignorance which the religious intolerance and dogmatism of past ages hav entwined around the consciences of men.

It has been the beacon of progress to open nature's avenues of wealth and happiness; the unfailing fountain at which thirsty humanity could quench the desire for knowledge. Its mystic charm has led inventiv genius to explore unknown seas of thought and action. By its signal pioneer thinkers hav traversed the trackless waste of old ocean.

Its magical symbols, reduced to mechanical precision of rack and pinion, steam and lever, hav made all nations akin, and linked distant shores together with the golden chains of commerce. Its tendency is to fraternize the races. While it has given us the fearful Krupp gun instead of the war-club, it has also introduced the arbitrament of the pen instead of the sword. It offers the olive-branch of arbitration instead of the old-time policy that "might makes right."

It recognizes man as a rational being, instead of an incarnate devil. It recognizes nothing supernatural or divine, discarding all else but the universal economy of nature in the distribution of the affairs and fate of men.

No whimsical gods or fiendish devils enter the formula of the new and brighter dawn.

The propitiation of ghosts or angels is no longer deemed of as much importance as improved machinery and better methods of agriculture. We are impressed to liv in accordance with the laws of physiology and hygiene, instead of trying to comply with mythical, unmeaning rites. A positiv life of innocent enjoyment is taught, instead of a lethargic self-denial. Life is to be made worth living; death has been robbed of its terrors by classing the fear of eternal pain with other unknown problems. It is enough to prepare for living—death will take care of itself when the human clock has run down and we hav nothing else to do but to die.

The new common-sense view of death learns us not to dogmatize where we do not know. It teaches us that death, instead of being an accident entailed by original sin, is as much the result of law as birth, life, or any other phenomena of nature.

By the inspiration of the new view of the possibilities of life and motivs to human action, the puff of the locomotiv now breaks the silence of the mountain-side, and its whistle shrieks over the plain.

The sickle has been discarded for the automatic steel-twine binder. The ring of the scythe has given way to the rattle of the mower. The hickory flail of our boyhood days has been superseded by the steam traction thresher. White-winged hope now cheers where the dummies of despair once ruled men's hearts. We need not brood any more over whether man has a soul that will survive the body. It is enough to know that we are here now. Let other and future worlds, if there be such, take care of themselvs. If they do not or cannot, they will not compare favorably with this one.

Relegate all unsolvable problems to the unknown, and there let them rest.

What man can utilize of nature's mysteries, let him hasten to discover and apply. Let him not only chain the lightning and compel it to do his bidding, but learn more of its possibilities than ever before. Let him explore the distant regions of space with the lens of science, and learn of the laws and mathematical precision of the far-away orbs.

Man has already learned that the universe is governed by law, and not by a whimsical God. When he penetrates the bowels of the earth to secure the vast mineral wealth hoarded there, he learns of the stupendous changes which hav taken place in the earth's crust during the ages of the dim past.

This book givs the best account extant of man's origin and purpose on earth; but as to his final destiny, it is as silent as the grave.

Experience has taught man that the practice of virtue brings its own reward of joy, while the commission of crime entails pain and sorrow as naturally as the shadow follows the substance, and that correct living insures correct death.

The new era ushered in the printing-press with its countless pages of knowledge fluttering on the breeze to every shore and every clime. By its enlightening influence the world is becoming civilized. The angularities of men's passions are becoming rounded off by the constant interchange of ideas.

Superstition fades away into its original gloom before the radiant light of a free press. Its mission is world-wide, going forth conquering and to conquer the darkness of intolerance and bigotry.

No more will a designing priesthood be allowed to dictate to freemen what to think. True manhood is to be valued at its worth; woman is to be recognized and honored as never before.

Paul's simpering about woman's inferiority is now known to hav been pious cant. If anything in nature is divine, it is a pure, good woman.

The new era portends the ushering in of the true millennial times. The wide domain of nature is being surveyed with a scientific accuracy, instead of a "thus saith the Lord."

Nature is now known to hav evolved the universe as we behold it by inherent powers and processes of its own.

The Mosaic cosmogony has been relegated back to the ignorance of the infancy of the race. We hav outgrown the swaddling clothes of the past. The uncertain and vacillating notions of youth hav been discarded for the wisdom of riper years. The food of infants is not suitable pabulum for men and women. Away with the theological milk of babes; giv us the meat of knowledge that may be utilized.

The future is pregnant with the possibilities of nature's resources wrought upon by man's genius freed from fear.

Research, unhedged by priestly persecution, knows no bounds.

All hail to the grand era of science, of man and woman, when the world will be redeemed from the thraldom of the old bigotry and bathed in the new and pure light of universal mental liberty!

Stockton, Tenn. W. N. SIMPSON.

Mr. Denslow's Economy.

It is very evident that we need a radically new system of political economy. A Chicago sky-pilot, preaching against the Anarchists, recently made the remarkable admission that Adam Smith and Ricardo were the real founders of Anarchism, and Miss Gertrude B. Kelly judiciously suggested that since no better could be done, it might be well to dig up what remains of Smith and Ricardo and set their skulls on pikes as a warning to economists of the old school who may be unconsciously buttressing the foundations of Anarchistic Socialism. But I think now that I know a trick worth two of that. Let Mr. Van Buren Denslow leave off writing articles and compose a systematic treatis on this branch of science. There is no question that he will demolish the fundamental dogmas on which Marx and Proudhon built, but which Smith and Ricardo invented.

As an old-time disciple of Smith and Ricardo, I had been in the habit of supposing that a man's motiv in working was always the want of something which labor produces—such as food, clothes, shelter, whisky, cigars, preaching (hem!), books, music, fast horses, etc. I further learned from Smith and Ricardo that the object of every man in producing more than he needs of a particular commodity is to exchange the surplus for that of another man who is producing something else. And these misleaders of youth were also so perverse as to teach me that money (I do not mean coin, which from another point of view may be regarded as bullion and therefore a commodity, but coin and its representativs when used as money) was only a medium of exchange, sought after by no one but monomaniacs except as a means of more conveniently exchanging one's own commodities for another's.

We hav changed all that. Mr. Denslow, in his second paper on the "Distribution of Wealth," distinctly shows that no man works, or sells, with a view to getting anything else than money, so that the whole world would stop working and selling if everyone had enough money—say $800,000,000. Mr. Denslow clearly sees that this would be inconvenient for buyers and employers—that it would be disagreeable, even for people with $800,000,000 apiece, to abstain from food, go ragged, sleep in unmade beds, sit by cold hearths, and attend no more theaters, tabernacles, or Salvation shows; and only less awkward for each man to raise, kill, and cook his own ox, make his own clothes, shake up his own mattress, lug his own coal home on his back, and practice the can-can for his own amusement before the looking-glass. But he does not quite fully explain why all this should be any less disagreeable for the sellers and employees. The corner grocery man, suddenly become an eight-hundred millionaire, would, I should think, find it tiresome to lug his own coal on his back. Why, then, should he not deign to furnish the coal baron groceries on condition that the coal baron should furnish him coal? Bad habits, you know, are not eradicated in a moment. I am evidently backsliding into the heresies of Smith and Ricardo. To prevent such accidents for the future, I beseech Mr. Denslow to treat this question with fulness and precision. Either people do not desire food and clothes if they only hav money enough, and the king whose touch turned everything to gold should hav been a supremely happy man; or else, if Midas might hav starved to death with his mouth full of gold, then, no matter how rich people became, if they all became rich together, they would still produce and exchange. Then it is only the man who is rich, while others are poor, who can afford to loaf; and the unequal distribution of wealth, instead of causing industry and production, is the very thing which causes idleness and non-production. Let us hope Mr. Denslow will make this clearer in his coming work.

In his third paper Mr. Denslow lays the ax to another root of the existing political economy, viz., that all wealth is produced by labor. From the somewhat evident postulate that it is produced by production, he draws the rather questionable conclusion that it is produced primarily by previously existing capital. But how about the first wealth that ever was produced? Did the Lord supply the first man with the first capital? Or did the first man produce it, perhaps, by knocking over a bear and making a bow out of his bones and sinews? In the latter case it would seem as if labor did primarily produce all wealth. This is another point which we must wait for Mr. Denslow, in his forthcoming volume, to make clear.

Mr. Denslow, in the present imperfect state of my knowledge, appears to me too brash in his attacks on Socialists. Socialists, he says, get together and resolve that labor, "meaning the helpless laborer that works for wages," produces all wealth. Now, if there are any Socialists who say anything so absurd—if there is a Socialist in the world who denies that the projector, organizer, and manager of an enterprise is a laborer and a producer, I hope Mr. Denslow's book will not lack a portrait of this remarkable Socialist, or at least a pen-picture, giving his name, birthplace, the titles of his works and their publisher. For I solemnly declare that to me he is as unknown as the Abolitionist who wanted to marry a nigger, or the other famous Socialist who wants "all wealth equally divided."

But is not Mr. Denslow a little out in his relation of cause and effect, when he declares that the larger the accumulation of capital in a single hand, the lower the charge per cent it exacts of the community for its service? The sharper competition becomes in any particular line, the lower the charge per cent will be. But what is the aim of competition? Is it not monopoly? And is not monopoly obtained in theory and practice by the accumulation of as much capital as possible in a single hand? And are monopolies noted for rendering their services to the public at low rates? The obsolete school of Smith and Ricardo used to divide profits into wages of superintendence, assurance against loss, and interest. The profits of a very small capitalist, as a newsboy, which are high in proportion to his investment, are, they taught, mostly wages. As his investment increases, the ratio of profit to investment falls, because most of the wages are distributed among his employees. But the rate of interest does not fall in this way. It falls because the competition of capitalists compels them to undersell each other, which they are enabled to do by investing on a continually increasing scale. But if the final result of their competition be the victory of the biggest, resulting in monopoly, the public will get no benefit out of that.

Mr. Denslow's criticism on Henry George I shall not answer, but I wish George would. A battle between two such masters of sophistry would be better than a free seat in Plymouth church.

It is remarkable that Mr. Denslow begins to agree with my old masters, Smith and Ricardo, just where I begin to differ with them. They taught, as he does, that capital is acquired by what, with refreshing candor, he calls meanness. I always had a sneaking notion that it was acquired by invention. I do not expect Mr. Denslow to waste time in setting me right here; but I hope in his book he will select a happier instance than A. T. Stewart, whose wealth, he takes pains to show, was acquired by invention and not by "meanness." Neither will the work be any the worse for leaving out such historical misstatements as that Malthus had eleven children, and such confusions of thought as that the average increase of a whole people will not keep up with the means of subsistence because one man's wife does not go to breeding like a rabbit as soon as her husband grows rich.

But there is one point on which Mr. Denslow agrees with Smith and Ricardo, which it would be greatly to the advantage of his cause to hav cleared up. He says, and so do they, that production is induced by luxury. He says, and so do they, that capital is the mainspring of production, and that capital is acquired by parsimony. How can these propositions be made to pull in the same yoke? My own theory, which I believe to be original, that capital is acquired by invention, harmonizes perfectly with the idea that luxury increases wealth. But the idea that capital is amassed by parsimony, it appears to me, does not.

Mr. Denslow has doubtless plenty more new ideas. But to sum up those which he has published, it should be made clear (1) that people work for money, not for commodities; (2) that wealth is, or can possibly be, produced otherwise than by labor; (3) that competition does not eventuate in monopoly; (4) that capital can be produced by parsimony and at the same time by luxury. C. L. JAMES.

No Censorship of the Press.

From the New York Sun.

A bill is now in the hands of the post-office committee of the House of Representativs proposing to exclude from the mails any newspapers or periodicals in which any letter, circular, or writing concerning any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money or property by lot, chance, or hazard of any kind shall be published; and any person who shall deposit such paper or periodical in any post-office, or shall mail any letter or package containing such a paper or periodical, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand, or imprisoned for not less than thirty days nor more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

This is paternal government with a vengeance.

We respectfully invite the attention of any statesmen who may be engaged in the promotion of this sort of government to that provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of the press. Nowhere is authority lodged to establish a censorship. Yet the proposed bill will convert every postmaster into a censor of the press, and confer upon each one of these modest officers the right to examin any publication and to determin, without jury or trial, whether it is of the kind which seems suitable to him or not, and to admit to the mails or exclude therefrom any publication which does not meet with his approval.

Where and how does the Constitution confer the power to establish such a censorship; and why should the right of free printing thus be brought into question? If any newspaper is libelous, it can be dealt with by the courts of the state in which it is published. If any periodical is scandalous, its editors and publishers can be held to answer by the same courts. But such a power as this bill arrogates for the minor officials of the United States is not only contrary to the guarantees of the Constitution, but its creation would be unwise and unjustifiable.

Friends of Freedom.

In pursuance of the inquisitorial purposes and the meddlesome efforts of the Society for the Suppression of Vice to stamp out Freethought in this country, another Liberal paper has been singled out for its vengeance.

Messrs. Harman and Walker, editors of Lucifer, at Valley Falls, Kan., hav been indicted on a vague charge of "obscenity"—the same charge which Christian hypocrits raised against Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant in England, and D. M. Bennett, Dr. Foote, and hosts of other reformers in this country—"obscenity" being one of those mud-slinging epithets which is sure to frighten weak-kneed Liberals from the performance of their duty, and seemingly placing in a compromising attitude any who are compelled to defend themselvs against such an imputation.

It is impossible, I understand, for the defendants to ascertain from the indictment what the specific act is with which they are charged. They disclaim any intent to publish anything obscene and any knowledge that they hav done so. I hav been a reader of Lucifer for some years, and do not remember reading anything in that paper which could possibly be construed as obscene, although far from agreeing with its philosophy outside its advocacy of Freethought. Messrs. Harman and Walker hav been prominently known as able, earnest workers for the spread of Freethought, for the advancement of humanity, and hav ever valiantly opposed church and state encroachments. Their prominence has invited this attack of the suppressors, which is, without doubt, instigated by the same motivs and contemplates the same ulterior purposes that were so glaringly manifest in the prosecution of D. M. Bennett.

It is as apparent in this as it was in Bennett's case that the attack upon Messrs. Harman and Walker is a violation of the principle laid down in the eighth Demand of Liberalism, viz.: "That all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty."

I therefore urge upon all who hav at heart the stability of our institutions, the perpetuity of free speech, and the permanence of freedom in this country to aid, in the various ways open to them, in the defeat of the efforts to silence the editors of Lucifer by the slimy creature Comstock, under the pretense of "enforcing Christian morality."

The National Defense Association hav interested themselvs in this case, and are soliciting subscriptions and the activ aid of all workers.

You will be advancing the cause of progress if you can, in any way, coöperate with them, and I am confident you will make no mistake in so doing.

Romanism Reigns in Chicago Courts.

Another instance was added Saturday—if any additions were necessary—to prove the persistent, dangerous, and successful encroachments of the Romish church in the state of Illinois, and especially in Cook county, by Judge Tuthill's decision. During the previous week a bitter battle was waged in our county court on the question whether the state shall limit the Catholic church or the Romish church control the state.

County Attorney Bliss bravely blew a trumpet-blast of defiance and warning to machinations of the papal power in our midst, while priestly vampires hav secured another decision from a servil judge to sustain their raid on the county treasury and continue their brain-benumbing schemes, so that obedient children of the church can be manufactured at public expense.

For years the maintenance of "dependent" girls has been the bugbear of the county board, the former commissioners refusing to pay bills aggregating $19,585 rendered by the Chicago Industrial School for Girls, for the maintenance and tuition of females, under eighteen years, committed to its care by the county courts. And the present finance committee of the county board, prominent among whom is a good friend of the Chicago Secular Union, refused to recognize the bill submitted for payment and instructed the county attorney to resist their fraudulent claim. It was the clearest case of sectarian education that ever came into our courts, but in it the church of Rome has, for the time being, proved itself more powerful than the law, and, by the decision of this truckling judge, and the indifference of the people to the greatest of all educational questions, separation of church and state, is once more triumphant.

The pretense of the plaintiff was that, being duly incorporated by the general law of the state, the Industrial School provided homes and proper training for such girls as were committed to its custody so that they might become good and useful women, and that it admitted girls irrespectiv of "race, creed, or color;" that it was supported by voluntary contributions and by means of such moneys as it may be entitled to under the law.

How philanthropic and innocent, to be sure, especially when we find that the archbishop presided over its meeting of incorporation; that all of its nine incorporators were Catholics, and seven of them were nuns; that, having no buildings of its own, this mythical Chicago Industrial School simply transferred its girls to the keeping of St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum and the House of the Good Shepherd, both avowed Roman Catholic institutions! The president of the Chicago Industrial School for Girls, by some fortuitous circumstance, was also the mother superior of the House of the Good Shepherd, while the assistant superior, by the same strange coincidence, was also the recording secretary of the corporation that never corporated—that is, there is nothing to show that it ever did anything in a corporate capacity, except to draw pay from the county; that it was merely a Jesuitical trick to gain control of these girls and make the public pay for it. The most scandalous part of this Romish trickery was the habit the mother superior had of collecting all the young girls possible, sending them down to the county court, before a Catholic judge, and having them pronounced "dependents" committed to her care as president of the Industrial School, and by her placed in the House of the Good Shepherd, or the St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum, while she, volente deo, evades the express prohibitory clause of the state constitution which forbids public funds to be granted to "any educational institution of a sectarian character." The Industrial School, St. Joseph's Orphanage, and House of the Good Shepherd were emblematic of the holy trinity, I presume. What true reverence those frisky Chicago girls must feel for such a noble mission as the nuns are engaged in! What glimpses of heavenly light they must obtain while slowly intoning, in the solitude of their cells, the sacramental benediction, "Bella premunt hostitia!"

County Attorney Bliss ably extracted the milk from the cocoanut, by showing the absurdity of the claim that Mary Cleary, president of the Chicago Industrial School, employed herself as mother superior of the House of the Good Shepherd to look after the girls.

The incontrovertible facts which the county attorney proved I will briefly summarize: That this incorporation was but a mere scheme to evade the laws of the state; that the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Orphanage were controled by the Roman Catholic church; that the nine incorporators of the Industrial School were all Catholics, and seven of them nuns who had taken solemn vows and obligations to teach and preach the dogmas of the Catholic church to the exclusion of all other creeds; that these nuns were subject to the superior powers of their order and to the superior authorities of the Roman Catholic church; that the head of the Catholic church in Chicago presided at the incorporation meeting; that after the incorporation the Chicago Industrial School soon dropped out of sight and everything was done in the name of the order of the Good Shepherd; that the Industrial School exists only on paper since its incorporation in November, 1885; that it has no habitation, no place of abode, and it has installed itself in the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Orphanage, and thus came within the prohibitory clause of the statute; that from the manner in which this corporation had evaded the law these girls had been incarcerated illegally, the county courts having no more jurisdiction to commit those girls to the House of the Good Shepherd, and thus dump them on the taxpayers of the county, than it had to commit them to the county jail; from a legal point of view, their commitments were nothing but waste paper.

Notwithstanding this array of evidence, which Mr. Bliss proved beyond cavil, the court maintained that, the service having been rendered, the county was liable. Judge Tuthill's lengthy decision strikes one as the advertisment of a shameless political pettifogger rather than that of an upright, impartial jurist. He holds that:

> The mere fact that members of a particular church predominate in or constitute the entire membership of a corporation does not fix a sectarian character upon it. No more does the fact that the teacher of a district school belongs to a particular church make her school sectarian. Neither where there are several teachers will the fact that all are members of the same church make that school "sectarian." There is surely nothing of sectarianism in the character of the work for which this school was organized. . . . This corporation, having no house of its own, and no means with which to build one, as unquestionably, it seems to me, it might hav done with any private person, hotel, or boarding-house, made a contract with two other corporations existing by virtue of the laws of the state, having facilities to render the desired service which they undertook, and, in fact, hav temporarily housed, bedded, and clothed the children committed to its care. But the plaintiff itself, and no other, has, through its officers and teachers, constantly had actual legal charge of, taught, managed, and controled them.

In conclusion, the decision holds that, while the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum are connected with and exist under the sanction of the Roman Catholic church, their work is in no way sectarian. "O wise young judge!" Truly, "Dick" Tuthill, thou art much older in "tricks" than thy looks.

The mainspring of this exposé was possibly the work of the Chicago Secular Union, and as the secretary of the American Secular Union has had frequent interviews with a certain member of the finance committee, this battle for separation of church and state was precipitated, and the end is not yet, as the case will be carried to the supreme court.

In introducing the resolutions on the subject Sunday night, Dr. E. S. McLeod created no little merriment by his facetious allusions to the judicial "dicker" between the two "Dicks"—"Dick" Tuthill, who renders the decision to support "Dick" Prendergast, who is the papal tool who performs the commitment part of the program. After some discussion by Gen. M. M. Trumbull, Geo. Collins, and Dr. Henry, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That we commend the wise and patriotic action of County Attorney Bliss in the Industrial School suit, and trust that the higher courts will maintain the letter and spirit of our constitution, and the secular traditions of our government.

Resolved, That judges are placed in office to define and protect legal rights, not to perpetrate a wrong or shield a wrong-doer, and we condemn the action of Judge Tuthill in the Industrial School suit as a direct violation of a plain constitutional provision, and denounce his misinterpretation of law which diverts public money from legitimate governmental uses to the support of a religious sect.

Resolved, That the sentiments expressed in the foregoing resolutions are emphasized and intensified by the recollection of the manipulations of a disgraceful New York political ring in favor of a more disgraceful ecclesiastical machine, and it is pertinent to bear in mind that the beneficiary in New York, and the proposed beneficiary in Chicago, belong to the same church.

Resolved, That we believe that an ecclesiastical organization, or corporation, has an equal right with any other organization or corporation to acquire property, and an equal right to governmental protection of its property, and we further declare that an ecclesiastical organization, or corporation, has an equal right and duty with every other organization, or corporation, or individual possessor, to pay its just share by taxation for the protection which the state at present bestows as a charity.

The above resolutions were not published, and while a good many columns of the reports of the proceedings in court were given in the daily prints, not one dared to say anything editorially about this outrage on the taxpayers.

Liberals, is there not great need for, and a vast work before, the American Secular Union? Will you sustain it? Let us see.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Bacon, Shakspere, Ingersoll, and Others.

I was introduced to Colonel Ingersoll ten years ago by his brother, whom I knew as a member of Congress. In the course of conversation, Colonel Ingersoll alluded to Shakspere. "You mean Bacon," I playfully remarked. "No, I mean Shakspere," said he. Presently I put this question to him: "How do you account for the fact that no letter written by Shakspere was ever found?" The answer was: "I account for it by the great fire in London." I then dropped the subject, saying that I did not profess to be well informed on that question. And yet I had examined it sufficiently to be convinced that Shakspere was not the writer of the plays. Colonel Ingersoll, I know, still thinks otherwise, and I hav often said that I take more pleasure in differing with him than with any other human being. His answer to my question was, perhaps, the best that could be invented. The great fire in London was in 1666. Shakspere died at Stratford fifty years before the fire, and Bacon died in London forty years before it. We hav a multitude of Bacon's letters, but not one of Shakspere's!

Before Colonel Ingersoll left Washington, there was a celebration of Shakspere's birthday at his house, and he made a little speech, in which he said that Shakspere, as a poet, never had, and never would hav, his equal. On that question I am happy to differ with him, and I venture to say that, in my humble judgment, Shakspere, or whoever wrote the works attributed to him, was not superior, as a poet, to Robert G. Ingersoll. Not that I dispute the consensus of the competent as to the merits of Shakspere, or deny that he is the greatest of the world's poets up to our time; but I find in his works much that is dull and insipid, which I fail to find in any writing of Colonel Ingersoll. And I do not believe that the writer of Shakspere's plays could hav produced a funeral oration equal in poetic sentiment to one written by the Agnostic Ingersoll.

I knew the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly as a member of Congress from 1865 to 1869, when, as one of the corps of stenographers, I reported his speeches among the rest. Mr. Donnelly visited Washington in 1885, and I called on him to learn about the Bacon cipher. He opened his fac-simile of the folio of 1623, with pages full of his own marginal figures, and showed me enough to leave little doubt on my mind that there was a cipher there. He read to me Ben Jonson's lines opposit the title-page, praising the likeness of Shakspere,

> Wherein the Graver had a strife
> With Nature to out-doo the life, and as he read it he smiled, saying that it was evidently ironical. That likeness is so wretched that Shaksperean scholars are ashamed of it, and it has been called "an abominable libel on humanity."

In the same year, 1623, we first hear of the Shakspere bust on the monument at Stratford; and that is another libel on humanity. There is little resemblance between the picture and the bust. The engraved likeness would answer for an idiot, and the bust for a buffoon. No original of the engraving has ever been found, and what now passes for the likeness of Shakspere is an unauthenticated portrait, which has been painted over by a later hand, and bears little resemblance to the picture in the folio or the bust at Stratford.

Ben Jonson made another poetical contribution to the folio in praise of the author, in which occurs this line:

> And though thou hadst small Latine and lesse Greeke.

Jonson was an ardent admirer of Lord Bacon, and helped him translate some of his works into Latin. In enumerating sixteen of the greatest wits of his day, Jonson does not name Shakspere, but says of Bacon:

> It is he who hath filled up all numbers, and performed that in our tongue which may be compared or preferred to insolent Greece or haughty Rome.

Turn now to Jonson's tribute in the folio to the memory of the author of the plays, and you find the very words of his encomium on Bacon applied to Shakspere:

> Of all that insolent Greece or haughtie Rome
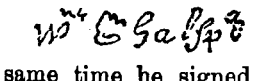
> Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.

In my interview with Mr. Donnelly I told him I had discovered sixteen or more short poems, published between 1589 and 1600, signed "Ignoto," all of which I had identified as Bacon's. But I said there was a mystery about one of them which required further light to explain. In Jaggard's publication of a collection of Shakspere's poems in 1599, entitled, "The Passionate Pilgrim," there was a song the first stanza of which was this:

> Liv with me and be my love,
> And we will all the pleasures prove
> That hills and valleys, dales and fields,
> And all the craggy mountains yields.

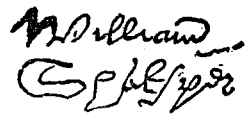
This song was published, with slight variation and two additional stanzas, in the next year, 1600, signed, "Chr. Marlowe;" and another detached stanza following the song in Jaggard's collection was enlarged to six stanzas in 1600 and signed, "Ignoto." Mr. Donnelly at once solved that mystery. He said: "I hav no doubt you will find that 'Ignoto' was Bacon, and that he wrote that song, which is partially repeated in the 'Merry Wives of Windsor' by Sir Hugh Evans. And in regard to its being credited to Marlowe, I hav discovered in the cipher this sentence:

> "Ever since Marlowe was killed,
> Shakspere has been my mask."



Marlowe was buried, as I afterward ascertained, June 1, 1593. In the same year Shakspere's first publication appeared, "Venus and Adonis," dedicated to the earl of Southampton, a youth of twenty. In the following year another poem, "Lucrece," was dedicated to the same young lord. Up to this time many of the Shakspere plays had been written and put upon the stage, and two or three were printed, all anonymous. Three or four more were printed during the next four years, but still anonymous, and it was not until 1598 that the authorship of any play was claimed by Shakspere. Then appeared "Richard II." and "Richard III.," both second editions, and "Love's Labor Lost," the only edition in Shakspere's lifetime—all three by "William Shakespeare." "Venus and Adonis" had gone through three editions, and "Lucrece" two; but "Henry IV.," second edition, in 1598 was still anonymous.

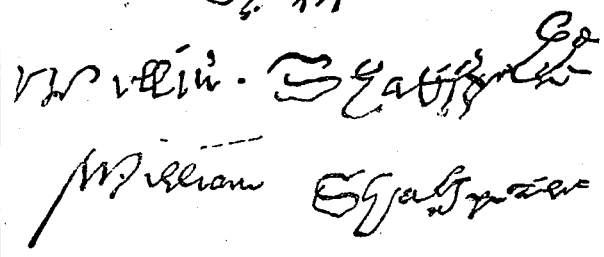
This was one year after the publication of Bacon's first acknowledged work, the "Essays," whose popularity has continued unabated down to this day. In the above-named play Mr. Donnelly first discovered the cipher, and in the two parts of "Henry IV." he finds his richest placers. The third edition of "Henry IV.," in 1599, has Shakspere's name on the title-page. But "Henry V." went through three editions, all anonymous, in Shakspere's lifetime. Likewise "Titus Andronicus," the first of the printed plays, the poorest, and yet one of the most popular, first edition, 1594; third, 1611. "Romeo and Juliet," first printed anonymously in 1597, was not credited to Shakspere until 1611, fifth edition; and when the folio of 1623 was published, being the first collection of the plays, eighteen of the thirty-seven had never before been printed, and nine never heard of.



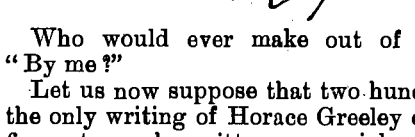
For two years past I hav had lying in my drawer a nearly completed manuscript of the parallel lives of Bacon and Shakspere, and therefore ought to know the essential facts of the two lives.

The evidence of Shakspere's being an actor is rather shadowy. Long after his death, somebody remembered seeing him act the part of Adam in "As You Like It," and the ghost in "Hamlet." There is no evidence that Shakspere ever communicated with the earl of Southampton beyond the printed dedications of the two poems. There is no evidence that Shakspere was a clerk or student in a law office, or that he was ever at school, or even that he ever learned to write.

In January, 1884, I first saw the engraved facsimiles of the only handwriting of Shakspere ever found—to wit, five autographs. The first was his signature to a mortgage, March 11, 1613, when he was nearly forty-nine years old. He wrote it thus:



About the same time he signed a deed growing out of the same transaction, dated March 10th, in this queer way:



In both these deeds his name was spelled repeatedly Shakespeare.

Three years later, when he made his will, he signed his name to three sheets of it successivly, as follows:

The reader will observe that in none of these five signatures is there an e in the first syllable or an a in the last, as the name had always been spelled in the printed plays. And in the will the name is twice written Shackspeare.

Prefixed to the last of the three signatures is this scrawl:

Who would ever make out of that the words "By me?"

Let us now suppose that two hundred years hence the only writing of Horace Greeley extant should be five autographs written successivly, as follows:

1. H. Grele, with an a over the final e.
2. Horace written over Grely.
3. The same, three years later.
4. Hor. Grel, ending with a frightful scrawl.
5. Horace Grely, tolerably plain.

But more; Greeley, like Shakspere, had two daughters and a son. Both sons died in childhood, but the daughters grew up. Now, suppose it should appear that one of Greeley's daughters had to make her mark, and the other was so illiterate that she insisted that certain writing in a book was by her deceased husband, when it was apparent to anybody who knew the man's handwriting that it was not his. Such was the fact in regard to Shakspere's two daughters.

But enough. It is not easy in our time to realize how perilous in the past it has been to be known as an author, except as a rigid conservativ. Bacon, Voltaire, and Paine were wise in doing much, if not most, of their work in secret. Fifty years ago our Ingersoll could not hav dared to speak as he now does; and had he lived in the days of John Calvin and ventured to speak half as boldly as he now does, he would probably hav been burnt at the stake like Servetus.

WILLIAM HENRY BURR.

Men, Women, and Spiritualism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It has been my pleasure of late to attend the Sunday afternoon meetings of the Brooklyn (E. D.) Philosophical Society, held at a hall on South Eighth street, near Bedford avenue. It has also been my pleasure to listen to a course of three lectures on the Hebrew Testament, by Thaddeus B. Wakeman, a cultured and scholarly Liberal, together with the general debate which followed each lecture. The result of these lectures was to set aside all historical data for much that is given in the Bible as having occurred; to deny that such a person as Jesus of Nazareth ever lived, and to attribute such a character to the gradual growth in the minds of men of the teachings of various races and ages; to offer in place of the Bible a collection of books made up of Bain's "Logic" as the foundation, then upon that astronomy, geology, chemistry, physics, and social science—in fact, to put exact science in place of revealed religion—and, finally, to approach the grave, which he symbolized as a great hole with the sides and bottom knocked out, through which he peered in vain to see anything beyond. In reaching such a point and in peering through such a hole, he stands where learning has brought many a man; and he stands upon very firm ground to take an honest look into that vast spiritual field of research which lies beyond the hole—beyond the grave. Such a mind wants facts—facts which go gradually to prove the existence of a hereafter, and to build up in that mind a knowledge of what is seemingly unreal, because unseen.

Woman, having the intuitiv faculty larger than man, is more closely allied to this invisible world, and more readily accepts on faith what he takes much more time to accept through reason. Woman jumps at it, drinks it in, and accepts it as a lien on immortality, but man must understand it. Spiritualism, now nearly forty years old since its modern inception, is building up gradually the only real spiritual science that shall serve as a crown or capstone for all science. It is the "stone that the builders rejected" over and over again, but this time it has come to stay; for its mediums, being permitted to liv in this enlightened age, will keep furnishing facts until an exact science of spiritual things has been deduced therefrom.

With the physical facts go the inspired teachings of our public speakers, until, between the two, we stand upon an eminence where we view two worlds, as it were, spread out before our gaze—a material and a spiritual.

To all who, having reached this hole where Liberalism leaves them, desire to peer through and beyond into the great unknown, we say, "Knock and it shall be opened unto you," "Seek and ye shall find," "Ask and ye shall receive."

It may be only a tiny rap—a Hydesville rap—that shall answer you at first; but that much, little as it seems, has satisfied a great many, and led them from the letter A of our Spiritual alphabet to that of Z, which is full-form materialization, where the so-called dead stand before you and you are in the presence of a denizen of another world—a world of spirit that lies about you and begins where this leaves off—a world that lies so close that it touches this, and embraces it in a love that strives only to lift it higher in the scale of human progress.

"Eyes ye hav, but ye see not; ears ye hav, but ye hear not." Only those fine, sensitiv souls whose interior powers are unfolded beyond the power of matter to keep them in can see and hear the things of the spirit. Others must hav hard facts to convince and satisfy them, which we offer.

The cause of Spiritualism is growing in power and in character. Out from a dark background—out from a Nazareth of dishonesty and immorality—is coming the light that shall illumin the world, and aid largely in harmonizing all religions.

A Philosophical Observation.

From San Francisco Freethought.

Men who hav been unable to raise themselvs to a satisfactory distinction by efforts in their own behalf may often gain a temporary notoriety by defaming somebody who is more successful. In this way they make themselvs known to many people who would not otherwise be aware of their existence.

UNDER the voluntary morning prayer and chapel system the attendance of the Harvard students has fallen from eight or nine hundred to one hundred and fifty or less. A few goody-good students are now beseeching their comrades to come up and be saved, but the unregenerate young sinners mock them with scorn.

ARGUING for the repeal of the Saturday half-holiday bill last week, Senator Vedder quoted from a Bible he had sent for to refresh his memory, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work," and said that the Saturday half-holiday was in opposition to the divine command. If this is the best the senator can do, but little attention will be paid to him. The people are not much afraid of divinity.

AMONG the petitions introduced in the United States Senate this session is one presented by Senator Ingalls by request, upon which was printed this statement: "Believing the charges alleged against the priesthood because of the practice of auricular confession are true and deserve investigation, we do humbly petition your august body to appoint a commission having full power to demand the production of persons and papers competent in evidence to declare whether such confessional is calculated to pollute the morals of the people and undermine the foundations of our republican institutions." The Catholics allege that this is an attempt to use the Senate to advertise Fulton's book, "Why Priests Should Wed."

THE Presbyterians of this city hav drawn up the following document to be presented to the legislature of this state:

"First: That our national vigor and permanence are guaranteed only by a religiously grounded morality.

"Second: That, without claiming it to be the province of the state to teach religion for religion's sake, the general assembly should yet confess its belief that, in order to the state's own interest, there should be in every school maintained by the state the inculcation of such principles of dependence upon God and application to him as are essential to sound learning, safe character, and wholesome citizenship.

"Third: That the general assembly should encourage the appointment of such teachers as shall be in accord with the spirit of the second section of this overture, and bring the entire weight of its influence to bear against whatever statement or suggestion shall antagonize the claims of the God upon whom we depend and to whom we owe application.

"Fourth: That the general assembly should instruct its ministers publicly to recognize the difficulties in which the case is involved, and to bring those difficulties to bear as an argument for more thorough intelligence and faithful religious instruction on the part of the family, Sabbath-school, and church."

The Presbyterians hav queer ideas of the province of the general assembly if they think it can interfere with the family, the Sunday-school, and the church.

Is That Spirit We Call God a Tangible Personal Being?

Christian leading thinkers universally consider God as the great first cause of all created things, himself being self-existent from all eternity of the past to all eternity of the future.

According to the Bible of the Hebrews, or the Mosaic dispensation, "God is the same yesterday, today, and forever, without a shadow of turning."

In all the writing of the Old and New Testaments God is viewed as having identity, personality, or individuality. By all professed Christians he is spoken of as "our father in heaven," and prayed to in full belief of his personality. Favors are asked of God in the same manner and faith in which children ask favors of their parents.

Yet one of the great attributes ascribed to God's fulness of perfection is omnipresence. But if, as is universally believed by all educated, reasoning minds of men, there is no possible limitation to space, and throughout all space millions of worlds exist like unto our planetary system of sun, moon, earth, etc.—if God be everywhere present throughout all the incomprehensible expanse of the universe as a whole, how can that diffusiv spirit called God exist as an identical personality? That what is called God is a spirit having personal identity we see was taught by Jesus Christ, who taught that he, or it, "must be worshiped in spirit and in truth;" yet Jesus himself did not teach men that said spirit was omnipresent, though he declared himself to be the father when he said to Philip, "If ye hav seen me ye hav seen the father also." Yet Jesus evidently considered himself as an omnipresent personality, or rather, spirit, since he did teach that "where two or three were gathered together in his name, there would he be in their midst." It is an indisputable fact that throughout all Christendom it must often occur that not only one company of two or three are together in his name, but several thousands of twos and threes are gathered together in all Christian communities throughout the nations where his church exists, and it is therefore evident that he, Jesus Christ, is either a diffusiv spirit or else his own saying is false. One of his disciples declares that "as he [Jesus] is, so are ye," meaning all those who follow him; therefore if he is God, one with the father, as he said to Philip, and they who truly follow him are "as he is," then they must be Gods also. If God, then omnipresent! A high claim indeed, to be everywhere present, in and through everything. But such must even be the case; every true follower of Jesus must either become a God by becoming a genuin disciple of Jesus, else the New Testament doctrins are, so far, false.

If his followers do the works that he did, and even "greater," as he declared they should do, then can it be wrong to claim to be his equal? If his equal, then, as he claims to be one with the father God, it logically follows that, as before stated, all his true disciples also are real Gods! But was Jesus Christ really one with the divine spirit, called God? In one instance he claims to be God, by declaring that they who had seen him had seen the father God also; and adding further, "I and the father am one." Yet, strange it is that in another place in the Testament he plainly declares thus, "I come not to do my own will, but the will of him [God] who sent me!" Here let me ask, how can a personality, claiming to be one with God, hav a will of his own? It is beyond the scope of my reason to reconcile such flat contradiction of terms as coming from any truly intelligent being. Evolution of thought and the spirit of progress do, in my estimation, set all such incongruities of talk aside, while I conclude there is no personal God, but only a universal, all-pervading spirit, or directing power, in and through all nature, from the smallest pebble on the seashore to the most mighty worlds, or globes, in the universe of space.

This plain and simple belief sets aside the greater part, if not the entire category, of Bible myths, false doctrins, contradictions, etc., about a definit God, or thinking creator, who, as the Bible says, made this earth, and the great central luminary of our solar system, as well as all the stars, in six days, and then became so exhausted and tired out as to stand still, or sit down, or, it may be, lie down all day Sunday, and, perhaps, be amazed at his own handiworks, for he declared that all the great works he had accompliched, or made, were very good—not even excepting the woman, which superior creature he found himself obliged to make out of a bone on the seventh day, or Sunday, so that he, the myth God, was somewhat broken of his rest after all.

But here I would ask: How did God come to know just how to make a helpmeet for the man Adam, and build her so nearly like man, and yet in some respects quite different? It appears that he had no borrowed pattern to follow, so he was pleased to follow his own self-existing pattern or image. Now it came to pass that when God had got all ready to make man, as the Mosaic Bible says, he spoke to some God or body and said, "Let us make man in our image." I suppose that whoever he spoke to readily assented to the grand proposition, though the Mosaic account of it is quite mum on this point; at all events, God rolled up his sleeves, we will suppose, and at it he went with a will equal to the purpose, and the result was, man was made there and then. Yes, suddenly made in a full-grown, "very good" condition. But note this thing—according to the Bible account, man was not perfect after all, nor could he be complete until he had a "helpmeet," who was, as we believe, a creature of vital importance in the economy of human life; said completion of man being a female, who, as well as Adam, was made after the likeness, or "in the image, of God," who also surely must be both male and female, or else man was not made as God intended, i. e., in the image of God.

Who did God speak to when he said, "Let us make man?" And then after man was made, God declared that he was made in God's image, male and female, as above noted. It is evident that the Mosaic or Bible God was not a Darwinian, evoluting man up to the "very good" condition in which we find him when placed in the garden of Eden, since according to Bible lore it did not take his maker over forty-eight hours to make both him and Eve. In fact, it must not hav taken even that short space of time, because we read that during said time God discovered himself to be tired and took a rest. Now, according to Professor Darwin's theory—not the infallible, so-called, Bible God—through long and sure-working decades of nature man has been evoluted from a very low, crude, and ignorant state of both animal and mental life to his present high degree of perfection, and still we see there is not only great need, but in answer to that need a true possibility, of onward and upward progress in the line of perfection.

I hav no doubt but that every man, woman, and child who at this time are sailing under the great showy flag of the various Christian denominations—though nine-tenths of them are infidel to their profession—will brand me as being an Infidel, and very presumptuous to express myself so frankly in regard to their infallible Bible God, and to the great works ascribed to him. But here let me state that so long as it can be shown by their works that more than nine-tenths of those who profess to belong to the Christian church are absolutely infidel to their profession, I opine they hav no stones to throw at me so long as I liv up to what I profess to believe is true and good both in the religion of science and healthy morality, acknowledging the equity and justice of the great Golden Rule—to do unto others in all things as I would hav others do unto me.

Said Golden Rule was a spontaneous outbirth of the unerring religion of nature's moral science or law of right against wrong, hundreds, if not thousands, of years before the historical birth of Jesus of Nazareth. And there never existed, nor can there ever exist, any religion worth a straw that does not accept and teach its members to liv up faithfully to said Golden Rule. All I ask of those who are infidel to their high church or Christian profession is not to pass judgment on me as being an Infidel until they hav first carefully, honestly, and truthfully looked into their own hearts, scanning the secret motiv or propelling power of their every action, word, and thought. When this is sincerely done, I think there will be very few who will feel at liberty to brand me or any other progressiv Liberal thinker as Infidel. So long as a man or woman professes to believe in any code of religious laws and usages and does liv up to the same fully and conscientiously, such person cannot truthfully be called an Infidel, whether he claims to be a Christian, a Mohammedan, or a Naturalist, Liberalist, or Freethinker. The law of love teaches man that "to liv and let liv" is right; that all hav or may hav opinions and beliefs of their own, and that equal rights and privileges of enjoying the same are as dear, and as highly cherished, and as valuable to one man as to another.

If a Christian professor discovers any good works, of whatever name or nature, in his non-Christian-professing brother or neighbor, he will, if he be governed by the Golden Rule, be just as ready to extend a hand, a look, or word of approval as though said brother, or neighbor, was a member of the same confraternity of brotherhood with himself. Anything short of that Liberality bespeaks clannishness, egotism, snobbery, and bigotry.

Christians hav much to say about the "great day of judgment;" and about the great judge of both the living and the dead, sitting on a great white throne, before whose august being souls shall be judged of all the deeds done in the body. Such a belief may hav answered the purpose to compel many to do right through fear of being sent pell-mell down the smoky lane to sheol! But let me be joined to that better company of souls who do right through the principle of "it is right to do right," and an inbred love of heaven instead of a fear of hell, or sheol.

The truth is, if my belief is correct, no soul of man now living, none that ever did liv in humanity's form, and none that ever will be so encased, will ever be arraigned in the courts of any spiritual tribunal, only the unerring judge of self-consciousness. Before that seat, or in that seat, every soul of man will feel obliged to arraign himself for approval of good works, and for self-condemnation of evil works, if of the latter he finds he is guilty.

A great deal is said about heaven and hell, the two opposing conditions. But few people, comparativly speaking, understand the real meaning of the words. I contend, as do many others, that heaven is not some far-off, identical, local place where spirits and angels only dwell. Oh, no; not anything of that sort. Heaven is a condition, ever within and surrounding that soul of man, whether in the mortal body or out of it, whose good works develop and deserve it. On the other hand, every man may, and often does, by evil, wicked works develop in and around his own soul the fearful condition called hell. Thus we find that thousands of people whose souls or spirits are partly good and partly evil are partly in heaven and partly in hell at the same time.

With such, the disposition to do right and the disposition to do wrong are at war with each other, each striving for the mastery; nor can complete heaven ever be realized by any soul until the good principle gains a full and final victory over every evil disposition with which it may hav to contend.

Every soul or spirit has a right to seek help of any other soul or spirit in whom it can place confidence as an ally to help it fight its natural enemy. And any sympathetic soul or spirit will, or does, hav a perfect right to assist an applicant in said warfare.

Not any judge of an ecclesiastical church or society, nor yet any number of such non infallible functionaries, can be accepted by any non-infallible self to lead directly, or even counsel me what to do or what not to do, as looking to the weal or woe of present and future states of existence, save by my individual consent or request. I must be my own judge, even though I may first seek the counsel of others, as to what I shall do to secure the greatest amount of happiness I may be capable of enjoying here and hereafter.* Yet, after all, though I may hav found the counsel of other men to coincide with my own sense of right, experience will, in many ways, teach me that a wrong course of action has been leading away from the goal sought, rather than to it.

If the race for happiness were limited to the short space of time allotted to the life of man in his earthly form, there might be a great temptation to "throw up the sponge," and despair of ever realizing the coveted prize; but since the treasure, and the possibility of winning it, is not confined to our transitory passage through time, but is to be carried forward to a future, and, as I believe, a more exalted state of existence, it ought to inspire every soul of man to persevere, and never for a moment succumb to an embarrassing, futil spirit of discouragement. But if we fail in our attempts to secure perfect happiness in one, two, three, yes, in a thousand attempts, let us foster "hope, which keeps the heart whole," and "try, try again," until victory shall reward our untiring struggles, and the great desire of our souls, true happiness, be ours.

E. D. Blakeman.

*Such application for help will usually be made by a weaker to a stronger power; and in that light it may be considered prayer, but it is praying to identified beings, rather than to an all-pervading force that is ever omnipresent in and through everything, "expanded through all immensity of space, yet undivided," as Pope has it.

Requested to Leave Home.

An oily request to expatriate one's self from home, friends, and associates, by a learned and polite gentleman, is quite an improvement on the brusque orders of banishment, torture, and death so often resorted to in those days of papal supremacy when faith was the star of hope and pretense the bulwark of safety. To appreciate is but to experience the ban.

A consanguineous spirit of that old custom has fallen upon us. It may be observed peeping through that veil of fulsome flattery in a communication of ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds on his Western tour in the Truth Seeker issue of January 21st, in which he says: "Beyond question, if he [G. H. Walser] would absent himself from Liberal for a few years, he would be better appreciated, the citizens would become more self-reliant, and on his return he would be surprised and delighted at the progress the town had made."

For seven long years, with the exception of one year on business in Kansas, we hav devoted our time, best energies, and thousands of dollars in trying to build up the cause of Liberalism in this vicinity. That we hav been faithful to the task we hope no one will cast the shadow of a doubt. That we hav made mistakes is not to be denied nor wondered at. Who would not? To associate together a town of Atheists, Deists, Materialists, Agnostics, Christian Spiritualists and Atheistical Spiritualists, Republicans, Democrats, and Anarchists, and not get damned black and blue, is to signify that you are a cipher and not worth a damn. I hav succeeded admirably in the damns.

The work of constructiv Liberalism is much more difficult than the scavenger work of throwing mud at God, the Bible, and religion. Anyone can throw a stone at an old carcass; but to take an old broken-down crowbait of an animal and resuscitate him into a spiritual charger is a different work.

Our belief that Liberalism did not point to a lower standard of manhood, as contended by the church, and that it was susceptible of constructiv work to demonstrate these facts and build a school where the young mind could be led out into a field of intellectual development, without the hindering veil of any creed, sect, or ism, induced us, with a few friends, to penetrate in this then heart of a prairie, undisturbed save by the breath of heaven and now and then the hungry howl of some prowling wolf, to plant the standard of Freethought, that there might be one place on earth where mental and moral worth, not faith, should be the measure of man. Now how changed! Those broad prairies hav been subdued, the haunts of the wolf supplanted by lowing herds and fields of golden grain; farms hav been opened, orchards planted, homes made happy, and a Freethought town of eight hundred people challenging the world for a better example of noble manhood than is to be found here.

The honor of this grand success is not due to us, but to those brave men and women who came and endured privations and difficulties that the enterprise might succeed—we doing what little we could to assist. Whatever may befall us, our heart will ever go back, with grateful memory and love, to those broad-minded, pure-thinking, noble men and women who joined fortunes, for weal or woe, with us here.

We hoped to see a Freethought community, where we could spend our declining days among a people congenial to one who loves peace, order and harmony. But that is not to be. We are told by a sagacious gentleman that it would be better that we "absent ourself for a few years." Of course, his judgment should be respected—not that he is personally acquainted with all the surroundings, but because his acute discernment enables his broad and comprehensiv mind to drink in at a glance the whole situation, which has taken others years to acquire, and at once prescribe duties to citizens here. We hav had many such before, but they were not so learned and so recently from the church as this gentleman, and we paid but little attention to them. In fact, there is not an Anarchist in town that has any use for us, unless they want a favor or something to eat. We hav always found advice a very plentiful commodity—in fact, it is so abundant that some can not husband it all, and hav hit upon the expedient of giving the surplus away. It is not difficult to find men by the score who can tell how to make Liberal grow into a grand metropolis without poverty, want, or labor, where the men will all be rich, women wingless angels, and the babies double-dimpled. They know how to run the government, abolish taxes, get free rent, free trade, big wages, little work; how to destroy enterprises, tear down monopolies, and enjoy their benefits at the same time. In short, they know how to do everything except to make a decent living for themselvs and families. We received much church opposition. There seemed to be not a slander, falsehood, or epithet of abuse known to the language but what has been plied to us in some form by the unscrupulous of the church people. This we could endure, but when our friends, who ought to hav assisted us, take up the warfare with renewed vigor and fury, we feel quite willing to quit the work and yield the field to wiser and more competent heads. In giving up the work, we will ask but one favor: In your criticisms, do us justice, by admitting that "we did our level best."

We hav spent our money in this work. We can not well "absent" ourself, and go out upon the cold charities of the world, penniless and homeless, with our family. We hope Mr. Reynolds will buy our property, or assist us in disposing of it, which we will gladly sell at thirty per cent off the present cash value. Now that we will leave the work, we hope Mr. Reynolds will take it up where we quit off, that we may "return in a few years, and be surprised and delighted at the progress the town has made." We were absent last year, and must confess we were very much surprised on our return. Instead of a temperance town, a licensed saloon was in full blast, and the keeper a member of the town council. We frankly confess that we never believed that Liberalism looked well through the eyes of rum, Anarchy, and their concomitants, and in this lies our offending.

We believe in that Liberalism which ennobles the mind, subdues the passions, softens the heart, and awakens a chord of sympathy through the flow of humanity; that Liberalism that glows on the cheek, laughs in the eyes, lingers on the lips, and livs in the heart; that Liberalism that rests on justice, pleads through mercy, blossoms in friendship, and fruits in love; that Liberalism that blesses the home, and makes good and happy fathers, mothers, and children; that makes life a pleasurable journey, earth a heaven, and the grave a peaceful couch, every man his own savior, and every life a victory. Armed with the spirit of friendship, benevolence, and truth, Liberalism should go on conquering and to conquer, until the whole world is taught to speak one word, and that word Fraternity.

We hav not lost faith in Liberalism, nor do we love it less. But at times we doubt the wisdom of the course of some of its leaders, especially when they use their power to wound the feelings of a co-worker, or strive to lead the cause to a lower plane.

In the past there has been no sacrifice too great for us that the cause might succeed, and the sacrifice we are making now is for the great work before us. It is "beyond question" best for the cause of Liberalism that we withdraw, Mr. Reynolds has told the world. We will do so; but we hope the world will note the fact that we hav at this time one of the best Freethought societies in the country, with a school fairly on its feet, with a bright prospect before it, which will need care, money, and attention to make it a success. If it fails, it will be your failure; if it is a success, may all honor attend you. We hope that you will receive better support than we hav, and the curses heaped upon our head may change to blessings for you. We assure you that we will never throw a stone through your window, or wound your feelings, and bring pain to the heart of your family, by publishing to the world a harsh mandate concerning you.

We look forward to a season of rest in the enjoyment of wife and home, free from the perplexities that hav attended us for years incident to the efforts to build up a better condition for our fellow-man.

In leaving the field we must say to Brother Reynolds that he did not correctly diagnose the case of the people of Liberal when he says that "they will become more self-reliant if we would absent ourself." There are no people more self-reliant than those of Liberal. Every man is an oak; every woman a Minerva, and every lad an intellectual athlete. When you try to mold them into building material, you will find it a more difficult task than that of making faces at religion. Good-bye. G. H. WALSER.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

A pious young lady of my acquaintance to whom I once communicated my intention of writing a Gospel according to Common Sense naïvely exclaimed, "But religion is one thing and common sense another!" "Exactly so," I replied. "That is what I am going to prove. You hav put the case in a nutshell."

If any person doubts the truth of this proposition, let him read the Sermon on the Mount, and say if he ever knew a professed Christian in any condition of life who acted according to it, or if he ever knew a parson of any denomination who did not explain it away and say it was not to be understood literally.

The sermon contains many excellent precepts and some splendid promises, the only objection to them being that the first are for the most part impractical, and the last hav never as yet been fulfilled. As an example—"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." If they do inherit the earth, the possession changes their natures, and most of them are veritable Tartars to their tenants unless they pay the rent. Moses was a meek man but he did not enter into the promised land. Joshua was a fighting man and he did. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." I hope that is true, for I was always a merciful man myself. And the disciples of Jesus hav no mercy upon me. They say I am an Infidel and consign me to eternal torment.

"Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." That has been my case for a very long time, but I hav never had a bellyful yet. "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and say all manner of evil of you falsely," etc. No, I'm damned if we are! "Take no thought for the morrow." I would not if I could help it. But how is this to be reconciled with the other biblical maxim, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise?"

"Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow." Yes, but then they can liv upon earth and rain-water, a species of food and drink that does not agree with my digestion or my taste. And then their clothing—it lasts but a few days at most, and in winter they die. "Love your enemies, and pray for those who despitefully use you." How many of us could do that if we would, or would do it if we could?

"If smitten on one cheek, turn the other." "You hav behaved like a Christian, William," I said to a poor man who suffered without apparent resentment some rough usage from a half-drunk bully. "Yes," said William, "I knowed I should get the worst of it if I hit back, but I will lay him out when I hav the chance." There was more of discretion than of Christianity in William's behavior. If I had been in his place, I fear I should hav hit back regardless of the consequences.

"Always speak the truth," said the canny Scotchman to his son, "unless the truth wanna stand." The modern preacher says, "Always obey the commandments of Christ as long as they are consistent with your worldly interest." Jesus said, "He that shall break the least of my commandments and teach men so, the same shall be least in the kingdom of heaven." How much of that kingdom will the Christian minister get who breaks them all, and justifies himself by the doctrin of expedience?

"Swear not at all." The English Parliament lately objected to Mr. Bradlaugh taking an unchristian oath, because he was not a Christian. He could not be admitted without breaking one of the commandments of Jesus, and they would not allow him to do that because he did not believe in Jesus. So little account is taken of the commandments of Jesus by his professed teachers and preachers that their principal aim seems to be to teach their hearers how not to do them, or how they may be evaded with impunity. This would be the less inexcusable were it not for the shameless effrontery with which they say in effect that Jesus did not expect his precepts to be obeyed—that he did all those things himself and that his obedience is imputed to all believers, i.e., to all who can believe so monstrous an absurdity.

"Except a man forsake all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." This is a sufficient answer to those who suppose that true Christianity is compatible with the enjoyment of an assured and comfortable income. We do not read that in any case Jesus sent round a hat. He lived from hand to mouth, and expected his disciples to do the same. He professed to hav meat to eat that his disciples knew nothing about, and at one time fed a large multitude from his private store supplemented with a few loaves and fishes. We must believe this story—if we can. In another place he says, "He that believeth in me, the works that I do shall he do also." The only inference we can draw from this is that nobody as yet has thoroughly believed in him, i. e., they hav not really believed in their own belief! OUTIS.

The Christian Church in the United States.

Juliet H. Severance to the Chicago Secular Union.

Wherever you find any church—I care not under what name it exists, if it be Catholic or Protestant—there you find an enemy to liberty.

Every reform movement of our times it has bitterly opposed. Slavery was held to be a divine institution and upheld by the church, and only by the courageous works of such "Infidels" as Garrison, Phillips, Lucretia Mott, Abby Kelley, and others, in spite of church opposition and persecution, was this foul blot upon our national honor shown to the people and wiped out.

Woman has ever found in the church her worst enemy and oppressor. In the Bible she is taught that her creation was an afterthought in the creator, and that she was made solely for man's convenience. Moses legalized the sale of daughters. Christ spurned a mother's love and shared that of a Magdalen. Paul's contemptible doctrins in regard to woman hav been used as chains to bind her in her degradation, and to-day the control of the people by the church is held mainly through the subjugation of woman in our marriage system, which is one of slavery, wherein the man owns the woman, instead of being, as it should, a mutual partnership of equal rights, privileges, and responsibilities. From this enslavement of mothers a race of slaves are born.

Let a liberty-loving woman utter a protest against this outrage, or a cry of anguish for the fate of her sex, her voice is silenced by the church's jeers and taunts, and "Let your women keep silence, for it is not permitted unto them to speak," rises from a thousand pulpits to drown the cry. But women do speak, and will continue to speak until above the grave of their present mistress—the church—they will one day sing a song of deliverance.

Through this church influence our secular government is being more and more corrupted. Who pays no taxes on $800,000,000 worth of property that the nation must protect, and thus saddles that extra burden upon other taxpayers? The church. And more; in some states it has so influenced legislation that this infamous law is established: A man may be robbed of all he possesses, see his wife and children murdered before his eyes, and yet not be allowed to testify in court against the criminal, while the word of a thief or murderer is taken if he be willing to testify that he believes in a God! And most criminals do so believe. Then, in many states, a man may be arrested for even splitting a little kindling-wood in his own back-yard on Sunday, as a friend of mine was recently in Pineland.

We hav blasphemy laws to shut the mouths of irreligious Infidels; Comstock laws to interfere with the dissemination of unorthodox teachings in regard to the laws of heredity, empowering this miserable specimen of the genus homo to interfere with the citizen's rights, the safe, unmolested transit of mails; and victims of his tyranny—under church rulings—are scattered over the country, while others hav been hounded to their graves.

And this under a government whose Constitution declares that free speech, a free press, and the right of peaceable assemblage shall not be abridged, and that no act of Congress shall hav power to make laws interfering therewith. Yet ignorant policemen, Pinkerton thugs, and private detectivs arrogate to themselvs these powers and authority denied the Congress of the United States, and the people submit to such usurpation of power.

So long as such laws and usages exist the Declaration of Independence is an empty lie, and your shouts of liberty but the roarings of fools.

Every Denomination a Tyrant.

Rev Hugh O. Pentecost in Christian Union.

The church does not allow, much less encourage, freedom of thought. She permits you to think as you like, but not within her communion—that is, if you happen to be a minister. You may think what you like, Roger Williams, but not in Massachusetts. This is not freedom of thought. In taking this position the church becomes the enemy of truth, the enemy of the mind. There is not a distinctiv denomination in Christendom that does not put an imperativ check on the mind at some point.

New Tracts for Distribution.

The interview with Colonel Ingersoll on the "Stage and the Pulpit," and other topics, recently published in these columns, and widely copied by the press of the country, has been put in pamphlet form. Orders are filled at the rate of 3 cents each, or 30 cents per dozen. When a preacher abuses the actors, or denounces the stage; when some little priest, or obscure parson, or ignorant layman complains that "Ingersoll won't answer me!" he should be presented with this tract. When a zealous Christian shoves a subscription paper for a new church or a Christian charity at an Infidel, the Infidel should hand back this pamphlet. When the Christian papers say that Colonel Ingersoll is stricken in health by a visitation of divine providence, and that he is an Anarchist, anyway, the editor should be obliged to read this interview. It is a complete and authoritativ answer to all these dishonest and ignorant assertions.

The demand for Charles Stephenson's poem, "Our Father in Heaven," has necessitated another edition, which is now ready. No argument on the uselessness of prayer of many times its length is so conclusiv and convincing as this poem. Professor Tyndall's famous prayer-gage is no more effectiv. Liberals should keep it on hand to giv to their neighbors. One cent a copy; 50 cents a hundred; $3 a thousand.

A School For Robbing a County.

The Chicago fight between the state and the church reported this week by the secretary of the American Secular Union is of special interest. The case is that of the Chicago Industrial School for Girls against Cook county, the school suing for various sums for the care and maintenance of girls committed by the county court to the institution, and the county refusing payment. The trial occurred week before last.

The county's defense was that the industrial school system was unconstitutional; that the Chicago Industrial School for Girls was an institution existing on paper for the benefit of two sectarian institutions—the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum; that the county had no right to pay money to institutions controled by any church, and that a number of commitments by the county court were not legally made. For the church its attorney submitted the act incorporating the school, the approval of the governor, the record-book kept at the House of the Good Shepherd, duplicate warrants for the committal of the girls, and warrants for supplies.

When the evidence was submitted, the following facts were shown: That the Industrial School had no real existence; that it was organized in the parlor of the House of the Good Shepherd; that girls committed to the Industrial School were to be turned over to the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Home; that in fact the Industrial School was in these two institutions, and nowhere else; that they were Roman Catholic charities, and derived a revenue from laundry work performed by abandoned women who temporarily lodged there; that no portion of the buildings of the House of the Good Shepherd or St. Joseph's Home was set apart for the Industrial School; that, the Industrial School having no location, its supposititious inmates were mixed with the inmates of the two institutions, and that the managers of the House of the Good Shepherd were also the managers of the Industrial School. The state claimed that the Industrial School was a swindle.

The church set up that the two institutions, though identical in all things, were public charities, as much as the Illinois Industrial School, conducted by Protestant women; that the religious training and education of the children in the Chicago school was merely incidental, the main object of the institution being to reform them. The church admitted that if this religious instruction was made the main object of the institution, then, and only then, would it be the duty of the state to inquire into the matter.

Judge Tuthill, before whom the case was tried, held that the commitments made by the county court were legal; that the article of the state constitution which says that no public funds shall be used for sectarian purposes has not been violated; that the Industrial School was duly incorporated, officers elected, and reports made from time to time, and the fact that the members of a particular church predominated in its management made no difference. There was nothing of sectarianism in the character of the work for which the school was organized, and the fact that it had, by contract, turned over its pupils to the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Home was a good thing rather than otherwise, as the children were well cared for. The county must, therefore, pay the Industrial School the $19,585 asked for. The attorney for the county gave notice of an appeal to the supreme court.

The trick in this matter is very plain. The House of the Good Shepherd was too sectarian an institution to get all the inmates it desired, the Protestant Illinois Industrial School was a dangerous rival, and a scheme must be concocted to benefit the church. The managers of the House of the Good Shepherd thereupon resolved themselvs into another incorporated body, the Chicago Industrial School, whose title did not smack so loudly of sectarianism; made a contract with themselvs to let and keep the unfortunates who might get into their clutches, and in that way the House of the Good Shepherd, with an occasional bone thrown to the St. Joseph's Home, obtained all the money given to two ostensible charities. The representativ Roman Catholic journal published in Chicago recognizes that this trick will be seen, and warns the church to beware. "Any descent," says the Pilot, "to the tricks of politicians is beneath the dignity of the Catholic church and will only bring unjust suspicion on any institution in any way identified with her teachings. To turn over to other institutions pupils nominally committed to the Chicago Industrial School, however well such pupils may be taught and cared for, has the appearance of a trick which cannot fail to injure the cause of Catholic education in the long run."

That is to say, when the public find the church out, the supplies will be withheld, and the cause of Catholic education—or in other words, the finances of the church—will be injured. The Pilot sees clearly.

The Protestants of Chicago, particularly the managers of the Illinois Industrial School, are greatly interested in this contest. If the supreme court shall decide that schools, organized ostensibly for charity, but really for sectarian purposes, are constitutionally prohibited from receiving state aid, thousands of dollars will be lost to them. But if the court decides that a school which farms its inmates out by contract can draw support from the treasury of the county in which it is located, then the religious charity business will flourish apace, and the pious deadbeats, who cannot earn an honest living, will become human commission merchants. The non-sectarians of Chicago are also watching the progress of the case with curiosity and hope. They desire, of course, to see public charities put on a non-religious basis, and the separation of church and state made complete.

This swindle, however, is only one of thousands, of one kind or another, that the religious organizations are perpetrating all over the country, with the connivance of dishonest and self-seeking politicians, and rendered safe and easy by the indifference of the people.

A Request Declined.

The Rev. M. W. Montgomery, of Minneapolis, Minn., is a zealous man and militant. He is an earnest Christian, and a hater of those close followers of the Bible called Mormons. So furious is his denominationalism, and so intense his anger at the other sect, that he has induced the editor of the Congregationalist to issue a supplement containing his, the Reverend Montgomery's, eight-column indictment of the Latter Day Saints, which he is now sending to the editors of the country, with the modest request that they reprint it, to the end that Congress may be influenced in the disposition of legislation now pending.

While we do not yield to the Reverend Montgomery in detestation of the superstition and "heathenish" practices of the Mormons, we cannot aid him in this raid upon a rival religion unless he will agree to visit upon all sects the same penalties for the same offenses. In that event, however, he can count us in.

The object of Mr. Montgomery's paper is, as he states it, to show (1) that Mormonism has ever been a monstrous evil; (2) that it is the same to-day, and (3) that in its growing strength it now seeks at the hands of Congress permanent intrenchment behind the bulwarks of statehood. On all these propositions we vote, Aye. But if Protestantism or Catholicism were substituted for Mormonism we should still be obliged to vote Aye. And in the catalog of vices and false doctrins which Mr. Montgomery prints, we find none which may not be paralleled in absurdity, cruelty, tyranny, and falseness in one of the two other Christian sects named. For let it be steadfastly borne in mind that Mormonism is more Christian than Christianity, inasmuch as the Latter Day Saints follow the Bible more literally and exactly than any Christian church of to-day, and that their laws and practices are more biblical than any other code enacted since the Puritans put the Mosaic laws upon their statute books.

Mr. Montgomery objects to the Mormons that they teach that the air is full of spirits anxiously waiting to be born into the flesh, and consequently they hold it to be a duty to marry and multiply; that the Mormons hold that all the world except themselvs will be lost, but that Mormons may yet save their dead ancestors by being immersed for them. These, it occurs to us, are queer objections for an orthodox Christian to make. Do not the Catholics teach that the world contains spirits, evil spirits who come back and trouble the living? and does not Romanism thus account for the phenomena of Spiritualism? And does not the Bible, the very foundation of Christianity, command us to multiply and replenish the earth? Do not Presbyterians, of which sect we judge Mr. Montgomery to be an honored member, teach that only the elect—meaning themselvs—can be saved? Does not the church which is the mother of Mr. Montgomery's sect teach that prayers and masses and money paid to the priests will get dead ancestors out of purgatory? Why, then, does he object to a poor devil of a Mormon paying two dollars to a neighbor to be immersed for the benefit of his, the poor devil's, five ancestors, when Catholic priests make a regular business of rescuing unsaved, but deceased, relativs? Go to, Mr. Montgomery, you are not logical.

Another reason, in Mr. Montgomery's opinion, why the Mormons should be persecuted and deprived of all civil rights, is that they "teach that marriage is not a civil contract; that only those marriages are valid and binding whose ceremonies are performed by Mormon priests; that all non-Mormon marriages are void, and the children of such marriages are lost." This, too, is Christian doctrin—the doctrin of the first, the largest numerically, and the most powerful of the Christian churches. Catholics forbid intermarriage with Protestants, refusing sacraments to the Catholic parent and baptism to the children, thus damning them all. Why not jump upon Rome in an eight-column article as well as upon the Mormons? Again, polygamy comes under the ban, and rightly, of course. But why condemn Brigham Young and glorify Solomon, the reputed ancestor of Christ? Why make an outcast of George Q. Cannon and a saint of King David? Why waste all the invectiv of the language on the Mormon with two wives and praise the Christian prince who has a "morganatic" wife and a legitimate wife? Are similar laws immoral in Utah and moral in Europe? If cohabitation with more than one woman should be punished by dis-franchisment in Utah, why not in Washington, New York, and all the other places where good Protestants support and cohabit with several women? Are the first wives of Mormondom more unhappy than the first wives of these Protestant rakes?

Mr. Montgomery tells this story to illustrate the depravity of the Saints: "At one time, at a largely attended public meeting of male members only of the Mormon priesthood in Salt Lake City, Brigham Young, after pharisaically denouncing sin, said: 'All you who hav been guilty of committing adultery stand up.' More than three-fourths of those present rose to their feet. These were men only." This is a good or a bad story, but it can be matched. Once upon a time—Mr. Montgomery will know when—the Catholic church ordered that all the ladies in Spain who had been seduced by their confessors should forward an account of the circumstances, with the name of the priest, to the bishops. This was done, and the bishops received so many communications that scarcely a priest in Spain was unreported, and the scandals affected so many "respectable" ladies that the matter was incontinently dropped by the church. Excommunication for the offense would hav alienated about all the female parishioners and unfrocked all the priests.

The morals of Utah to-day will compare favorably with the morals of any city and of many rural communities. Are there no marriages necessitated by previous immorality outside of Utah? How about Congregational New England, the inheritor of Scottish courting customs? How about Presbyterian Scotland itself? Why not make a crusade against Presbyterianism and its offspring Congregationalism? Let us be fair. The Mormons are bad, we admit, but if their immorality is sufficient justification for a persecution, why not persecute all immoral folks?

Another charge is that Mormons are untruthful when the interests of Mormonism are involved. The evidence adduced by Mr. Montgomery is that the revelation of polygamy as an article of faith was given in 1843, but publicly denied for nine years after; and the allegations that their missionary system is a fraud, and that the Mormon leaders lie about Mormon affairs. No doubt this is all so; we do not care to dispute it. But think of the years the revelations of Christianity were bandied about, denied by some, corrupted by others, and used by unprincipled men to subjugate their neighbors! And the leaders of Mormondom will lie! Too bad; but is there a Jesuit in this or any other country who will not do the same? Was Joseph Smith a more notorious liar than Eusebius and the rest of the "Christian fathers?" Do not Protestants sometimes deviate from the truth? Will Trinity corporation giv a more honest account of its wealth and revenues than the Mormon church? If so, the people of New York would like to see it. As for fraud in missionary work, let not those who liv in glass houses throw stones. The Chinese and Japanese missions of the Christian church reek with fraud; the Jewish missionary associations are fraud from top to bottom; the Congo mission is a most cruel imposition, and the Indian missions and Christian charities are but schemes to get government subsidies. If disfranchisment followed fraud, there is not a member of a Christian mission society in the country who could vote.

It is very easy for one sect to draw up accusations against another, but the scripture somewhere mentions that the beam in one's own eye should be removed ere too much attention is paid to the mote in the neighbor's. The Mormons are as loyal as the Catholics, and their vows to the head of the church are not more binding. They hav not plotted against the state more than the Jesuits, and their organization is not more inimical to a free government. The Danites are nothing compared with the Inquisition. The Mountain Meadows massacre pales before St. Bartholomew's Day. No Mormon saint ever sacrificed his daughter in accordance with his vow; and the Pocasset tragedy never had its parallel or its prototype in Utah. The power of Mormonism springs from the same source as the power of Protestantism or Catholicism—the ignorance and superstition of the people, and the hypocrisy and designing craft of the priesthood. The organization, the missionary system, the financial methods of the Catholic church are stronger and more dishonest than of the Mormon church. A Mormon givs a tenth of his income to the church. So do the Adventists, and so did all Christians before they had common sense. The established church of England once derived its revenue largely from this source. In Quebec the Catholic church to-day can force a farmer to mortgage his farm to pay his tithes. The Mormon church borrowed its iniquitous system of finance from Christianity, and the Catholic church in the three cities at the mouth of the Hudson river has stolen more public money and property than the whole territory of Utah is worth. Let us hav laws against the one if we do against the other.

We assert that Mormonism has ever been a monstrous evil, but we as stoutly assert that Christianity has been the same. Christianity has filled the world with bloodshed and cruelty; her holy wars, and her persecutions, and her Inquisitions are the horror of the present civilization. The sixty years of dishonor for Mormonism stretch into sixteen hundred years of infamy for Christianity. And to-day there is not a crime against the state, an outrage against the person, or a tyrannical act of any sort committed by the Mormon hierarchy that is not duplicated and made worse, because of larger interests involved, by the Catholic or the Protestant church. Why should we belabor the Mormons for desiring "permanent intrenchment behind the bulwarks of statehood" and giv godspeed to the Protestant association which desires to ambush its God in our national Constitution, and make submission to its creed and respect for its ceremonies and holy days a condition of citizenship? Tell us that, O wise man of Minneapolis! Explain, please, why it is all wrong for the Mormons to maintain religious schools at their own expense and all right for the Catholics. Tell us how a commandment is broken when the Mormons build a three-million-dollar church, and how it is repaired when the Catholics or Episcopalians erect a ten-million-dollar cathedral. Tell us why Congress should interfere with churches in the territories and the legislatures let them alone in the states. Tell us why we should kill off the Mormons because their percentage of increase is greater than that of the population and let the Catholics liv and flourish. Is there any reason except sectarian hatred and the indisposition—gratifying though it be to see it—to hav the real biblical religion lived out in this country?

We must decline to use our influence in the direction indicated by Mr. Montgomery. Not that we fear the ambition of Cæsar less, but we fear the designs of Rome more. And not alone Rome, but her offspring as well. In proportion to its numbers, as two hundred thousand is to twenty millions, so is the power of Mormonism as dangerous to the welfare of the country as is the Christian church. Every sect, if it had the power, would do what the Mormons hav done, what the Catholic hierarchy has done, and what the Protestants are willing and trying to do. Let us turn a little of our righteous indignation toward the greater thieves, and apply our laws equally to the rich and poor, to the powerful as to the weak, and to one set of Bible idolators as well as to another. If the United States government is going to set up in the religious business, it has sufficient capital to engage in it at wholesale instead of opening up a dirty little shop away off in one corner of the country.

A Resurrection in Sullivan County.

Mr. M. A. Smith, assemblyman from Sullivan county, ought to be canonized by both the Protestant and Catholic churches. He is one of the most zealous of Christians or stupid of ecclesiastical tools ever found in the state, and saints are usually made of just such stuff.

A week ago yesterday Mr. Smith introduced a bill in the assembly exempting from taxation the property of every minister or priest who is permanently disabled by impaired health from performing the activ duties of his calling, and of every such minister or priest who has attained the age of seventy-five years.

Property owned by clergymen and priests is already exempted in this state to the amount of fifteen hundred dollars, which is just fifteen hundred dollars too much, unless the property of every person be exempted to that amount. This attempt to exalt the clergy by making them privileged above other mortals is a relic of the days when the priests of the Christian religion, like the medicin men of the fetich worshipers, were the chief persons in the community. Mr. M. A. Smith, of Sullivan county, should hav been allowed to remain in his grave. The voters who dug him up ought to be ashamed of themselvs.

Besides, the ministers should recollect that the man they follow, who had not where to lay his head, commanded them to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and that this command had direct reference to tax-paying.

A Lively Campaign in Prospect.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Times is authority for the public statement that Dr. McGlynn is going to run for president of the United States on a platform composed of labor planks, and a great big beam with which to assault the Roman Catholic church. The correspondent's authority is the same person who told in advance of the rupture between the ex-priest and the prophet of land reform.

The chasm between Dr. McGlynn and Henry George is deep and wide. The issue is that Dr. McGlynn desires to make the free trade issue subordinate, and run a labor candidate for the presidency on the Syracuse platform of the United Labor party, making the campaign in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana, the doubtful states in a presidential contest. Henry George, on the other hand, desires to pitch in and help Cleveland, in case he should run, if—and Mr. George prints this if in capital letters—"Mr. Cleveland stands for the free trade side of the tariff issue." Mr. George now regards "the general discussion of the tariff question as involving greater possibilities of popular economic education than anything else." Mr. George also accuses Dr. McGlynn and the executiv committee of the Anti-Poverty Society of planning "to make a mergement of what they would call the United Labor party with the Union Labor party, the Socialists, and all the other so-called 'labor elements, upon some sort of a hodge-podge platform, giving if necessary the presidential candidate to the Union Labor party, but of course retaining the position of secretary—one of much greater practical importance in a party when anything might befall the presidential candidate except that he should get an electoral vote." Mr. George holds that such a campaign would be "the same ignominious death-trap into which Butler led the Greenback-Labor party," and refuses to hav anything to do with it. Dr. McGlynn, however, explains his position thus: "I am irrevocably for an independent labor canvass, with a presidential candidate of our own, and with no possibility of fusion with either the Democratic or Republican party. I can only assure you that there will be a national convention for that purpose, and that I hope it will contain representativs from every state in the Union. It will be for that body to say whom the workingmen shall vote for, and there will be no prior wire-pulling or caucusing. The choice will not be made till then and there."

We hope Dr. McGlynn will run for president, at least here in New York, on a platform of opposition to Catholicism in politics. In New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Hoboken the Roman Catholic machine is supreme. Dr. McGlynn knows of the tricks of the church, of the trades and dickers made with politicians, and the men who make them. Let him come out and expose the villainy of the ecclesiastics and the political tricksters, and he will deserve well at the hands of the voters. He has already publicly indorsed the Nine Demands of Liberalism; a detailed exposé of the frauds of the church, with names and dates, will show him to be thoroughly in earnest in his allegiance to American principles.

Lazy Senate Officers.

Our senators at Albany are feeling the need of a chaplain, they say. They hav been subsisting on picked-up divinity long enough, and now want a regular prayer-maker, which, owing to the fight over the position at the opening of the session, they hav not had.

This desire, to some, might argue that the senate is a body of good men. But the disputant who maintained that position would be defeated in debate. The determination to hav a regular chaplain proceeds from the indisposition of the senate officers to scurry around for a minister before every session. The senators themselvs do not often enter the chamber till the prayer is over.

Legislativ chaplains are a fraud and an imposition on the taxpayer.

Letters from Friends.

LINCOLN, ILL., Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a club of five. Each one wants to be counted in the place of that qualmish brother who quit on account of the pictures. Bring on some more tenderfoots—we will fill their places with good, sturdy subscribers who mean business. SAGE WINTERSETT.

CHARLES CITY, IOWA, Jan. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send you an account of the death of an old friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER—Lewis Tucker, at Charles City, Iowa, Jan. 10, 1888, at the age of eighty-six. He used to be a subscriber till he got so blind he could not see to read the paper. He was a stanch Materialist for the last twenty-five years, to my knowledge, and an honest, good, kind-hearted man. He had the use of his mind and knew all that went on up till he left life. His son and daughter were with him, and took care of him till his death. They are of the same faith as their father, and in as high standing as he for truth and good conduct. JOHN MAHARA.

CREAMERY, MONT., Jan. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am in possession of a work called, "Old and New London," which I am desirous of exchanging for other books, Freethought preferred. It is "A Narrativ of its History, its People, and its Places." Illustrated with numerous engravings from the most authentic sources. Cassell, Petter & Galpin: London, Paris, and New York. Six volumes, size 10x7x1½ ins., with over 150 illustrations in each volume. Bound in cloth. A handsome work, and almost new. They cost me $18. I will trade for $10 worth of new or old books in good preservation.

Respectfully, F. LATUS.

HOLDEN, MO., Jan. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It is the custom to put children in Sunday-school and teach them superstitions before the reason is developed. Thus do deluded parents wrong their children. Parents rather Liberally inclined disclaim their right and ignore their duty to teach their children such facts as they may know concerning religion. It is as much the duty of parents to teach their children facts in religion as in arithmetic, history, or any other branch of education. I teach my children the cardinal principles on which orthodox theology rests, and point out the fallacies disclosed by facts in science and history.

Liberals can also do much by exemplary lives and sound reasoning to induce their neighbors to exercise reason, investigate dogmas, and abandon superstition.

Good Liberal books and periodicals in the hands of the people are silent but effectiv monitors.

WICHITA, KAN., Jan. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Though not a subscriber to your valuable paper, yet through kindness of my father-in-law, Theo. Clapp, Fremont, Ohio, I am a regular reader of it.

Sometimes one hears remarks that sound curious and perhaps strange. Possibly through your paper many, as well as myself, can be enlightened upon the following:

It was remarked in my hearing that statistics would prove that more Methodist churches suffered from the effects of a cyclone than any other denomination, and it was not given that possibly they might outnumber others where cyclones came, but that it had been proved beyond a doubt that other churches had been turned from in order to destroy the Methodist. Now, if you can produce figures showing same, I would like to learn such facts. J. W. P.

BANGOR, Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4 50 for Ingersoll's "Prose Poems and Selections." The ANNUAL came all right. I like it very much.

I shall be glad when all those bigots that claim to be Liberals get their papers stopped. A man who is so narrow-minded that he cannot read a paper because the Editor differs with him on some point, or the pictures don't suit him, had better go and join the church. That is the place for him. One man wants his paper smeared if you cannot print to please him. That man had better hav his paper stopped, for of course you cannot take the trouble to smear all of his papers. I don't want mine smeared. I want good, plain print so I can read it all. The pictures are splendid. I think they add very much to the interest of the paper. I hope we shall hear often from your Brother George; his letters are always welcome. SARA E. GOULD.

PORTLAND, ORE., Jan. 22, A.S. 288.

MR. EDITOR: A late device for subduing dangerously rough waters at sea, by oil, recently invented and patented, has suggested to my mind the question: Where is the orthodox God, and where has he kept himself for the past ages that he has not before this time invented some plan by which he could save his children from shipwreck and death on the high seas, instead of waiting for poor, feeble man to solve this great problem for himself, when if he (God) had furnished his children with plenty of oil and invented for them a suitable rocket, how many millions of lives and an untold amount of suffering to widows, orphans, and friends he might hav saved?

I hav for a long time been a constant reader of the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER, as well as of the Boston Investigator. I hav not been a subscriber, but hav obtained them regularly from a dealer in Liberal literature, and hav done missionary work by passing the papers around among our orthodox friends, many of whom are beginning to think in earnest, which will certainly save them from the slavery of superstition imposed on them by priestcraft.

I expect to be in San Francisco before long, when I shall call at the office of Freethought, where I hope to meet Mr. Putnam, whom I had the pleasure of meeting and listening to in Portland, and make the acquaintance of George E. Macdonald.

The cartoons are splendid—a volume in each one.

Yours for truth, W. A. LEWIS.

ODESSA, MO., Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Liberalism is plainly on the increase here, and it is very plain to see that the church is becoming more and more alarmed about it. I know several Freethinkers who always until lately hav kept mum that are now outspoken. A great many people in this country hav never been allowed to come out from behind the battlements of the church far enough to receive a ray of light from Freethought's batteries. The first arrows from her quiver, though they be ever so well soaked in the pool of kindness and friendship, stun them. They are not prepared to receive them. They are like men just coming out of a dungeon into the blazing light of the sun. We cannot expect such people to readily accept the benign truths of nature, though they be made ever so easy and palatable by science. It will take time. We must be patient. Let us do our duty, and eventually the victory is for the hater of superstition and the lover of truth—for the lover of liberty and the hater of oppression and tyranny.

Yours forever in the great cause, WM. L. WORLEY.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Jan. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The ministerial association of this city some months ago began seriously to consider the spiritual wants of this Sodom of iniquity. They sang, prayed, and resoluted to get Moody. One poor little parson ventured to object, remarking that "the very fact of our being embassadors of Christ ought to giv us power to fill our churches." He was promptly informed that Moody had faith and they "didn't hav a drop in the house," and they must hav Moody and get a corner on faith. So they went to work with a will and got up a monster tabernacle, three to five thousand capacity, costing $10,000; Professor Case, of Cleveland, to lead a choir of three or four hundred, and Moody at $100 per day. The city papers gave the scheme a generous support, but so far it has proved a gigantic fizzle. A few days ago Moody took the liberty to attack his friends, the Sunday papers, fiercely. They made Moody, and I took the liberty, through the Commercial, to remind him of some things in a little bit of doggerel that I inclose below.

"TO BROTHER MOODY.

"All hail the power of Moody's name!
(Our useless preachers bawl).
He has that mustard-seed of faith,
And we hav none at all.

"That mustard-seed of faith will move
A mountain or a tree,
As Moody is prepared to prove,
And plant them in the sea.

"When Garfield lay awaiting death,
We loud on God did call
For just a mustard-seed of faith,
But Guiteau had it all.

"When folks believed that God made man,
The souls were thick about;
Since Darwin's evolution plan
They've kind o' petered out.

"A legion devils laugh their fill
To hear us rave and shout;
If Moody has that little pill,
We'll turn the rascals out.

"That vile Pandora's box of ill,
Fount of our every woe,
The Sunday paper, dreads the pill
In Moody's mammoth show.

"They teach but demonstrated fact;
No myth these wretches fear;
And taught the masses bold to act,
And pass us with a sneer."

Yours truly, WM. E. RENWICK.

WALNUT GROVE, KAN., Jan. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I promised you that I would send you another subscriber, but times are so hard here that it is almost impossible for me to fill my promis, unless the good, pious, praying people of this burg will keep up their protracted meetings a little longer to disgust our friends that will take the trouble to stop and think for themselvs. We hav one of the most religious settlements in Kansas. We hav been having revival meetings all around us for two months past, and for about three weeks past our burg has been besieged with the epidemic, and they hav been hammering away at the members of the churches to get the harness on so that they can work them, so that they would show off to better advantage at the inspection at church dress parade. One of the speakers said that they were an army of the Lord; that each member was a soldier to fight for his God, and they dare insist on the members drilling all the time until next year at about this time, when the church will hav its annual dress parade again. After nearly four weeks of praying and howling, and preaching the funeral sermons of all the terrible Infidels in the whole country, telling the terrible deaths of Thomas Paine and such, they now aver that D. M. Bennett's daughter when on her deathbed asked her father which she should believe, his or her mother's religion, and Mr. Bennett told her to believe her mother, for he did not know but that her mother was right after all. Several doubted the statement and hav asked me for the truth of it, and now I will ask the mother for the answer, if the Editor will do us the favor to reply. I asserted that I believed the statement false. The preacher that made the statement is one of the most able ones of the Methodist Episcopal church. He hails from Illinois. He said the other night that there was more wickedness out here in Kansas in the two years that he had lived here than he had ever known back in Illinois—that Infidelity was ripe through the whole breadth of the land. I went to hear him one night. They succeeded in getting two of the old Presbyterians, one of ten years' standing, warmed over so that they both promised to be on hand at the annual dress parade next winter, and I got one subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER six months.

Those pictures are terrible things to a churchman; they tell more than their space could in print, and all hav to see them, too. Yours truly, W. H. NOAH.

[D. M. Bennett never had a daughter. The story is an old one originally told of Ethan Allen. It is a lie.—ED. T. S.]

SILEX, ARK., Jan. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find order for your excellent paper, also list of pamphlets, together with cash for same. This makes my third subscription. I like the paper better every number. The pictures are too good to be without. "Oh, that grindstone—that tells it all at once! That makes me scratch my head!" was the remark of a gentleman who happened to be at my house when I received the number containing that picture. He is one of those who hav furnished the nose for several years. It was the first time he had seen himself as others see him. I hope you will continue the pictures.

There are a good many Liberals in this county. They fear the efforts that are being made by the church for the amalgamation of church and state. If that is ever accomplished, farewell to liberty. Of course this will hav to be done slowly and stealthily, for the reason that there are plenty of good church people that would oppose such a thing. But the chances are good for them to be made to help bring it about without being aware of it, for the preacher has the average church-member in about the same condition in which Simon Suggs had his mother. He said he could put his finger in the old lady's eye and if he said it was not there she would say so, too.

I wish we could hav a real, live Liberal lecturer in this county. He would be opposed, of course, but he would get to say his say. Yours respectfully, J. J. BROWN.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Feb. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In accordance with a well-established and worthy custom among Liberal bodies, and especially this one, the Pittsburgh Secular Society has just completed the celebration of the 151st anniversary of the birth of the Author-Hero of the revolution, Thomas Paine, with more than usual brilliancy. The exercises commenced on Sunday afternoon, the 29th inst., by a lecture delivered on the subject of Secular education by Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, of Grand Rapids, Mich., followed by a short address on the life of Thomas Paine by Prof. William Seymour, of Philadelphia. On this occasion, the professor fully came up to what Pittsburgh Liberals expected of him; for they hav been in the habit of listening to his powerful, ringing voice and his clear, cutting logic for many years past. But the audience were more than surprised with the opening effort of Miss De Cleyre as she stood before them, sparkling with youth and beauty, grappling with one of the greatest questions of the day—education of the rising generation. She made a strong appeal for early Secular training by parents before the child entered upon its regular schooling career, and urged upon her audience the necessity of more thorough organization to guard against the encroachments of the church—both Catholic and Protestant—upon our educational institutions. She concluded her lecture by the recitation of an original poem, which was received with rapturous applause.

The lecture gave the people a good foretaste of what they might expect on Monday night, as she was billed to giv the oration on Thomas Paine on that occasion. On Monday night, the program opened with an overture by Gernert and Gerenther's band. Professor Seymour, chairman, followed with a neat and well-timed address; after which he introduced Miss De Cleyre, the speaker of the evening, who delivered her great oration on the immortality of the life of Thomas Paine. It has been been so much our habit, as a Liberal for many years past, to listen to and read addresses and lectures on the life of Thomas Paine, that we had just about made up our mind what to expect, knowing, as we did, that most of those delivered in the past run in the same ruts. But on this occasion we were treated to a change of intellectual diet; and, for originality of thought and beauty of expression, it surpassed anything we hav ever listened to.

She dwelt at great length upon the enduring influence of a noble life spent in the cause of humanity, showing such was the life of Paine—that though dead he yet liveth, and would continue to liv and bloom in the hearts of the people, shedding his benign influence over posterity through all future generations. The oration, as a whole, was a grand production, and one that will long be remembered by the Liberals of these two cities. Mr. Joseph Tate followed with two comic songs, which had the effect of throwing the audience into convulsions of laughter.

The literary exercises were then brought to a close by the recitation of an original poem, accompanied by a tableau, by Miss De Cleyre, in which she depicts the deathbed of a fallen woman, who, after being persecuted and neglected through life, robbed of husband and child by death, and driven into the street without shelter, rejects the offers of Christ through a Christian minister on her deathbed, because, as she said, he had refused to answer her prayers when she was enjoying health and virtue. When she had appealed to him to save her husband from a drunkard's grave and herself and child from starvation; when she needed Christ's help, it was withheld, and now she was dying she did not need it. The poem was recited with great ability and was well received. The celebration wound up with a ball, which was kept up until two o'clock in the morning.

The general verdict is that this has been the most successful Paine celebration ever held in this section.

Hoping that these annual celebrations may grow more and more popular as the years roll on, I am,

Yours for freedom, ANTHONY BARKER.

NAPAVINE, WASH. TERR., Jan. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If possible, I will add one or two new names to your list. I must state that there is some difficulty in finding subscribers for a Liberal paper like yours in this vicinity, for Napavine—small and seldom found on general maps—is a religious place, composed of Catholics and Protestants, the Catholics predominating—no school-house, one Methodist church, and soon to hav a big Catholic edifice erected in which to spread the light of the gospel and St. Mary. This is a hard class to introduce Liberal literature among. I hav handed THE TRUTH SEEKER to several persons here, who are so badly steeped in orthodoxy that they can only pronounce three words, "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," and after a tirade of abuse and the cooling process had subsided, they agreed to take them home and read them, "just to show me that they dared read them," and I am waiting the result. One man, a Catholic, refused even to look at a copy, saying he had two of them dom things sent to him, and, begobs, they insulted his religion so, he burnt them up; THE TRUTH SEEKER was dom bodly named, and no decent mon would hav them in his house, etc.

You see logic and common sense are entirely out of place in such cases. I shall, nevertheless, continue trying to do what I feel is the duty of all, to try and loosen the scales from the eyes of the blind and show them the beauties of truth and reason. I feel deeply indebted to THE TRUTH SEEKER and to its founder, D. M. Bennett, for to him I owe my present enlightenment, and should fortune ever favor me in the future, I shall spend a few dollars toward furthering his cause. I read a little book written by him not long since, and it completely revolutionized my religious opinion—so much so that I feel mad to think I hav spent so many years reading that old book of nonsense and fables. When I think of the prayers I hav uttered, and the tears I hav shed, all in the name of Jesus, lest the master should come in the night and find me asleep, oh, it is too bad! How much better to hav spent those years studying Spencer, Darwin, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other sensible works! I can hardly forgiv myself for such conduct, or the ministers for inculcating such lies into my brain. But it is too late to cry over spilt milk, and as I am safe over the bridge now, and can look back on my past with a sigh of relief, I can't help but exclaim, What a fool I've been, and what a pack of fools there is in this world! Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and long may you liv to wield the pen in defense of truth. I cannot find words to express the gratitude I feel toward you, but will desist from further monopolizing of your valuable time.

Yours for truth, U. P. HADLEY.

BELLEVUE, IDA., Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your issue of January 7th, the first number of Vol. XV, is one of the best I ever read. Those ringing truths are grand which Colonel Ingersoll has given in his preface to the "story of real folks," "For Her Daily Bread"—such plain, unvarnished facts of the real condition of working girls that they seem a revelation of the secrets of their inner life, showing to obtuse minds that girls who are compelled by circumstances, as well as the natural desire of being industrious, to toil, hav aims and aspirations far above the menial services by which they earn their daily bread. Yet all labor should be considered honorable, and those working for others ought not to be treated as subordinates on that account, but to receive the respect and attention their intelligence and character entitle them to, irrespectiv of wealth or position. This rock of offense and long-seated prejudice must be removed out of the way of the laboring classes, both men and women. My nature always rebelled against this subordination of "domestics," so called. When a young girl, I used sometimes to "work out," and more than once I hav slammed the dishcloth down and walked off when I was made to feel an inferiority that my nature revolted at. It was a strike on a small scale; the first time being when I was not more than seven years old, staying at a neighbor's during the absence of my parents on a visit to some relativs. I was given a bowl of bread and milk, and I placed it on the table where the family were eating, but was bid, in no gentle tones, by the man of the house to "go away and sit on the floor and eat it." I felt then the first of those blows upon my heart that I was yet to know, with their pain and degradation, in the years to come, and, with tears in my eyes and my voice trembling with emotion, I turned and left the house, though it was nearly dark, and ran like a frightened fawn to a house near by, where I was kindly welcomed and my little grievance alleviated by kind words to myself, but the opposit of the man who had treated me in that conventional manner. It is by seeds sown in youth that our lives are ripened up, whether of evil or of good. Even the bitter buds of our childhood may ripen to beautiful flowers and fruits along the ways of life.

Several other good articles shine out on its pages with the white light of truth as found, not merely as sought after.

Yes, Henry George—"Mr." belittles a great name—no doubt has the key that can unlock the door of poverty and let in the sunlight of thrift and plenty that comes of liberty to work for one's self and to feel the true manhood and womanhood of independence, the full significance of which the world has never realized.

Let the cry go forth from every heart and life that feels oppression: Freedom and pursuit of happiness for all!

LUNA HUTCHINSON.

FOSSIL, ORE., Jan. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: While I cannot conscientiously take issue with THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning supernatural and spiritual matters, I can sympathize with all who are honestly and earnestly seeking after the truth, and I sincerely hope that all such may receive a just reward for their labors.

Born of unbelieving parents, and taught from earliest childhood the principles upon which the doctrins of Infidelity and Atheism are founded, I, too, scoffed at religion. Not until I had arrived at the age of mature thought and study did I begin to realize that possibly there might be two sides to this great question. Previously, I had thought myself completely surrounded by a wall of logic strong enough to withstand all attacks of the opposing party, but, as it afterward appeared, there were several weak points which, owing to a mistaken confidence in the superiority of my position, I had overlooked. Finding myself fairly beaten, I quietly yielded, and hav never had occasion since to feel sorry for it.

I am a Liberal in the true sense of the word—that is, I believe in Freethought and free speech as long as this freedom does not threaten our government, or interfere with the welfare of our country as a nation.

It is the inalienable right of every American citizen to think and talk intelligently. Ignorance is not "the only entrance to the gates of paradise." For had not the dark curtains of ignorance and error been parted sufficiently for me to obtain a view of the Christian religion in its purity, I should hav been an unbeliever to-day.

To those who are desirous of eliminating faith and substituting science in its stead, let me suggest that faith is the foundation-stone of science. Science is knowledge systematized. But if the parts of nature were not arranged after a plan, the knowledge of them could not be formed into a system. A state of confusion is incomprehensible to the human intellect. Our minds are so constituted that we naturally anticipate order and regularity before we begin to investigate, and without this fundamental faith in order and regularity, cause and effect, science would be rarely sought after. If it indeed be true that "when faith is in sense is out," then are we all fools, for there is not a human being living that has not a share of it. We liv by faith. The dearest interests and most important concerns of this life depend upon faith. It is faith that bids the farmer sow, there being no scientific certainty that he shall reap; and so it is with the various occupations in life. We sow in faith, not knowing that we shall liv to reap the reward of our labors. Compared with faith, science is but the child of yesterday. We may liv and love without it, but not without faith. This is the tie that binds the family, the state, the nation, and is the source of all the happiness we may know on earth. Moreover, it has come within the range of my experience that Infidelity and Atheism demand as much of my faith as does Christianity; for example, reason points out to me the defectivness of Darwin's theory of development, and shows me that in order to accept that theory as truth, I must draw as largely from my stock of faith as I do when I accept the Bible account of man's origin.

I will not attempt to set forth in this letter any of the reasons why I was led to change my views regarding this subject. If this letter is accepted, I may come again, for I believe every lover of truth realizes the fact that, in order to form an intelligent opinion about any subject, we must hear both sides of the question. MRS. H. A. RITCHEY.

HELENA, NEB., Jan. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Many times I hav felt like giving some fellow fits for things said that to me appeared absurd, malicious and sometimes even false. Editorially, the grand old TRUTH SEEKER is, in my judgment, superior to anything that has ever met my eye. But I do want to hit Van Buren Denslow one on the lower jaw bad. I was stirred up mightily over his articles which appeared some time ago, but "The Distribution of Wealth" is really more than I can stand, so I hope you will giv me a chance at him.

He starts out with: "Why must some be poor and others rich? Some ignorant and others learned?" etc., closing the sentence with the grand and noble query: "Why, if—as our Declaration of Independence affirms—all men are created equal, is it impossible to find any two men who are in fact equal in any respect?" Why, Mr. Denslow, is it impossible to find such? Hav you, Mr. Denslow, a right, natural, that every other individual is not created with and equal to? You surely do not possess a right to air, sunlight, water, and in fact every other natural product, in which every other created being does not stand your equal. Your "aristocracy" givs you, my dear sir, no unequal advantage over any poor cuss, though your "muscle" may be much more elastic or powerful. Yes, you hav indeed set up a man of straw, for who ever thought of such an absurd idea before as that all men hav figure, weight, complexion, appetite, disposition, length, breadth, hair, eyes, intellect, or general make-up equal in every respect? Neither did the fathers declare any such thing. But they did declare that they possessed certain rights. And the fact that a range of "mountains" west of the Missouri river was the aristocrat that forced a "spring" to burst out a thousand miles away is no reason why Mr. Denslow, with his aristocracy of muscle, should stand by said spring with uplifted arm ready to strike down all others who attempt to quench their thirst from its sparkling waters. Is it not true that the bully who usurped the exclusiv right to the waters of the spring has been the cause of making "some poor" and himself rich? The only logical conclusion that can be drawn from Mr. Denslow's argument is that no one had muscle enough to get water from the spring while he stood over it, and those who wished to use its waters must pay him tribute, and thus by so doing he becomes master of capital that he never produced. He now has discovered a scheme by which he can accumulate wealth without labor. But after a while some fellow turns up who possesses an "aristocracy" of intellect, and before Mr. Denslow is aware of the fact, Intellect has possession of the spring, and when Mr. Denslow wishes to use of the waters, he, too, is made to disgorge some of the wealth he had robbed others of. Now, Intellect, to protect himself against Muscle, institutes governments. And to make of Muscle a good and obedient subject, Intellect and Muscle compromise. Muscle has the spring returned to him, and Intellect makes the laws by which the distribution shall be made. Here, now, we hav arrived at that point where the law takes the place of muscle, or force, and is it true, Mr. Denslow, that "the doctrin implies a delusion," as to giviug one man the same right before the law as it does to another one? Are not all men equal before the law? If not, why not? Is there anything delusiv in the Declaration? If all men are not equal before the law, is it the fault of the principle laid down in the Declaration that all men are thus created equal? Or rather is it not the fault of such men as Van Buren Denslow, who, by their sophism, hav bedeviled the law-makers until they hav made laws on the basis of muscle and intellect instead of justice and equality? And will not this explain the fact of some being poor and others rich?

Before the time of legal values there was no such inequality in wealth. If a man produced something that was of any use, he possessed it until he exchanged it for something else of use to him that some one else had produced, or else he was robbed of it by Mr. Denslow; and unless he was robbed, whether he still held possession of his own product, or, by the exchange, the product of the other, he was in either case a possessor of wealth. But if he had never produced anything of use to some one, he could hav never possessed wealth except by gift or theft. So, after all, the statement is not so very far from the truth that "labor creates all wealth."

What follows in Mr. Denslow's questions and answers is in most part another man of straw, and no man, unless he be grossly ignorant or basely dishonest, could or would hav written such nonsense. No man that ever advocated the cause of labor ever used language that could possibly be tortured into any such meaning as that "wage-workers" produced all wealth. And I would respectfully suggest to Mr. Denslow that before he writes any more on the subject he had better know something of what he is trying to write about. Mr. Denslow ought to know, if he does not already know it, that the past twenty-five years, through unjust laws, hav produced more millionaires and more paupers than any other period in the history of the world, and precisely the same cause that has made the rich and poor in this period has done the same in all times past. Mr. Denslow says: "Why is it, then, that periods and peoples of most unequal distribution of wealth, intellect, rank, and honor are periods and peoples of most progress in wealth and in civilization?" He then says: "I will try to answer this question candidly." Hav you not been candid before? Did you really do your best in making answer to the question? Really, now, hav intellect and civilization made such rapid strides in the past twenty-five years that the unequal distribution of wealth in this period was not equaled by any century in the past? Is it not possible, though you were to be ever so candid, that your answers possess hardly a shadow of the truth or the true cause of the unequal distribution of wealth? Just prior to the period in which wealth made such a rapid change of ownership, the wealth-producers owned considerably more than one-half of all the wealth of the nation, whilst to-day they own less than one-fifth. Now, sir, Mr. Denslow, if your intellect has kept pace with the "progress" of "civilization" that has made this enormous change in the distribution of wealth in so short a time, you know very well that your "candid" answer does not giv the true reason of the present distribution of wealth or the absorbing of the wealth produced by the laborer into the coffers of those who do not produce wealth. You know, or ought to know, that those who use reproductiv wealth, or profit, for the purpose of adding more capital to that that they already possess are not the class that become millionaires, as a rule, nor is it that class that bears down so heavily on the wage-workers. But it is that class, by force muscular or legal, that has presumed to hav the sole right to the waters of the spring. A few years ago the spring developed a large amount of silver, and the appropriators concocted a scheme by which at four different times they put into circulation the trade dollar at one hundred cents each. Then after they had got into the hands of the laborer—the simple trick of Presto, change! and they passed out of the hands of labor for eighty cents, robbing labor of twenty cents. Now, sir, you may call this devilish swindle "aristocracy" of "muscle" or "intellect," but all honest men will call it damned rascality—a civilized system of brigandage, and a system that is as foreign from the principles of the Declaration that all men are born equal, with certain rights that are as sacred to one as to the other, as anything possibly can be.

Nor is it good common sense to say that because some men hav more muscle and others more intellect, the law should not giv everyone the same chance, that is, equal justice to all. This being true, it seems that it is possible for men to be equal in some respect, at least.

Now, in closing, I would suggest that you read up a little on economic literature a few such writers as Professor Jevons, Professor Colwell, Charles Morgan, John Maguire, John Stuart Mill, Professor Kellogg, etc.

Respectfully, W. P. BROOKS, M.D.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Geraldine and Little Jo.

A summer-time of mingled tunes,
And crimson clouds are in the west;
And twilight swings her silver moons,
With bees and blossoms all at rest.
We gather in the portico,
My Geraldine and little Jo,
To sing the song* they both love best,
Of babe upon its "mother's breast,"
Sung by a poet long ago.

What sweeter song was ever heard
Than this one by the singer old?
So tender is each rhythmic word,
'Twill liv in letters wrought of gold;
And every child rocked to and fro
As Geraldine and little Jo,
Will bless the poet who has told
Of "dying moon" so lightly rolled
Whence soft, sweet winds may "breathe and blow."

How often hav I held my own
And dreaming, swaying to and fro,
Though far away from every moan
Of ocean winds that come and go,
My little Jo and Geraldine
'Neath summer dews of silv'ry sheen,
I loved them just the same, I know,
My Geraldine and little Jo—
No fairer babes were ever seen!

O little Jo, and Geraldine!
To spin again my snow-white threads
When all the prairie lands are green
With sunlight on your golden heads.
Sing at my wheel of "western seas,"
'Mid hazel dells and hickory trees,
With lilies on the river-meads,
And sweet babes safe in cradle-beds,
And peaceful song like murm'ring bees.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Frenchtown, Neb., Jan. 31, 1888.

*This song will be found in Tennyson's "Princess." It begins:

"Sweet and low, sweet and low,
Wind of the Western sea."

Freedom.

They are slaves who fear to speak
For the fallen and the weak;
They are slaves who will not choose
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

Is true freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake,
And, with leathern hearts, forget
That we owe mankind a debt?
No! true freedom is to share
All the chains our brothers wear,
And with heart and hand to be
Earnest to make others free.

—James Russell Lowell.

Why Am I a Liberal?

First, I suppose I am a Liberal because I was raised one. Then, Freethought teaches us to be happy now. Freethinkers are intelligent, while most Christians are weak-minded. I am not selfish, and I try to do unto others as I would be done by, and I always vote for the under dog. When we had Mr. Jamieson here lecturing, there were none of the Christians out. I think they had such little faith they were afraid the lecture would lessen it if they went. I am a Liberal that I may be happy. I never was to church but once. Then they all stared at me as though I ought not to be there, so I concluded I would not bother them again. I am a Liberal so that I may be taught to be ever on the search for knowledge. I am a Liberal and think freely. Science is the Christian's worst enemy, while it is the Freethinker's best friend. I think all children should be taught science, that they may grow up to be Freethinkers, for the mind is more easily bent while young.

Giv us the freedom of speech and the press;
A jury impartial selected to try us if laws we transgress;
Giv us a union of peaceful souls blending,
Whose millions of hearts throb as one,
The rights of our fathers defending,
To throttle the freedom of none.

ESTELLE WHITNEY.

I am a Liberal for the following reasons:

1. I hav read considerable of the Bible, and there are so many impossibilities and lies in it that it made me laugh many times.

2. I do not believe in going to church and paying a minister for a week's work when he only talks about one hour and a half, and that does no one any good.

3. I know it to be impossible for a God to be in heaven when there can possibly be no such place, as commonly reported, because the farther you get up the farther you can see, and you might keep going up forever and a day and not reach heaven then.

4. I am sure there can be no such place as hell, as they say it is a bottomless pit like a length of stovepipe, so when the devil, as they call him, puts a person in, he will fall out at the bottom, and for a person to burn for ever and ever is an impossibility, because nothing can burn any longer than till it has lost all its inflammable parts.

I am fourteen years old.

With kindest regards to the friends of the Corner, and yourself, I remain,

Your Freethinker friend,

Fonthill, Ont., Can. RAYMOND J. COLE.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would try my hand on the essay. I cannot do more than try.

My first reason for being a Liberal is that my mamma and papa hav always taught me that Liberalism is truth, and I think truth ought always to be loved and looked up to. Besides, Liberalism teaches us to giv everyone the same privilege that we take ourselvs. Mamma says Liberalism means a great many privileges. I could not be an orthodox if I wanted to. I cannot see how any can be so foolish as to think they can right a wrong by praying to some angry being. Now, I never could be an orthodox. I am a Liberal, because Liberalism's principles are truth and justice. CLAUDE SMITH.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—ENIGMA.

I've sixty wings of gleaming gold,
And sixty feathers in each I hold.
I've eleven brothers as the day is bright,
I hav twelve others as black as night.
And while you strive to solve my rhyme
I'm passing with the flight of time.
If you will use us for all we are worth
We'll giv you all you need on earth.

JOHN P. GUILD.

2.—LETTER REBUS.

N
N T T

It has no head, nor body, nor legs;
It is neither born nor is hatched from eggs.
It is not round, nor square, nor flat;
And it is no liquid, I'll tell you that.
A little of it is as large as all,
And all is more small than the smallest small.
It dwells in the vacuous halls of night,
That night that was never dispelled by light—
Those halls that had never floor, roof, nor walls,
Foundationless, too, these most ancient halls.
And here the creator's hand unknown
Leaves absolute solitude all alone
It's "In the beginning," not yet begun,
The first creativ act undone!
Here absolute nothing—think of it, man—
Waits, as did all things, the deity's plan!
Awful, sublime, and as clear as mud!
And it's poetry, too, O Lud, Lud, Lud!

OLD BOY.

3.—ANDOVERIAN DEAD BIRDS.

Decapitating pagans neat,
Command them female birds to eat.
Your headsman cleaves again in vain,
Still at these birds our guests remain;
The capital of Greece, in fact,
Seems gathered there in mass compact.
This capital decapitate,
What then must be its awful fate?
Yes, then, and then alas! these thens
Resist our swords or mightier pens.
The next decapitation shows
These birds untouched by friends or foes.
But these beheaded "death ends all,"
For ENS—I—FORM fate's final fall;
And Ense petit placidam
Sub libertate quietem.
(This must be cockney Latin, too,
If rightly I the text construe
As "Little hens in place I dam,
'Neath liberty, to quiet them.")
This Gordian knot requires, I feel,
Some "Alick" with the keenest steel
To slash the slang, pun, Latin, too,
And to disclose its worth to view.

REKAB SEMAJ, THE TURK.

Correspondence.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Jan. 29, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav nothing to do this evening, I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner. As this is my second letter, I will try and write more than before. I was glad to see my letter in print. I hav four brothers and one sister; my youngest brother's name is Claude; he is five years old. And my sister's name is Laura; she is nine years old. I like to look at the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. I think the "Story Hour" is as good a book for the children as I ever read. I like to read Ingersoll's, Bell's, Bennett's, Paine's, Watts's, Mrs. Slenker's, Putnam's, Bradlaugh's, H. E. Gardner's, Kersey Graves's, Kelso's, and your own good works. Christians claim that they do not curse, but I think it isn't the truth. There are Christians in our neighborhood who go to the church in the forenoon, and burn bush in the afternoon. I remain,

Your true Infidel friend,

C. B. REMSBURG.

DAVENPORT, WASH. TERR., Feb. 1, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Two months ago I broke my leg, and I cannot walk much, so I thought I would spend my time writing for the Children's Corner. My father reads THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thinks it a valuable paper. Most all the people out here are Freethinkers. We do not go to school in winter, but during the summer we hav school. For fear of making my letter too long for the first time, I will close. Wishing success to the Corner,

Your little Freethinker friend,

NELSON SELDE.

OMAHA, NEB., Feb. 5, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am going to try and write a little letter for the Corner. I am ten years of age, and I attend a public school. I am in the fourth grade. I learn arithmetic, geography, drawing, spelling, writing, and reading. The school-house is only about three blocks from where we liv, which is very good for stormy weather. You will see from some pieces of newspapers which I send you that we had a great storm there last month. But the weather for the last eight or nine days has been mild and warm, but last night and to-day it is a little colder.

I hav been reading some of the pretty stories in "Apples of Gold," and I think they are very good. Little Nancy was a very good girl and took good care of her little baby brother. She went out on cold days, without shoes or stockings on her feet, to get something for her sisters' and brothers' supper.

Jimmy Jennings was a good boy, who went and drove an old red tin-cart to support his mother and sisters after his father died, and he soon afterward became a rich man.

Richard Allen was a good man, although Hope Stanley thought he was an awful bad man, and it makes me laugh when I read about him falling down-stairs with all the toys and picture-books, and the music-box playing music while resting on his head, which scared and alarmed all the neighbors.

The sun is shining brightly here to-day, and the snow that fell last month is nearly all melted. The Omaha papers say that there hav been great snow-storms in the Eastern states. ANNIE S. COLVIN.

KIRKLIN, TENN., Feb. 2, 1888.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: My two little children, Hoza, aged eleven, and Lora, seven, were very much interested in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and especially in the Puzzle department. Then came a number without any puzzles, which caused quite a surprise to the little ones. How anxiously they waited for the next number! It was a long week to them. At length it came, but no Children's Corner, no puzzle, and they wondered why.

Then came the sad news of your mother's sudden death, and we all sorrowed with you. How vividly it brought to me the memory of my own dear mother! At the time of her death I had not seen her for fifteen years, but had kept the fire of filial affection warm by frequent correspondence, and the cherished hope that "next year I will visit mother." I was in southern Missouri and she in Sacramento, Cal. I had written her a long and loving letter and was beginning to look for her reply, when there came a letter from Sacramento in a strange handwriting, containing my photograph, my last letter, and the sad news that mother had passed away after a very brief attack of pneumonia.

It shocked me almost as if she had been stricken down before my eyes. My mother dead, and I had not seen her for so many years! It was indeed a sorry thought. No one can estimate the value of his mother. The loss of a mother is a loss beyond computation.

I believe the average young man does not begin to realize a mother's priceless value until he is twenty-five to forty years of age, and then he has no mother left to prize.

I am now fifty-four years old, and now in my days of despondence I know not what I would not giv to lay my head on mother's knee, and hav her lay her hand on my head, and listen to her gentle voice again. There are times when the balm of her presence would be a refreshing and strengthening solace. But the order of nature has to be fulfilled, and we take up again the burden of life's duties, with what self reliance we can command. Still the sad heart will yearn for the mother's words of hope and comfort. Activ duties sometimes quench it for a time, but years cannot blot it out.

Very truly, L. L. GOODWIN.

A Little Girl at the Table.

A gentleman who had a little daughter of a very inquisitiv turn of mind invited a friend to dine with him. It chanced that the friend had just been divorced from his wife, and little Annie, who had heard something about it, was curious to hear more. "Why didn't you bring your wife with you, Mr. Todd?" asked Annie when they were seated at the table. The guest blushed and stammered, and said that he hadn't any now. Then Annie, in spite of admonitory scowls from papa and mamma, continued: "What did you get divorced from her for?" "Well, Annie, don't you think it is better," asked Mr. Todd, "when two people can't liv happily together that they should separate?" "No, I don't," answered the child. "I think it is better to fight it out; that's the way my papa and mamma do."

The King and the Child.

King Frederick VI. of Denmark, while traveling through Jutland, one day entered a village school and found the children lively and intelligent, and quite ready to answer his questions.

"Well, youngsters," he said, "what are the names of the greatest kings of Denmark?"

With one accord they cried out: "Canute the Great, Waldemar, and Christian IV."

Just then a little girl, to whom the schoolmaster had whispered something, stood up and raised her hand.

"Do you know another?" asked the king.

"Yes; Frederick VI."

"What great act did he perform?"

The girl hung her head and stammered out: "I don't know."

"Be comforted, my child," said the king. "I don't know, either."

A True Nobleman.

Every school-boy remembers the story of Sir Philip Sidney, wounded on the field of Zutphen, refusing to quench his burning thirst till he had offered his canteen to a poor bleeding soldier. In a noble character one ruling trait is consideration of others, and the military chiefs of history best deserve the praise of greatness who hav been most thoughtful of their soldiers' comfort. Another example of the real nobleman was the gallant Sir Ralph Abercrombie, of whom it is related that when mortally wounded in the battle of Aboukir he was carried in a litter on board the Foudroyant, and to ease his pain a soldier's blanket was placed under his head, from which he experienced considerable relief. He asked what it was. "It's only a soldier's blanket," was the reply. "Whose blanket is it?" said he, half lifting himself up. "Only one of the men's." "I wish to know the name of the man whose blanket this is." "It is Duncan Roy's of the Forty-second, Sir Ralph." "Then see that Duncan Roy gets his blanket this very night." Even to ease his dying agony, the general would not deprive the private soldier of his blanket for one night.

Baby's First Shoes.

The first baby when she needs her first pair of shoes hears this from her proud and happy father:

"And does it want some 'ittle shoes-um for its 'ittle feet-ums? Well, papa shall get it all the 'ittle shoes-ums it wants, so he shall."

When the order for the second pair comes he seems a little surprised, and says:

"What! Has papa's little girl worn out its pretty new shoes so soon? She is a little rogue, so she is, to kick out her shoes so."

Before the child is a month older her toes are to be seen through her third pair of shoes.

"What!" cries papa, when he is informed of the fact. "Well, I'd just like to know how in thunderation that youngster kicks out her shoes so fast. She wears out more shoes than I do. She'd break up a bank president at this rate."

And when the order for the fifth pair comes, papa observes:

"Well, if this don't beat the Jews! I'd like to know if I've got to get that young one a new pair of shoes every day of her life. I'm tired to death of this thing, Clara. If she wants another pair of shoes this month she can take the pennies out of her bank and buy 'em. I won't."

Poor papa!

"GRANDPA, dear, we hav come to wish you many happy returns of your birthday, and mamma says if you giv us each a dollar we are not to lose it on our way home."

THE grandmamma of two little boys was once obliged to reprove the younger brother. "My dear," said she solemnly, "if you tell lies, God will not love you, and when you die your soul will not go to heaven." "What ith my thoul?" inquired Johnny, pleasantly. "Your soul?" grandmamma was overheard to exclaim. "Your soul, my child, is—I am surprised that a child of your age does not know what his soul is. It is—is it possible that you do not know? Well, then—ahem! Pick up grandmamma's specs, Johnny. There, now, you may run out and play, my dear."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and aronnd them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Church of Practical Religion

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

That Badger Boy at Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF THE GARDEN OF EDEN.

"Now, my dear children, I will read to you of the beautiful garden of Eden, and how it was lost to Adam and Eve." Finishing the story of creation, with that of man, the teacher read the old-time fable so dear to the Christian heart, that boy James then coming to the front, as it were.

"Was monkeys made 'fore man was, mum?"

"Yes, dear; all the animals were made before man."

"Why didn't God make man out of a monkey, which is almost a man, and not out of dust, mum?"

"James Badger, I don't know why, and you needn't ask any such questions."

"No'm. Why didn't God make woman out of dust, and not out of man's rib, mum?"

"Because she was just too nice to be made out of dust, boy."

"Does men turn to dust when they die, mum?"

"Of course they do. From dust they came and to dust they shall return, says the Good Book."

"Which is the good book, mum?—'Rabi'n Nights?'"

"No, you wretched little heathen!—the Bible."

"Does women turn to dust, mum, when they die, same's men does?" (The boy's eyes twinkled, betokening a stroke of fine work, but the teacher dropped not to the significance of the twinkle.)

"Of course they do, child. What a stupid question!"

"Why don't they turn to ribs, mum? From ribs they come and to ribs they shall return."

"James Madison Badger, I've as good mind to send you right home as ever I had to eat."

"Don't, mum. I'll be good. Did God make man in a mold, same's men does plaster angels, mum?"

"No, he didn't, and don't you ask any more such wicked questions."

James was silent a moment while the shepherdess communed with the more receptiv lambs of her flock, and then, striking the fabled "garden," queried:

"Did the garden of Eden hav a nice iron fence, with big gates and brass lions, like Mr. Bondholder's garden, mum?"

"No, it didn't." (Tartly snapped out.)

"What did God put a pizen river into the garden for, mum?"

"He didn't put any 'pizen' river, as you mean for poison, into it, you little wretch. The name of the river—one of the four—was Pison—P-i-s-o-n, you wicked little Philistine!"

"Oh! Did God make the snake that talked and come the bounce on the Eve woman, mum?"

"Of course God made the snake that talked, you wretched little piece of perversity. I don't know what you mean by that ungodly word, 'bounce.'" (Evidently James didn't care, for he continued to get in his fine work.)

"Did God want to bounce Adam and Eve out of the garden, mum?"

"If you mean put them out, by that horrid vulgar word you used, I say No. He wanted them to stay there and be happy."

"Why didn't he drive that talkin' snake into a hole then, so it couldn't a worked the soft sodder racket onto the woman, mum?"

"There's no answering your wicked questions, boy."

"Honest Injin, now, mum, didn't the snake git the bulge on God?"

"You horrid boy! I'll scream for the superintendent."

"Please don't, mum. He's a chump, and ain't half so nice as you." (This taffy mollified the teacher, and she smirked slightly.)

"Good people never ask any questions about what is in the Bible, James."

"That's what ma says, mum, and pop says the blamed fools swaller it whole, like sick folks do pills."

"Your father should not talk so, James." (The oil of the taffy yet held out to burn.)

"Would you climb a tree, mum, to git an apple, if a talkin' snake——"

"Mercy! no, James. The snake would scare me to death, I'm sure!"

"Is there any talkin' snakes now, mum?"

"No, James."

"Why isn't there, mum?"

"I don't know, James, unless God decided that only man should talk."

"Huh! women can break men all up in a talkin' match, mum."

"No woman can beat you talking, you impudence."

"Wouldn't old Comstock hav run Adam and Eve in, if he'd a caught 'em naked, mum?"

"Now you just stop, will you?"

"Yes'm. Why wasn't they ashamed, mum?"

"Because they were pure, and had not sinned, you little heathen, you!"

"When they eat the apple they sinned and was ashamed, wasn't they, mum?"

"Yes, boy."

"They must a took more stock in the snake than in God, didn't they, mum, and so eat the apple?"

"It was the devil in them that made them rebel against God, you awful boy, you."

"Who put the devil in 'em, mum?"

"James Badger, I'll——"

"Yes'm; I'll stop. You wouldn't hav eat the apple, mum, would you?"

"No, I wouldn't, there, now!"

"I'm sorry God didn't make you for Eve, mum, then Adam and you wouldn't a been bounced, and we should all of us lived in that big garden, and had nice times, wouldn't we, mum?"

"Yes, er—well—er—that is—er—now, James, I think you are good at heart—real good—and—er—I'll dismiss the class, now, James. Come next Sunday, that's a good boy." And the Eden seance terminated mellifluously, like the flow of golden honey, as it were.

SI SLOKUM.

Free Speech.

From the Sag Harbor, L. I. (N Y), Corrector.

It is the boast of Americans that they enjoy free speech and the liberty of the press. This is true in part. The right is guaranteed to all citizens by our laws and institutions, but sadly interfered with by individuals and associations. In 1874 a man removed from Illinois to New York, and established a newspaper of Freethought called THE TRUTH SEEKER. Its general tone was offensiv to Christianity, but no one was compelled to read it, and its circulation was limited. A conspiracy was formed to suppress that paper. The editor acted also as book agent. A medico-physiological work was ordered, and sent by him through the mails. He was then arrested on a charge of sending obscene literature through the mails. Portions of this book were read to the jury, who decided the passages came under that head, and the editor was found guilty, and sent to the Albany penitentiary for thirteen months, though the Bible contains some two hundred passages from which no preacher would venture to select a text. He came out broken in health and soon died. They killed the editor, but not THE TRUTH SEEKER. It now occupies a fine building in Lafayette place, New York; the size of the paper and its circulation hav increased; connected with it is a book-store for the dissemination of Freethought documents, and its power for evil or good, as the case may be, is greater than before.

Not long ago, during a period of strikes, a police captain of Chicago charged with his men upon a meeting of the working classes who were listening to the speeches of their leaders. These leaders belonged to a small party called Anarchists, who believe that government is best which governs least, and whose theories are impracticable. Some one up an alley threw a dynamite bomb, which exploded, killing and wounding a number of the police. The guilty party skipped, and has never been found, but five Anarchists were arrested, tried, and hanged for exercising the same right of speech which had been granted them for years—a right Germans value—of blowing off the effects of their potations of beer in blood-and-thunder speeches. Those martyrs of free speech are silent now, but that silence speaks louder than their voices when living. There has been a great increase in Anarchist literature, a pamphlet, "The Facts Concerning the Eight Condemned Leaders," having been published on the east end of Long Island, and a small and insignificant faction elevated into notoriety. Even in Paris the Anarchists are unmolested, and publish their paper, La Revolte, weekly.

There is a class of readers who, when they see an article that does not coincide with their own ideas, jump on the author with savage criticism, attack his religion, or threaten the editor of the paper with loss of patronage if he continues to publish such articles. They would suppress Whittier or Emerson if they could. Thus the liberty of the press is restricted and interfered with. Let these persons consider how much they could assist the overworked editor by selecting, compiling, condensing, or writing an article occasionally and sending it in. We hav contributed in this way to papers in Boston, New York, and other places nearly five hundred, and though occasionally attacked by those who do not understand the progress of the age, the result has been in the main gratifying. If our ideas are somewhat in advance of the age, it will soon catch up. Many of our orthodox clergy preach sermons to-day for which they would hav been expelled from the ministry forty years ago, and the tendency is to greater freedom in speech and writing. And this is as it should be. Truth cannot be suppressed, and error is much more easily refuted when it shows up in print. A newspaper article may contain suggestions worthy of consideration without being a ground for vituperation or personal disputation. Hear all sides, and then decide.

P. ROOSEVELT JOHNSON, M.D.

They Posted the New Pastor.

From the New York Sun.

During the recent blizzard a knot of snowed-in travelers sat around the fireplace in a little hotel up the Penobscot river and discussed politics, the bear crop, and religion. At length they discussed the interesting phases of a dissension which arose of late in a neighboring country congregation, when one of the party remarked that it was all foolishness—that the church committee didn't know how to run the institution. Then he said:

"Speaking of church news, gentlemen, I belonged to a church in Oldtown once that was always in a stew. Some crank was always kicking against something the parson had said in his sermon, and we shifted ministers so often none of them ever stayed long enough to get used to the pulpit. Finally, they appointed a new committee to look for a new parson, and I was one of the committee. Well, we nosed around, and finally hit one that we considered a good man, and sent for him. When he arrived, we went to the parsonage to meet him and kind o' giv him the lay of the land. After speaking of the various rows we'd had in the church, Squire Stover Rines, of the committee, said to the new parson:

"Now, Elder Merrill, we think you'll do first-rate. Here's a good house to liv in, and there's a church to preach in. Your salary is no object, but take my advice and never mention religion or politics in that pulpit."

"Well, and how did that parson come out?" asked some one.

"Come out? He didn't come out at all. He's there yet."

"John's Way" is the very best way.

Riverside, Col. J. ALLEN.

In my estimation, "John's Way" is a grand and truly noble literary structure. After I read it (age twenty-four), my mother read it, then father, and, in fact, all the family (eleven—think of it!) either read it, or heard it read; and my "girl" is now reading it, and I hope and trust it will do its noblest work in her brain.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. ARGUMENT

BY

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

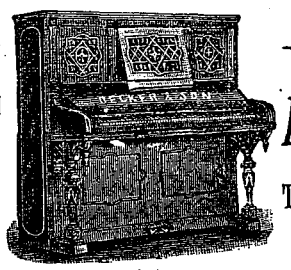
"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, have in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.



The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape have led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. Gems of Thought.

"SEARCH the scriptures" (John v, 39). In the Roman Catholic version it is—"Ye search the scriptures;" and as the Greek verb is the same in the indicativ as in the imperativ mood, they may be warranted in this translation; though I conceive it makes no difference, for the passage even in the indicativ implies divine acquiescence in the propriety of the practice. Either way it proves the duty of searching the scriptures. Cyril of Alexandria agrees with the church of Rome in considering that the passage is declarativ and does not contain a command to search the scriptures; but Chrysostom maintains that it does. Chrysostom says, "John did not say, 'Read the scriptures,' but 'Search the scriptures,'" since the things that are said require much research. For this reason he commands them to search with diligence, that they discover the things that lie deep. —Dr. Cumming's Romanism.

IF we are sometimes inclined to regret that our lot is cast in these unhappy days, let us remember how much more fortunate we are than those who lived a few centuries ago. The workingman enjoys more luxuries to-day than the king of England in Anglo-Saxon times; and at his command are intellectual delights which, but a little while ago, the most learned in the land could not obtain. All this we owe to the labor of other men (John iv, 38). Let us, therefore, remember them with gratitude; let us follow their glorious example by adding something new to the knowledge of mankind; let us pay to the future the debt which we owe to the past. All men, indeed, can not be poets, inventors, or philanthropists; but all men can join in that gigantic and God-like work, the progress of creation. Whoever improves his own nature improves the universe of which he is part. He who strives to subdue his evil passions—vile remnants of the old four-footed life—and who cultivates the social affections; he who endeavors to better his condition, and to make his children wiser and happier than himself, whatever may be his motivs, he will not hav lived in vain.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

"DELIVER us from evil." Gregory Nyssa, Cyril, Chrysostom, Theophylact, and all the Greek fathers hold that this means, Deliver us from Satan; but Cyprian and Augustine, and all the Latin fathers, hold that it means, Deliver us from evil in general.—Dr. Cumming's Lectures on Romanism. [NOTE.—As far as the Greek text goes, there is nothing to settle the dispute, and it is mere impudent dogmatism to cast aside as inadmissible either of the interpretations. Jesus Christ had full belief in the personality of his satanic majesty, and as he had a long ride through the air with that power of the air, it is probable that he meant what the revisers hav given out as, "Deliver us from the evil one." But the old "authorized" translation, "Deliver us from evil," is much more in accordance with the modern style of thought, and if any of my readers make daily use of the Lord's prayer, I advise them to stick to the translation and let the devil alone. Carlyle tells us that he had not repeated the Lord's prayer, or even thought of it, for forty years, when, one night, it flashed on him that "after this manner prayer was worthy of a serious Amen."—Hylax.]

THE peculiarity of the evidence of mathematical truths, is that all the evidence is on one side. There are no objections and no answers to objections. But on every subject in which difference of opinion is possible, the truth depends on a balance to be struck between two sets of conflicting reasons. Even in natural philosophy, there is always some other explanation possible of the same facts; some geocentric theory instead of heliocentric, some phlogiston instead of oxygen; and it has to be shown, and until we know how it is shown, we do not understand the grounds of our opinion.—Mill's Liberty.

SUPPOSE I were to say that when I sat down to write this book, a hand presented itself in the air, took up the pen, and wrote every word that is herein written; would anybody believe me? Certainly they would not. Since, then, a real miracle, were it to happen, would be subject to the same fate as the falsehood, the inconsistency becomes the greater of supposing that the almighty would make use of means that would not answer the purpose for which they were intended, even if they were real.—Paine's Age of Reason.

"YOU forget," said my Catholic opponent who was advocating the worship of the Virgin Mary, "that there is a peculiar blessedness ascribed to the Virgin Mary; for it is written of her, 'Blessed art thou among women;' Mary being obviously selected as the object of peculiar and distinguishing blessedness." I replied that, if this was the principle upon which he acted, I would prove it the duty of the Roman Catholic church to take down every statue and picture of the Virgin, and put up the picture of another woman in its place, for I read in Judges v, 24, "Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, be." If Mary is to be worshiped because she is pronounced to be "blessed among women," a fortiori (so much the more) should Jael be worshiped, for she is blessed above women.—Dr. Cumming's Romanism.—[NOTE.—And yet this Jael is one of the most infamous and detestable wretches that we read of in all history, sacred or profane. Nana Sahib was a scoundrel—Guiteau was—I cannot say how base; but neither of them is fit to hold a candle to Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite.—Hylax.]

DECAYING and moribund religions are, as in this vile persecution of the Jews in Russia and Germany, betaking themselvs to their last resources; they hav lost everything but their myths, once the illusion of the childhood of humanity, but now the scorn of its maturity; once accepted by ignorance, but now contradicted by science; leaving to the clinging believer, whose eyes are closed and ears stopped, no other refuge than the frightful and absurd creed, Credo quia absurdum (I believe because it is absurd).—Victor Hugo.

They neglect to explain whether the sophomore sisters were real mean to the freshmen and positivly rude to the freshwomen, or whether their interest in base-ball or poker interfered with their studies. So far as we hav observed, they do not specify whether the offense was hazing or hard cider, but it must hav been something desperate or leap year would hav bridged it over.

THERE was a card over the bell-handle with the ominous inscription: "Come in; please do not ring." Opening the unlatched door she hastened in with a beating heart, prepared to hear of the critical illness of a member of her friend's family. In the hall the mistress of the household met her, tiptoeing across the hard-wood floor, with finger on her lips. "What is the matter?" gasped the visitor, thoroughly mystified. "Sh!" whispered the other, "it is a meeting of the Browning Club."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Notes and Clippings.

An action has been brought against Rev. Reassure, the "Cowboy Preacher," holding revival meetings in Kansas City, for fraud and swindling.

A Bridgeton, N. J., tomato-grower says he can raise from ten to fifteen tons of tomatoes to the acre, which, at $5.50 per ton, would yield from $55 to $88. Wheat yields but about twenty-five bushels to an acre, at $1, bringing only $25.

Young Prince Barclay was dismissed from the Russian army because his youngest son was christened in the Lutheran faith. His father, the well-known general, was severely reprimanded for not having prevented it, and recently delegates from the holy synod, accompanied by the police, visited the young prince's house and announced that the child would be taken from the mother, as she opposed the fresh christening of her son according to the orthodox rite.

The Christian Leader (Univ.) says: "The Critic suggests that one way in which the Sunday papers may render themselvs at the same time less harmful and more useful, is by giving up a large part of that space to summaries of religious intelligence and opinion, gleaned from the journals—or from other sources—of all the denominations. The suggestion, like many another made to the workers of mischief, is quite too good to be acted on. A Sunday paper made up in the way the Critic contemplates would indeed be a harmless affair. It would also be a very flat business failure. It would not sell."

John Jesus, of Owingsville, Ky., has just been fined for whipping his wife, and Chas. Christ, of Leavenworth, Kan., was hauled into court for keeping a disorderly house. They may be good Christians for all that. But they ought to be in partnership—"Jesus & Christ, Wife-whippers and Hell-raisers."

Of his quarrel with Dr. McGlynn Henry George writes in the last Standard: "So long as it takes two to make a quarrel there shall be no quarrel between me and one who has rendered such service to the good cause, and who is yet, I trust, so capable of rendering further service, as Dr. McGlynn. If, owing to personal idiosyncrasies or divergent views of policy, we cannot work together, we shall at least accomplish some good by working separately, each in his own way, for the same great end."

A number of nuns hav escaped from the Ursuline convent at Pittsburgh, Pa. The trouble arose from a number of French sisters who rebelled against the Roman Catholic church for interfering in their temporal affairs. They claimed the right to conduct the convent as they saw proper, and said the church had no right to interfere. The result was the election of a new mother superior and the silencing of the rebellious nuns. It now appears that they are fleeing from the convent and are making their way to Rome or France. The superiors hav been on the alert, but the sisters hav succeeded in eluding their vigilance, and a number hav escaped. Shortly after their departure another sister was seen walking through the depot. She said she was the mother superior, and she was looking for two of the sisters who had escaped from the Ursuline home at Oakland. The bishop had been previously consulted, and his orders were emphatic that they must be found at any cost and be taken back to the home.

Blue ribbonism is becoming rampant in Scotland, so much so that it is expected that at the next general election candidates for Parliament will be required to pledge themselvs to bring in a bill excluding all persons who partake of spirituous liquors from membership in any religious denomination. A short time ago a brewer left £70,000 to the Free and United Presbyterian church, and the strongest efforts were made to induce those in power to refuse the money. It turned out, however, that there was one characteristic of the Scotch more powerful than their hatred of intemperance, and the money was accepted. Meanwhile, Scotland continues to produce and to consume good whisky in frightful quantities.

The Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal says: "It is astonishing what an amount of sympathy has been wasted by well-meaning people on Mr. Anthony Comstock. An excellent gentleman asks in an expostulatory note: 'Why does the editor of the Freeman's Journal sneer at Anthony Comstock?' The Freeman's Journal never sneers at anybody. It holds that Anthony Comstock ought to be investigated and stopped short. A man in sympathy with the notorious Fulton ought not to be tolerated in the society of decent men. And Mr. Comstock is—or was on December 15, 1887—in sympathy with the infamous calumniator of our priests and of our religion. We do not sneer at Anthony Comstock. If he meant well, much could be pardoned to him. We simply say that when these two Americanisms, the 'fraud' and the 'crank,' are united, the combination writes letters like that of Anthony Comstock on Fulton's book."

In Guayaquil, Ecuador, recently, a public meeting was held against the wishes of the Roman Catholic clergy, who ordered out the soldiers, and commanded them to shoot into the crowd. Five men fell. The funerals of the victims were attended by almost the whole populace, who are indignant at the clergy and demand their expulsion. The Globo says: "No well organized and educated society can remain blind to the culpable and scandalous actions of an ignorant clergy, who are expected to be the teachers of virtue and Christian sobriety. Neither can such a society resign itself patiently to look on at the weakness and debility of authorities who allow all ideas of social and public life to be undermined. Away, then, with those who are culpable. Let no hesitation be shown, because, before everything, public order and the well-being of the community must be considered. Away with the bishop who does not know how to fulfill his duties, and who abandons his flock to the guardianship of a madman at the moment when it most requires pure sacerdotal advice. Away with those pretended pious priests, who now suddenly find in them their most deadly enemies. Thus the government would prove that it loves and respects the populace, whose guardian it is, and the honor of Catholicism, which it must also treat with respect. Cut the evil up by the roots. This bishop and these priests must not remain here if peace is to be restored."

Hav Men Souls?

Generation after generation, men hav been taught that they are of a dual nature, composed of two parts, a body and soul. The idea has been impressed so early upon their minds that they hav accepted it upon authority, without questioning its foundation. And if in after years doubts hav arisen, the first impression has been so deeply rooted that it has prevailed against their better judgments, and they hav clung to the belief with unreasoning tenacity. Yet this, the foundation of modern religions, rests upon no evidence at all.

I say of modern religions, for when men first worshiped gods they had no expectation of reward in another life, but merely hoped to win temporal blessings, or avert earthly evils. Even the authors of the Old Testament, to whom those of the New constantly appeal for evidence of the soundness of their own doctrin, seem not to hav taken the subject into their consideration. At least, if they admitted the existence of spirit or soul in man as distinct from his corporal nature, it was only an infusion of the divine life, the breath of God's nostrils, sufficient to animate the senseless clay for a time, but perishing or returning to its original source when the man died. In all the 929 chapters, from the first of Genesis to the last of Malachi, there is just one little passage, and that in one of the later prophets, which asserts the immortality of the soul. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. xii, 2). Even that passage speaks only of many, and not of all or most. It seems rather to imply that, for special reasons, some, for their good or for their ill, shall be excepted from the great majority, who will be left to "sleep in the dust of the earth" in eternal, unbroken oblivion.

Only in one other instance is mention made of any existence after death. It is that of Samuel raised at Saul's request by the witch of Endor. But in that case, although the spirit becomes visible and speaks, there is no allusion to its immortality. It appears as it was in life, not glorified or changed. It does not descend from the skies, but comes up out of the earth in which it was buried. It rises in the form of an old man covered with a mantle, and as if roused from slumber, pettishly inquires, "Why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up" (1 Sam. xxviii, 15)? According to the teaching of Christians, the soul, essentially immortal, being released from the confines of the body, can no more be affected by earthly things, but must eternally enjoy the perfection of bliss, or suffer forever unutterable woe, under entirely new conditions. Samuel is represented as a spirit at a modern séance. He appears as he was in life, clothed "in his habit as he lived," and still "of the earth earthy." He has no resemblance to a Christian saint in glory. He carries no harp, and wears no white robe or golden crown. He utters no word concerning everlasting life, but murmurs at being roused from eternal oblivion.

It is certain, then, that, with the possible exception of Daniel, the Old Testament writers had no expectation of an existence hereafter. They record many promises made by God to his people, and a still greater number of threats, but all had reference to this world only. In Exodus xx we hav ten commandments given by Jehovah for the moral guidance of his worshipers, and to the observance of one of them is attached a reward. It is a reward, however, to be received in this life, and even postpones an entrance into a future state of bliss, if any such there be. "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." If anywhere in the Hebrew scriptures there were an assurance of a future life, we might expect to meet with it in Ecclesiastes. There we find the Preacher handing down to us words of real wisdom, the fruit, if not of divine inspiration, of that which is much better—actual human experience. He is drawing near the close of a long and prosperous life. Power, wealth, and knowledge hav all been his, and he is known as the "wisest of men." He passes judgment upon all the good and evil things there are upon the earth, and his judgment is this: "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity" (Eccl. i, 2). He does not say that, this life of vanity over, another and a better existence is beyond. He laments the injustice "that all things are alike to all; there is one event to the righteous and the wicked; to the good and to the clean and to the unclean" (ix, 2). Another world, where all this shall be rectified, is always the refuge of the modern preacher when this subject is brought before him. But the "wisest of men" knew nothing of it. He left the justice of God unvindicated, and continued: "After that they go to the dead" (3); they are carried to the silent grave. They are hidden in the bosom of the earth. Others take their places. They, too, will laugh and weep, feast and fast, grow rich or poor in their turns, each in his own brief span, and then they, too, will "go to the dead." But from this death will they ever awake to know fresh joys or sorrows? Not so, according to the Preacher. "The dead know not anything, neither hav they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten" (5). "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that a man hath no preëminence above a beast: for all is vanity" (iii, 19).

The idea of the immortality of the soul is no part of either the Jewish or Christian so-called revelation. By the former it was ignored; in the latter it was assumed. It arose in the minds of speculativ philosophers, who sought to reconcile the inequalities of human life with the principle of divine justice. It was gladly received by the poor and suffering, who, finding little joy in this world, were willing to hope for a better. It was eagerly seized on by priests, who saw the increase of power they could derive from its adoption. Not originally a part of any religion, it has become the base upon which the faith of each individual believer has been raised.

Before advancing knowledge gods retired till they passed beyond the limits of this world. They no longer govern the elements, nor direct the affairs of men. Times of prayer and thanksgiving for temporal blessings are sometimes appointed. Nations feast and make sport when these days come round, and but few even remember that they are monuments to a dead superstition. We know that storm and sunshine, heat and cold, come each in its due course, obeying natural laws, neither hastened nor impeded by petition and sacrifice. No intercession will stay the lightning or roll back the flood. No prayer will cause the rain to descend upon the earth, or the harvest to ripen for the sickle. Man has no interest in gods, in any matter of which he possesses knowledge. Take away the unknown hereafter, and the occupation of priests and ministers is forever gone.

Has man, then, an immortal soul? Revelation, whether it be real or false, has never declared it. In the Old Testament it is denied; and in the New Testament, where immortality is spoken of, it is associated with the resurrection of the body. "For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain" (1 Cor. xv, 16, 17). Science owns it to be beyond her sphere, at least so far as she has at present extended it. It remains a merely speculativ matter, which each may guess at for himself, but none in this life can ever know. But, in guessing, the use of reason is not excluded. We cannot prove, but we can examin the evidence on both sides, and judge which has the greater value.

What is the soul, the spirit, the mind? What is that part of us, if any, which is distinct from the body, and which we hav been taught livs on when that is crumbled into dust? It is beyond the cognizance of our senses. We cannot see it, hear it, taste it, smell it, or feel it. Yet it is through our senses that we acquire all the knowledge we hav. It is said to be immaterial, but we hav no experience of any substance distinct from matter, and are unable to conceive the existence of such. We attribute to it certain powers—the memory, the understanding, and the will. But these are qualities of our physical nature. They had no existence before we were born. Why should we suppose that they will liv on after we are dead? They did not even come into being with us, but made their appearance after the senses had furnished them with objects on which to operate. We saw and heard; then after a while we began to remember what we saw and heard. Later on we understood that some objects were associated with pleasurable and others with painful sensations. Then our wills came into play, and we learned to "refuse the evil and to choose the good." Had we been born without senses, we should hav had no memory, no understanding, and no will. What were our souls a century ago? We had no will, memory, or understanding then, and our souls, if they existed, were dull blocks of empty, formless spirit. If they did not exist, we hav no reason to suppose that, having no being so short a time since, they will liv on forever. We hav no just cause to conclude that a substance, material or immaterial, distinct from the body, but which only acts through the body, and of which we know nothing, has any reality at all.

It is the way of ignorance, seeking extrication from one difficulty, to create another as great, or greater. Atlas bore the earth upon his shoulders, but who or what supported Atlas? Jehovah made the world, but who made Jehovah? We know not in what manner man exercises certain powers, intellectual, moral, and religious, so we create in fancy a soul to exercise them for him. But if that soul did not exist before life began in the body, why suppose that it continues after the body's death? And if we know not how the powers we attribute to the soul operate, but know that their operation is in and by the body, why should we go beyond the body, of which we hav knowledge, and imagin a soul, of which we hav none?

To those who contend that the soul is immortal, I would say, first prove that there is a soul, or at least giv reasonable grounds for believing it.

The immaterial can never be known to us, as all our knowledge is built upon experience, acquired through our senses, which are exercised through material organs, and take cognizance only of matter. Therefore it is equally absurd to assert or deny the existence of anything distinct from matter. But those powers which we call mental or spiritual are so intimately connected with the body that, although the manner of their action is as yet unknown, it is much more natural to think that they are corporal than it is to imagin a soul for the purpose of attributing to it their exercise. And this more especially as the manner in which the imagined soul exercises them can be no more intelligible to us than that of the real body. Having come into existence after our birth, they grow with our growth, and strengthen with our strength. They decay also with the outward frame, but, in most cases, somewhat later, as they developed later. In sickness they are disordered together with the body. Memory givs birth to fantastic forms in delirium. The understanding becomes clouded. The will weakens and grows perverted. Accident may destroy any or all of these powers. A blow on the head may make the wisest man an idiot, or deprive him altogether of consciousness, yet he may liv on. His soul, if he hav any, has not fled. Disease may impair, and medicin restore, these powers. Narcotics will suspend them. That which will affect the brain or nerves will affect the mental condition, and even sometimes completely change the moral nature. It seems more reasonable to conclude that these powers belong to the body than to attribute them to a fancied soul, distinct from it, but affected simultaneously with it.

It may be urged that since it is admitted that nothing can be absolutely known on either side, the subject is not worth discussion. I cannot agree with this opinion. Although religious belief, in the history of the world, preceded the idea of immortality or even that of duality in man, it is certain that in these days the creed of each individual believer is erected substantially upon these notions. How much time, energy, and substance wasted might be saved, how many greedy paupers, feeding on the industrious poor, compelled to earn their bread honestly by the sweat of their own brows, were these creeds swept away! With ignorant or knavish bigots howling round us, exhorting men and women to neglect the world they are in and save their souls for another, it may be worth while to ask their dupes sometimes to pause and consider what it will profit a man to lose the whole world in the hope of saving his soul, if he hav no soul to save.

The Kansas Outrage.

Must the battle for free speech and free press be fought over and over again in a land whose Constitution makes this right a basic principle, and denies to Congress the power to enact any law abridging it?

How strange that, in this nineteenth century, more than a hundred years after the adoption of the federal Constitution, we must see Liberals arrested and imprisoned because, forsooth, they are Infidel to the church, which is determined to stop all discussion of the most vital of all subjects, that of the subjugation of woman to man in marriage!

It is for daring to defend the natural right of women "to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," her right to the ownership and control of her own person, the most sacred of all rights, and without which no other rights can be maintained, that Walker and Harman hav been arrested, and are likely to be imprisoned, under the ridiculous charge of obscenity. Is it any more obscene to expose the villainy of rape inside of marriage than outside, that they should be set upon by the bloodhounds of the law, while every paper in the country would cry out as one man against such an outrage outside of the "sacred institution?" How can the statement of such outrages be obscene in the one case and not in the other?

The reason of their persecution is this—the church knows perfectly well that she holds her power over the people by virtue of woman's subjugation and ignorance, and so long as she keeps her in terror lest she lose her good name as a wife, so long as she can keep her willing and satisfied to be, as now, the property of her husband, as is his horse or dog, with the difference only of right of transfer, so long she can count on a servil, cringing race of sycophants, hypocrits, and religious bigots, who will do all in their power to perpetuate the infamy called religion, that is always ready to persecute, in every possible manner, any and all who will not bow down and worship at her blood-stained shrine.

I am amazed that there can be a Freethinker so obtuse that he cannot see the true animus of all these persecutions of the bravest and best in our ranks.

The question is not whether we believe in the same doctrins that do Walker and Harman. It is, Do we believe we hav a right to express our opinions and send them through the mails? If we demand that as our right, then, if we hav any conception of the meaning of justice, we must demand it for every other person, no matter what may be his opinions. Anything less than this is tyranny.

If this agent of the church, Comstock, and his pals, prosecute with intent to stop their work, as in the case of these brave, logical, and chaste writers, whose lives are consecrated to the work of educating and elevating the masses out of the ruts of superstition, whether found in church or state, every Liberal should feel that it is his or her own liberty that is being invaded, for we sink or swim together, and rush to the rescue with voice, pen, and purse, until this caricature upon manhood, and the dark minions that back him, shall be compelled to retire within their own domain, leaving the track of progress open to be traveled in peace by an intelligent, growing people. C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

GEORGETOWN, COL., Feb. 1st, 2d, 3d.—The journey from Denver to Georgetown on the Union Pacific railroad is one succession of wonders and scenes of wild, romantic interest. The railroad track is through a cañon so narrow in many places that the stupendous mountains of rock, towering hundreds and hundreds of feet high, almost touch the cars on each side. The train winds in and out in serpentine course, now creeping up the mountain side, now along the splashing, roaring waters of the ravine, affording a succession of surprises, till the arrival at Georgetown, a wonderful city, wedged in by mountains on every side, perhaps the surprise of all. Georgetown is a flourishing mining camp, although much shorn of its pristin glory. The rush and wild excitement over the first prospecting and consequent speculation in the wondrous gold and silver deposits in the adjacent mountains some time since subsided, and now all are getting down to solid, practical work.

I had three very large and deeply interested audiences; as usual, at the last lecture the largest number, testing to the utmost the seating capacity of the Opera House. I sold a large quantity of Liberal books and pamphlets, secured a number of subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and was made glad by the testimony of several that they had been benefited by the lectures. A number of worthy, intelligent persons were added to the Liberal ranks.

In Georgetown, as in every place I hav visited in Colorado, there is very great need of organization. If the Liberals of Colorado were thoroughly organized, they would be a mighty power for good, and compose the largest, most intelligent, and influential society in the state. If the American Secular Union would only prepare leaflets, "How to organize a local Secular Union and insure success alike educational and social," and "How to inaugurate and conduct a science school successfully without a professor or experienced teacher," it would be doing something toward fulfilling its mission, and there would then be little difficulty in forming local Unions, with science schools on Sundays, and social advantages that would insure their becoming a power for good; and, as they grew in influence and numbers, they would in turn help sustain the American Secular Union. But to simply hav a number of Liberals enroll their names, elect officers, pay for a charter, and then be left to struggle along, without aid, instruction, or encouragement from the parent society, is worse than useless; it tends to discourage instead of help. Let the American Secular Union prepare such leaflets as above mentioned, and if they are up to the requirement there will be no lack of funds to hav such leaflets printed and effectually distributed.

If the lecturers are not enthusiastic in soliciting donations to the American Secular Union, it is because the American Secular Union indulges only in ambiguous generalizations of vague, undefined future good intentions, instead of real, practical, immediate work.

If the American Secular Union will propose some feasible, practical plan of work that will commend itself to those desirous to aid the progress of Freethought, the lecturers will enthusiastically respond, solicit contributions, and neither ask, need, nor accept bribes or commissions for so doing.

I enjoyed the hospitality of those dear old veterans, Wm. Haywood and wife; the sterling worker, T. S. Old, and his noble wife, who is his faithful helpmate in every good work; the beloved J. Forrest; the postmaster, Robert G. Old, the Colorado pioneer miner, and the genial, handsome, young, model boniface Louis Dupuy, of the Hotel de Paris, who keeps the very best hotel in Colorado, has the finest library, the happiest disposition, and is one of the best read men and earnest thinkers of the Liberal ranks. Space forbids mention of all the noble band of Liberal men and women at Georgetown. What a splendid Liberal society they would make!

On Saturday, in company with friend R. O. Old, I took the trip round the marvelous Loop on the Union Pacific railroad, from Georgetown to Silver Plume. This piece of railroad is a marvel of engineering skill, a triumph of human genius over the seeming impossible. The train leaving Georgetown climbs up round the side of one of the mountains, then turns a half-circle, crossing the roaring waters of the ravine, back up the side of the other mountain, climbing higher and higher; then makes another half-circle, crossing the ravine and its own track upon a high trestle bridge, thus going around a perfect loop, then on to Silver Plume.

Near Silver Plume is Sherman mountain. At its base is the ranch of friend Robert Old. In the mountain, a tremendous mass of granit towering twelve to fifteen hundred feet above the ranch, which is itself hundreds of feet above Georgetown, is the celebrated Mendota mine, and the great Victoria tunnel, now owned solely by friend Old.

Donning a miner's coat and hat, and armed with a stout staff and lighted candle, I entered the tunnel, which is bored and blasted out of the solid rock—a passage-way eight feet square and extending 1,280 feet into the very heart of the mountain. There were side tunnels, one east 260 feet long and one west 594 feet. There were a number of shafts hundreds of feet up—openings from sides of the mountain—down which the valuable ore, mined away up the mountain, is dumped, caught in cars, and run out to the mouth of the mine on a rail-track that extended the length of the tunnel, thus saving the expense of carrying the ore mined above down the mountain on jacks. These are little donkeys, small as baby calves, very large-headed and sure-footed. They are driven fifteen or twenty together. The ore is packed in small bags containing about 150 pounds each, and these little creatures carry one on each side. At first it seems incredible that such little creatures could ever bring down the steep mountains five or six railroad cars of ore, but with them it is a thing of custom.

The Mendota mine shows a strong crevice carrying between well-defined walls an ore vein truly massiv. The great Victoria tunnel in continuing its present course through Sherman mountain is cutting one of the finest groups of fissure lodes known. Some idea of the wealth of the mine may be formed from the fact that eleven tons of its ore yeilded 759 ounces of silver and 11,730 pounds of lead.

Away up the mountains, 2,000 feet skyward, I scarcely expected much from the promis of lunch at the ranch, occupied by Foreman Griffiths and family, but I was surprised to find, on our exit from the mine, a most elegant luncheon, excellently cooked and tastefully served; after which I returned to Georgetown. A delegation of friends were awaiting me at the depot, to whom bidding kind farewell, I reëntered the cars and sped on to Leadville.

LEADVILLE, COL., Feb. 5th.—I received an invitation to visit this celebrated mining camp, now a flourishing city, from that right royal, generous-hearted gentleman, Joseph Henry. Unfortunately the Opera House could not be secured, and even the Turner's Hall could be had on Sunday only. That enterprising Liberal, Mr. Fred Hobert, took the management and all responsibility. I expected very slim attendance when I found the out-of-the-way location of the hall, but when I discovered the admission fee was fifty cents and no half-price I was sure I had found the place in Colorado where I should lecture to empty seats. Yet, despite all this, I had good attendance. On Sunday afternoon I had the pleasure to see and receive the hearty hand-shake of that doughty champion of Freethought and free speech, Moses Hull. I deeply regret my engagements at Delta prevented the possibility of staying over to cultivate his acquaintance and that of the many earnest Liberals at Leadville.

The evening attendance was larger than that of the afternoon, and there is a general desire that I should return, and friends will secure the Opera House for me to deliver a whole course of lectures.

Lincoln and Liquor.

I desire THE TRUTH SEEKER to be illumined with these lucid and piercing sentences from one whom every lover of country, honesty, and liberty cannot help but hold in highest esteem. They are the burning words of Abraham Lincoln on the banefulness of alcoholic liquor, and entitle his name to lead the list of "intemperate temperance advocates" which should be on the calendar of the apologists of the drink curse:

Turn now to the temperance revolution. In it we shall find a stronger bondage broken, a viler slavery manumitted, a greater tyrant deposed; in it, more of want supplied, more disease healed, and more sorrow assuaged. By it no orphans starving, no widows weeping; by it none wounded in feeling, none injured in interest—even the dram-maker and dram-seller will hav glided into other occupations so gradually as never to hav felt the change, and will stand ready to join all others in the universal song of gladness. . . . And when the victory shall be complete—when there shall be neither a slave nor a drunkard on the earth—how proud the title of that land which may truly claim to be the birthplace and the cradle of both those revolutions that shall hav ended in that victory! How nobly distinguished that people who shall hav planted and nurtured to maturity both the political and moral freedom of their species!

These are noble words, and they honor the head and heart of the author of the Emancipation proclamation, and until tyranny indorses his Gettysburg address the rumocrats will not quote this irrefutable indictment of their slavery-producing traffic. So, as rascals hav for ages forged utterances of the gods, to manufacture a religion to cover their infamy, now lying, forgery, and fraud are the reeking characteristics of the black-blooded royalty of rumdom, and the fiends hav not scrupled to commit the sacrilege of attributing to our martyred president and total abstainer the ensuing clap-trap of the tap-room:

Prohibition will work great evil to the cause of temperance. It is a species of intemperance within itself, for it goes beyond the bounds of reason in that it attempts to control a man's appetite by legislation and in making crimes out of things that are not crimes. A prohibitory law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our government was founded. I hav always been found laboring to protect the weaker classes from the stronger, and I can never giv my consent to such a law as you propose to enact. Until my tongue be silenced in death, I will continue to fight for the rights of man.

And this rubbish, too, on a cartoon of Lincoln with an emancipated slave kneeling before him in the act of kissing the hand of the great shackle-smasher. The abomination was got up by the genius of the rum barons of Atlanta, Ga., and thus they gained their villainous victory.

It is a disgrace to our institutions, a blot on our civilization, a shame for our magistrates, that pernicious men should be permitted to deceive the ignorant colored people in this way. I join with all the sober-minded in protest against such mockery.

Philadelphia, Pa. JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Religious Mania.

Not long ago, the Chicago Evening Journal said:

Every teacher of Infidelity, of a Christless civilization and culture, of contempt for religion and its divine truths, of disbelief in a Christian gospel, is an Anarchist in his heart, and his teachings lead to such scenes as those of the Reign of Terror in France and of the dynamite tragedy in Chicago. From Voltaire down to Bob Ingersoll, every public teacher who has taught disbelief in God, in the Bible, in a future life, and in human accountability, is responsible for the blood that has been shed in war against social law and in atonement for crimes against society and its law.

There are men whose daily lives are possibly more impure than those of the Anarchist teachers—who violate moral law, the law of home, the law of business, and the laws of propriety. But they are not, like the Anarchists, the enemies of society. They are opposed to lawlessness and ruin. The Anarchist, however pure his private life, is an enemy of order. He would overturn and demolish every existing law, every social regulation, every form of faith, and every method of civilized mankind. If society cannot be overturned by peaceful methods, he believes that forceful and bloody methods should be adopted. For this reason, a lawless and immoral man, whose practices, habits, and life are bad, who may even be a criminal as regards property rights or violence, if he has a theoretical belief in God, is a good man and a valuable member of society as compared with the Infidel, who, however pure his life, denies the existence of deity, the truth of divine teachings, and the gospel that was taught by Jesus Christ.

The Christian Advocate, Methodist organ of this city, adds:

In the above there is one sentence which might mislead. In showing that the Infidel is an injurious member of society, the writer says that "a lawless and immoral man" is, in comparison with the Infidel, "a good man and a valuable member of society." At that point he was heated by his rhetoric. The best that can be said of the lawless and immoral man is that he is less dangerous to society than the Infidel. Infidelity and Anarchy are closely allied. As the writer above quoted justly says: "Anarchy begins in, Infidelity too begins in, a denial and defiance of God. . . . Irreligion, a denial of Christianity, disbelief in Bible truth, are the pernicious seed from which this pernicious fruit has proceeded."

Let honest Christians think these statements over, and decide if they will support a theology which makes a certain belief, concerning things about which no man has absolute knowledge, worse than the most immoral conduct. According to the Chicago Journal, Colonel Ingersoll, for instance, whose every day of life is enriched with some good deed, some quiet aid to human distress—he is worse than the lecherous priest, the thieving cashier, or the murderer of men! According to the Advocate, he is more dangerous to society!

From such a religion, good Lord, deliver us!

Always On the Side of the Oppressor.

Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost in Christian Union.

The church never was known to attack a vested wrong until popular opinion drove her to it. She dabbles in dilettante reform slightly, more missions, better tenement houses, cooking schools, associated charities (all but the missions begin and end in essays and newspaper articles, for the most part); but let a prophet point out a radical defect in the social system, which must be changed before anything of worth can be accomplished, and the church is as deaf as an adder. She would not see the evil of slavery until everybody else had. She will not even try to see the evils which make and keep the people poor. "As much charity as you like for the worthy poor," says the church, "but talk not of social injustice, else we shall hav to look upon you as one who threatens vested rights. Let the poor be contented, sober, and industrious in this best of countries, and cultivate habits of church-going and Sabbath-keeping, and all will be well. If they suffer, it is their own fault." I believe that history and passing events alike attest the truthfulness of what I say.

Important Agitation of Secular Principles in Chicago, Detroit, and Quincy.

The secretary made a flying trip to Detroit on the evening of the 7th, supposing that arrangements for a lecture the succeeding night were being perfected. As to the anticipated meeting, however, his mission was a failure, as the party he relied on for the preliminary work couid not devote the requisit time. Nevertheless, I hope soon to return, when the disappointment can only be on the part of the audience. That will be my opportunity for justifiable retribution. While in Detroit my visit was made agreeable by the veteran Freethinker Edward Chope, and his sons, and my friend Carl Sclulenberg. I readily enlisted Mr. Chope as a life member in the American Secular Union and in my next will introduce him to your readers in the "Roll of Honor." A meeting will be arranged in March or April, and we shall hav the pleasure of assisting in stirring up this stronghold of orthodoxy.

During my two days' sojourn the Detroit common council, and the entire community, were shaken from center to circumference, while your correspondent had the ineffable satisfaction of reading the indignant fluttering of the morning papers at what they styled the "insulting resolutions" which had disgraced their council chamber. It was the most sensational session the Detroit common council had held in a long time—for Detroit was formerly my home and I am somewhat familiar with its political picnics. The headlines and the editorials all denounced Alderman Jacobs for "insulting the intelligence and respectability of the city" by offering the following:

WHEREAS, The state law exempts all property owned and occupied for religious, educational, and charitable purposes from taxation; and,

WHEREAS, The value of such property in this city aggregates some $7,000,000, or about 5 per cent of the total assessed valuation of all property assessed for taxation for the year 1887; and,

WHEREAS, They receive all the benefits of municipal government, such as police and fire protection, without contributing anything to the expense thereof; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the committee on license be and they are hereby directed to prepare and present to this council a schedule of license fees to be paid annually by all churches, hospitals, asylums, private or denominational schools, together with all hotels, restaurants, lunch-houses, club-houses, opera houses, public halls, and places of amusement, skating rinks, toboggan slides, baseball and cricket grounds, sporting houses, and all houses of prostitution; also all railroad corporations.

Had a dynamite bomb been thrown into the council chamber, it could scarcely hav created greater consternation, and it took some seconds for the members to draw a breath long enough to reply. When Alderman Burt arose to his feet, he moved that "a committee be appointed to examin into Alderman Jacobs's sanity."

Then there was a chorus, "I think so, too."

A motion was then made to indefinitly postpone the resolution, but Alderman Jacobs's friends did not wish to do that; they wished to hav it aired.

Several city fathers desired to place themselvs right before the church-going community, and protested against coupling churches with houses of prostitution generally in this style.

Alderman Trombly: "I am astonished at such a resolution being brought here. It is preposterous. The resolution ought to be killed right here."

Alderman Jacobs boldly returned to the attack. "I don't believe that Alderman Trombly should tax me for his religion—to support his church. It is the same with railroad property. The firemen run first to railroad property, or to a costly church that doesn't pay a cent of taxes, and let the poor man's cottage burn."

Alderman Gilmore thought church property, charitable institutions, and hospitals should pay taxes, but he did not believe in coupling them with houses of prostitution.

After further discussion, the motion to indefinitly postpone was defeated—16 to 14. Then a motion was adopted by a large majority to "strike out churches, charitable institutions, and hospitals."

So the Secular portion of the resolution is, for the time being, defeated. However, Alderman Jacobs is still in the ring and ready to make it unpleasant for the pious tax-dodgers, even if it is considered an "insult" to their intelligence. All honor to Alderman Jacobs for his manly, though impolitic, resolutions.

This proves that the harvest is ripe for Secular work in the city of Detroit, but the laborers are few and hard to be found. I hope that Alderman Jacobs's fusilade may be the effectiv forerunner to future Secular success, and that soon our declaration of "Justice for all; privileges for none," shall find a stanch band of adherents in the city of Detroit.

OUR CAUSE IN QUINCY, ILL.

Some months ago I was in this city where Romanism holds almost undisputed sway, and sought out some one to take an activ interest in the work of the American Secular Union. I mentioned in my articles to the Freethought press that I had made the acquaintance of Mr. I. S. Lee, whom I found anxious to espouse the cause as lecturer and organizer. Subsequently I commissioned Judge Lee as special agent, and he has proved a splendid worker. He has built up a society, obtained a charter, given lectures in Merrick Hall, and induced a young gentleman, the son of a minister and a student at the college, to take the Liberal platform with him. The society in Quincy numbers some of its leading citizens and solid business men.

For his first lecture, Judge Lee strewed the town with hand-bills on "The Battle for Freethought—State vs. Church," and evinces a determination to keep the battle raging till Quincy shall hav as fine an organization as any in Illinois.

W. B. Lewis, the young collegiate Agnostic, was warmly applauded for his lecture last Sunday on "God's Gentlemen: Joshua, David."

Brother Lee has not accomplished his work without opposition, for while obtaining money for the Campaign Fund of the American Secular Union, some of the malicious spirits of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union laid information before the chief of police that he was obtaining money under false pretenses. It happens there are a number of people in Quincy who know the secretary of the American Secular Union, and it did not take long to disprove the insinuation and turn the enemy's flank. However, with usual alacrity, the reporter of the Whig got in a little additional misrepresentation to please the pious majority, but I notice that inside of twenty-four hours it published a retraction, a polite apology, and the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union.

Judge Lee is a born doubter, a lover of independence—a Freethinker and Secularist "grounded and rooted in bed-rock granit," as a friend remarks. He is familiar with all the religious philosophies, and is an explorer in the domain of nature, and I hope that the friends of Freethought and Secular justice in southern Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri will furnish him plenty of employment in the near future in the work he loves to perform.

JOTTINGS.

The Chicago Secular Union continues to hav crowded houses, and has engaged a splendid professional quartet for its regular Sunday evening services, which will be under the leadership of Brother M. J. S. Card. There is nothing too good for Chicago.

Clerical scandals hav become epidemic, and the most scandalous of all is the Brushingham case in Chicago—a young girl betrayed, a mother and penniless, while a pitiless congregation profess to believe in the innocence of their shepherd. The frequency of those scandals has taken all the sensation of novelty out of them, and our Freethought friends will doubtless thank me for ignoring the salacious details. Those "divines" are much more devilish than men.

Dr. Severance's address at the Chicago Secular Union on Sunday night, January 29th, is out in pamphlet form, as is also that of the writer at the entertainment the following evening.

The Chicago Union contemplates celebrating Thomas Jefferson's birthday, April 13th—which reminds me that to-day (January 20th) is the birthday of the great epoch-maker of France, Francois Marie Arouet, better known as Voltaire. He who was born one hundred and ninety-four years ago to-day literally crushed old systems of theology, and though his wit and sarcasm twice brought him to the Bastile and exile they finally brought him a deathless fame.

We hav men in our own time, let us not forget, who are making history; who are revolutionizing the thought of the period, and spreading the light of mental liberty in the dark places of orthodoxy, prominent among whom is our president, S. P. Putnam. He is now somewhere in the vicinity of Santa Barbara, and hopes the friends at San José, at Gilroy, and Livermore may greet him the latter part of April. He will speak in San Francisco again in May. From June 13th to 21st, he will labor in Coos county, Ore. June 22d, he will orate at the anniversary of the Silverton Secular Union, in their new Freethought Hall. From thence he will pass on to Molalla, Stayton, McMinnville, Salem, Portland, Vancouver, Forest Grove, and Hillsboro. He will make the national bird scream at Eagle Creek on the "glorious Fourth," and then descend the Columbia to Astoria, Cathlamet, and other places, where our Secular friends will, I hope, make way for the pilgrim of Freethought, and not fail to hav him lecture in places near where he is already announced. His address is 504 Kearny street, San Francisco.

Art and Morality.

From the North American Review.

Art is the highest form of expression, and exists for the sake of expression. Through art thoughts become visible. Back of the forms is the desire, the longing, the brooding, creativ instinct, the maternity of mind, the passion that givs pose and swell, outline and color.

Of course, there is no such thing as absolute beauty or absolute morality. We now clearly perceive that beauty and conduct are relativ. We hav outgrown the provincialism that thought is back of substance, as well as the old Platonic absurdity that ideas existed before the subjects of thought. So far, at least, as man is concerned, his thoughts hav been produced by his surroundings, by the action and interaction of things upon his mind; and so far as man is concerned, things hav preceded thoughts. The impressions that these things make upon us are what we know of them. The absolute is beyond the human mind. Our knowledge is confined to the relations that exist between the totality of things that we call the universe and the effect upon ourselvs.

Actions are deemed right or wrong according to experience and the conclusions of reason. Things are beautiful by the relation that certain forms, colors, and modes of expression bear to us. At the foundation of the beautiful will be found the fact of happiness, the gratification of the senses, the delight of intellectual discovery, and the surprise and thrill of appreciation. That which we call the beautiful wakens into life through the association of ideas, of memories, of experiences—through suggestions of pleasure past and the perception that the prophecies of the ideal hav been fulfilled.

Art cultivates and kindles the imagination, and quickens the conscience. It is by imagination that we put ourselvs in the place of another. When the wings of that faculty are folded, the master does not put himself in the place of the slave; the tyrant is not locked in the dungeon, chained with his victim. The inquisitor did not feel the flames that devoured the martyr. The imaginativ man, giving to the beggar, givs to himself. Those who feel indignant at the perpetration of wrong, feel for the instant that they are the victims; and when they attack the aggressor they feel that they are defending themselvs. Love and pity are the children of the imagination.

A little while ago I heard a discussion in regard to the genius of George Eliot. The gentleman who appeared as her champion took the ground that she was a very great novelist, a most wonderful writer, and gave as a reason that her books were written with a distinct moral purpose; that she was endeavoring to inculcate the value of character, of integrity, of an absolute and utter devotion to duty, to the glory and heroism of self-denial; that she did not create characters for the sake of Art, but that under all, and in all, and over all, was the desire to teach and enforce some moral truth.

Upon this very question George Eliot has given her views with great force and beauty: "On its theoretic and perceptiv side, morality touches science; on its emotional side, art. Now, the products of art are great in proportion as they result from that immediate prompting of innate power which we call genius, and not from labored obedience to a theory or rule; and the presence of genius, or innate prompting, is directly opposed to the perpetual consciousness of a rule. The action of faculty is imperious, and excludes the reflection why it should act. In the same way, in proportion as morality is emotional, i. e., has affinity with art, it will exhibit itself in direct sympathetic feeling and action, and not as the recognition of a rule. Love does not say, 'I ought to love;' it loves. Pity does not say, 'It is right to be pitiful;' it pities. Justice does not say, 'I am bound to be just;' it feels justly. It is only where moral emotion is comparativly weak that the contemplation of a rule or theory mingles with its action, and in accordance with this we think experience, both in literature and life, has shown that the minds which are preëminently didactic, which insist on a 'lesson,' and despise everything that will not convey a moral, are deficient in sympathetic emotion. . . . .

"A certain poet is recorded to hav said that he 'wished everything of his burnt that did not impress some moral; even in love-verses it might be flung in by the way.' What poet was it who took this medicinal view of poetry? Dr. Watts, or James Montgomery, or some other singer of spotless life and ardent piety? Not at all. It was Waller. A significant fact in relation to our position, that the predominant didactic tendency proceeds rather from the poet's perception that it is good for other men to be moral, than from any overflow of moral feeling in himself. A man who is perpetually thinking in apothegms, who has an unintermittent flux of admonition, can hav little energy left for simple emotion."

This tendency, this "disposition to see a rebuke or a warning in every natural object," was called by George Eliot the "pedagogic fallacy;" and yet a gentleman well acquainted with her writings givs a reason for the admiration he entertains for her genius that she would hav repudiated with the greatest warmth.

Nothing to the true artist, to the real genius, is so contemptible as the "medicinal view."

John Quincy Adams had the goodness to write his views about some of the plays of Shakspere. He read "Othello," and read it for the purpose of finding out what lesson Shakspere was endeavoring to teach. Mr. Adams gravely tells us that the play was written for two purposes; first, to impress upon the minds of men and maidens that no one should marry out of his or her blood; and second, that where a girl married contrary to the wishes of her parents she rarely ever came to any good. He regarded Shakspere very much as he did a New England minister, and supposed that he wrote "those plays" for the purpose of inducing children to mind their mothers.

Probably Mr. Adams believed that "Romeo and Juliet" was written for the purpose of bringing vividly before the mind the danger of love at first sight, and that "Lear," the greatest tragedy in human speech, was produced to show that fathers could not safely divide their property among their children.

Our fathers read with great approbation the mechanical sermons in rhyme written by Milton, Young, and Pollok. Those theological poets wrote for the purpose of convincing their readers that the mind of man is diseased, filled with infirmities, and that poetic poultices and plasters tend to purify and strengthen the moral nature of the human race.

Poems were written to prove that the practice of virtue was an investment for another world, and that whoever followed the advice found in those solemn, insincere, and lugubrious rhymes, although he might be exceedingly unhappy in this world, would with great certainty be rewarded in the next. These writers assumed that there was a kind of relation between rhyme and religion, between verse and virtue, and that it was their duty to call the attention of the world to all the snares and pitfalls of pleasure. They wrote with a purpose. They had a distinct moral end in view. They had a plan. They were missionaries, and their object was to show the world how wicked it was, and how good they, the writers, were. They could not conceive of a man being so happy that everything in nature partook of his feeling; that all the birds were singing for him, and singing by reason of his joy; that everything sparkled and shone and moved in the glad rhythm of his heart. They could not appreciate this feeling. They could not think of this joy guiding the artist's hand, seeking expression in form and color. They did not look upon poems, pictures, and statues as results, as children of the brain fathered by sea and sky, by flower and star, by love and light. They were not moved by gladness. They felt the responsibility of perpetual duty. They had a desire to teach, to sermonize, to point out and exaggerate the faults of others, and to describe the virtues practiced by themselvs. Art became a colporteur, a distributor of tracts, a mendicant missionary, whose highest ambition was to suppress all heathen joy.

Happy people were supposed to hav forgotten, in a reckless moment, duty and responsibility. True poetry would call them back to a realization of their meanness and their misery. It was the skeleton at the feast, the rattle of whose bones had a rhythmic sound. It was the forefinger of warning and doom held up in the presence of a smile.

These moral poets taught the unwelcome truths, and by the paths of life put posts on which they painted hands pointing at graves. They loved to see the pallor on the cheek of youth, while they talked, in solemn tones, of age, decrepitude, and lifeless clay.

Before the eyes of love they thrust, with eager hands, the skull of death. They crushed the flowers beneath their feet and plaited crowns of thorns for every brow.

According to these poets, happiness was inconsistent with virtue. The sense of infinit obligation should be perpetually present. They assumed an attitude of superiority. They denounced and calumniated the reader. They enjoyed his confusion when charged with total depravity. They loved to paint the sufferings of the lost, the worthlessness of human life, the littleness of mankind, and the beauties of an unknown world. They knew but little of the heart. They did not know that without passion there is no virtue, and that the really passionate are the virtuous.

Art has nothing to do directly with morality or immorality. It is its own excuse for being; it exists for itself.

The artist who endeavors to enforce a lesson becomes a preacher; and the artist who tries by hint and suggestion to enforce the immoral, becomes a pander.

There is an infinit difference between the nude and the naked, between the natural and the undressed. In the presence of the pure, unconscious nude, nothing can be more contemptible than those forms in which are the hints and suggestions of drapery, the pretense of exposure, and the failure to conceal. The undressed is vulgar, the nude is pure

The old Greek statues, frankly, proudly nude, whose free and perfect limbs hav never known the sacrilege of clothes, were and are as free from taint, as pure, as stainless, as the image of the morning star trembling in a drop of perfumed dew.

Morality is the harmony between act and circumstance. It is the melody of conduct. A wonderful statue is the melody of proportion. A great picture is the melody of form and color. A great statue does not suggest labor; it seems to hav been created as a joy. A great painting suggests no weariness and no effort; the greater, the easier it seems. So a great and splendid life seems to hav been without effort. There is in it no idea of obligation, no idea of responsibility or of duty. The idea of duty changes to a kind of drudgery that which should be, in the perfect man, a perfect pleasure.

The artist, working simply for the sake of enforcing a moral, becomes a laborer. The freedom of genius is lost, and the artist is absorbed in the citizen. The soul of the real artist should be moved by this melody of proportion, as the body is unconsciously swayed by the rhythm of a symphony. No one can imagin that the great men who chiseled the statues of antiquity intended to teach the youth of Greece to be obedient to their parents. We cannot believe that Michael Angelo painted his grotesque and somewhat vulgar "Day of Judgment" for the purpose of reforming Italian thieves. The subject was in all probability selected by his employer, and the treatment was a question of art, without the slightest reference to the moral effect even upon priests. We are perfectly certain that Carot painted those infinitly poetic landscapes, those cottages, those sad poplars, those leafless vines on weather-tinted walls, those quiet pools, those contented cattle, those fields flecked with light, over which bend the skies, tender as the breast of a mother, without once thinking of the Ten Commandments. There is the same difference between moral art and the product of true genius that there is between prudery and virtue.

The novelists who endeavor to enforce what they are pleased to call "moral truths," cease to be artists. They create two kinds of characters—types and caricatures. The first never has lived, and the second never will. The real artist produces neither. In his pages you will find individuals, natural people, who hav the contradictions and inconsistencies inseparable from humanity. The great artists "hold the mirror up to nature," and this mirror reflects with absolute accuracy. The moral and the immoral writers—that is to say, those who hav some object besides that of art—use convex or concave mirrors, or those with uneven surfaces, and the result is that the images are monstrous and deformed. The little novelist and the little artist deal either in the impossible or the exceptional. The men of genius touch the universal. Their words and works throb in unison with the great ebb and flow of things. They write and work for all races and for all time.

It has been the object of thousands of reformers to destroy the passions, to do away with desires; and could this object be accomplished, life would become a burden, with but one desire; that is to say, the desire for extinction. Art in its highest forms increases passion, givs tone and color and zest to life. But, while it increases passion, it refines. It extends the horizon. The bare necessities of life constitute a prison, a dungeon. Under the influence of art the walls expand, the roof rises, and it becomes a temple.

Art is not a sermon, and the artist is not a preacher. Art accomplishes by indirection. The beautiful refines. The perfect in art suggests the perfect in conduct. The harmony in music teaches without intention the lesson of proportion in life. The bird in his song has no moral purpose, and yet the influence is humanizing. The beautiful in nature acts through appreciation and sympathy. It does not browbeat, neither does it humiliate. It is beautiful without regard to you. Roses would be unbearable if in their red and perfumed hearts were mottoes to the effect that bears eat bad boys and that honesty is the best policy.

Art creates an atmosphere in which the proprieties, the amenities, and the virtues unconsciously grow. The rain does not lecture the seed. The light does not make rules for the vine and flower.

The heart is softened by the pathos of the perfect.

The world is a dictionary of the mind, and in this dictionary of things genius discovers analogies, resemblances, and parallels amid opposits, likeness in difference, and corroboration in contradiction. Language is but a multitude of pictures. Nearly every word is a work of art, a picture represented by a sound, and this sound represented by a mark, and this mark givs not only the sound, but the picture of something in the outward world and the picture of something within the mind, and with these words which were once pictures, other pictures are made.

The greatest pictures and the greatest statues, the most wonderful and marvelous groups, hav been painted and chiseled with words. They are as fresh to-day as when they fell from human lips. Penelope still ravels, weaves, and waits; Ulysses's bow is bent, and through the level rings the eager arrow flies; Cordelia's tears are falling now. The greatest gallery of the world is found in Shakspere's book. The pictures and the marbles of the Vatican and Louvre are faded, crumbling things, compared with his, in which perfect color givs to perfect form the glow and movement of passion's highest life.

Everything except the truth wears, and needs to wear, a mask. Little souls are ashamed of nature. Prudery pretends to hav only those passions that it cannot feel. Moral poetry is like a respectable canal that never overflows its banks. It has weirs through which slowly and without damage any excess of feeling is allowed to flow. It makes excuses for nature, and regards love as an interesting convict. Moral art paints or chisels feet, faces, and rags. It regards the body as obscene. It hides with drapery what it has not the genius purely to portray. Mediocrity becomes moral from a necessity which it has the impudence to call virtue. It pretends to regard ignorance as the foundation of purity and insists that virtue seeks the companionship of the blind.

Art creates, combines, and reveals. It is the highest manifestation of thought, of passion, of love, of intuition. It is the highest form of expression, of history, and prophecy. It allows us to look at an unmasked soul, to fathom the abysses of passion, to understand the hights and depths of love.

Compared with what is in the mind of man, the outward world almost ceases to excite our wonder. The impression produced by mountains, seas, and stars is not so great, so thrilling, as the music of Wagner. The constellations themselvs grow small when we read "Troilus and Cressida," "Hamlet," or "Lear." What are seas and stars in the presence of a heroism that holds pain and death as naught? What are seas and stars compared with human hearts? What is the quarry compared with the statue?

Art civilizes because it enlightens, develops, strengthens, and ennobles. It deals with the beautiful, with the passionate, with the ideal. It is the child of the heart. To be great it must deal with the human. It must be in accordance with the experience, with the hopes, with the fears, and with the possibilities of man. No one cares to paint a palace, because there is nothing in such a picture to touch the heart. It tells of responsibility, of the prison of the conventional. It suggests a load, it tells of apprehension, of weariness, and ennui. The picture of a cottage, over which runs a vine, a little home thatched with content, with its simple life, its natural sunshine and shadow, its trees bending with fruit, its hollyhocks and pinks, its happy children, its hum of bees, is a poem—a smile in the desert of this world.

The great lady, in velvet and jewels, makes but a poor picture. There is not freedom enough in her life. She is constrained. She is too far away from the simplicity of happiness. In her thought there is too much of the mathematical. In all art you will find a touch of chaos, of liberty; and there is in all artists a little of the vagabond—that is to say, genius.

The nude in art has rendered holy the beauty of woman. Every Greek statue pleads for mothers and sisters. From these marbles come strains of music. They hav filled the heart of man with tenderness and worship. They hav kindled reverence, admiration, and love. The Venus de Milo, that even mutilation cannot mar, tends only to the elevation of our race. It is a miracle of majesty and beauty, the supreme idea of the supreme woman. It is a melody in marble. All the lines meet in a kind of voluptuous and glad content. The pose is rest itself. The eyes are filled with thoughts of love. The breast seems dreaming of a child.

The prudent is not the poetic; it is the mathematical. Genius is the spirit of abandon; it is joyous, irresponsible. It moves in the swell and curve of billows; it is careless of conduct and consequence. For a moment, the chain of cause and effect seems broken; the soul is free. It givs an account not even to itself. Limitations are forgotten; nature seems obedient to the will; the ideal alone exists; the universe is a symphony.

Every brain is a gallery of art, and every soul is, to a greater or less degree, an artist. The pictures and statues that now enrich and adorn the walls and niches of the world, as well as those that illuminate the pages of its literature, were taken originally from the private galleries of the brain.

The soul—that is to say, the artist—compares the pictures in its own brain with the pictures that hav been taken from the galleries of others and made visible. This soul, this artist, selects that which is nearest perfection in each, takes such parts as it deems perfect, puts them together, forms new pictures, new statues, and in this way creates the ideal.

To express desires, longings, ecstasies, prophecies, and passions in form and color; to put love, hope, heroism, and triumph in marble; to paint dreams and memories with words; to portray the purity of dawn, the intensity and glory of noon, the tenderness of twilight, the splendor and mystery of night, with sounds; to giv the invisible to sight and touch, and to enrich the common things of earth with gems and jewels of the mind—this is Art.

Mr. Denslow's Distribution of Wealth.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I trust you will kindly giv this letter the same circulation you gave to Mr. Van Buren Denslow's articles on "The Distribution of Wealth," to which it refers.

Mr. Denslow says, "Why, if—as our Declaration of Independence affirms—all men are created equal, is it impossible to find any two men who are in fact equal in any respect?" I can scarcely believe him serious in asking the above question, for it seems so exceedingly absurd, to say the least. Jefferson, Paine, and Franklin, to whom the world is indebted for the American Declaration of Independence, were no more "equal in any respect" than men are to-day. And I am inclined to believe that those immortal geniuses knew that obvious fact as well as Mr. Denslow does.

> We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

If the language of the above is not plain enough, it is because justice is becoming less and less acceptable to some people. And it must be in the natural course of events, under our present system, that, as millionaires keep on increasing, both in numbers and in millions, our Declaration of Independence, like justice, will become less and less acceptable, if not, indeed, an eyesore, to them and their defenders. I hope, however, that all lovers of justice will cherish that document, not only as the grandest declaration of the equal rights of men, but also as one of the most sublime monuments of honor to human nature.

I hav not read the works of Karl Marx, Lasalle, nor those of Hyndman, and I do not pretend to know anything of their principles, but I read all of Henry George's works more than once. And it is from a George point of view that I write. When Mr. Denslow puts such words as the following in the mouth of Mr. George:

> And is not every man who possesses wealth, a robber? Answer. He is.
> And is any duty plainer than that the robbed ought to kill the robber and enter into possession of his own? Answer. No duty is plainer.
> Then is it not the duty of every man who has got nothing to dynamite every man who has got something? Answer. Certainly.

he shows that either he has not read Mr. George's works, or he deliberately lies with a coolness that is simply amazing. I defy Mr. Denslow to produce a paragraph or a sentence from Mr. George's works, or from his paper, the Standard, to justify the language he attributes to him in the questions and answers quoted. I doubt if the bigoted Christians ever circulated meaner falsehoods about Thomas Paine than the above is about Mr. George.

As Thomas Paine told the French National Assembly that he wanted to abolish monarchy, but, at the same time, save the neck of the monarch, so Henry George tells the landlords of Ireland:

> I apologize to the Irish landlords, and all other landlords, for likening them to thieves and robbers. I trust they will understand that I do not consider them as personally worse than other men, but that I am obliged to use such illustrations because no others will fit the case. I am concerned not with individuals, but with the system (The Land Question, p. 35). (The italics are mine.)
> Whatever excuse there may be for violence in countries where aristocratic political institutions yet exist, and standing armies prevent expression of the popular will, here, where manhood suffrage prevails, and the people are the source of political power, the ballot is the proper means of protest, and the only instrument of reform (George-Hewitt Campaign, p. 11). (The italics are mine.)
> The greatest enemy of the people's cause is he who appeals to national passion and excites old hatreds. He is its best friend who does his utmost to bury them out of sight (Land Question, p. 49).

Mr. George denies that land can, in justice, be the private property of individuals, because it is, like air, water and sunshine, the gift of nature to all. But of property produced by human exertion of head or hand, he says:

> Any recognition of the equal right to life and liberty which would deny the right to property—the right of a man to his labor and to the full fruits of his labor—would be a mockery (Social Problems, p. 106).

I would ask the intelligent readers of the brave Truth Seeker, Do these quotations from Mr. George's works indicate that he wants "to dynamite every man who has got something," as Mr. Denslow would hav you believe? I am not writing to defend Mr. George; he needs no defense at my hands. In love of justice, in sympathy with the downtrodden of his fellow-men; with a heart that pulsates to the music of noble and elevated daring; with a mind that grasps and comprehends the gigantic forces which modern inventions hav produced, which must, in the economic world, make for weal or for woe, according to the uses we make of them, he towers so high that Mr. Denslow cannot reach him. I write in the interest of the thousands of readers of The Truth Seeker, that such as may not know Mr. George shall not be deterred from reading his splendid works, if they be so inclined, by the falsehoods I hav nailed above. You, Freethinkers, know better than I can tell you how millions of Americans allowed their prejudices against Thomas Paine to cheat them out of the treasure they would hav found in his great works for the elevation of mankind. And the end is not yet. Let us be more just than they were.

> I hold that inequality in the distribution of wealth of every kind is essential to the highest rapidity in its production, the greatest economy in its use, and the largest enjoyment in its consumption; in short, that some must be rich and others poor, in order that mankind may liv at all, and that, instead of the poor being made poorer by the contrast with the wealth of the rich, it is only because of the involuntary services rendered to them by the wealth they do not own that the poor can liv at all.

This is truly refreshing, considering the abominable rascalities, legal and illegal, by means of which most of the great fortunes were made during the last twenty-five years. Instance the Central Pacific railroad kings.

To prove that things are right as they are, Mr. Denslow sets up men of straw and makes himself believe they are the John L. Sullivans of the reformers and then he knocks them out with great glee.

> If Long's Peak and Pike's Peak did not split the sky with their wastes of ice and granit in Colorado; if there were no Rocky mountains and no Sierras west of the Mississippi, no rains would fall in Illinois, no descending thunders would send up their smoke at White Niagara. The Mississippi valley would be another desert of Sahara. If there were no Alps nor Pyrenees, there would hav been no Roman empire, no modern European civilization.

We are left to infer from his words that, because there are mountains on the earth's surface without which there would be "no descending thunders at White Niagara," there must be mountains of wealth in the hands of the few.

And there is no mistaking the mournful fact that as our mountains of wealth are going up and up in the hands of the few, by means of monopolies which hav the nation at their mercy, the more disgraceful is the "Niagara" of woes unnumbered, of lives blasted on the threshold of existence, of despair and prostitution, of suicides and crimes of all kinds, the reports of which fill the columns of our daily papers.

That men are not equal in capacity, morals, etc., goes without saying, and that there must be differences in wealth is also plain to all, but that our present inequalities in wealth are monstrously and out of all proportion greater than the natural inequalities of men must be patent to everyone.

Let the mountains be. We ought not to imitate them in their heartlessness. Paul Gariepy.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

the miracles of jesus.

I had not been many weeks in this country before I was invited to a wedding, which took place (as seems to be the custom here) in the house of the bride's father, and at the latter end of the day. In England such things are generally celebrated at church in the forenoon, and then the party adjourn to the house of the bride's father for the wedding "breakfast," at which champagne flows freely. Although the evening seems to be the fittest time for the exhibition of wine and strong drink, I remarked at the American wedding that it reminded me of the marriage of Cana in Galilee. "There was no wine," but, unlike the marriage of Cana, no miracle was used to produce any.

I will offer no opinion on the merits or demerits of the Prohibition question, other than to express my surprise that the professed followers of one who was reputed a "wine-bibber and a friend of publicans and sinners," who even wrought a miracle to produce the liquor he loved, should decry that liquor as unlawful, and persecute the publicans, or, as they are called here, the saloon-keepers, for venturing to supply the public with that most Christian drink.

Nor will I attempt to explain the modus operandi by which the water was turned into wine, for such transmutation is chemically impossible. No doubt Jesus told the folks it was wine, and they believed him. When administering the last supper, he told his disciples that they were eating and drinking his flesh and blood, and they believed that. Similar miracles are performed in the present day by electro-biologists and priests. Such miracles will always be possible as long as the majority of the people are fools and destitute of common sense.

With regard to the casting out of "devils," modern Spiritualism has thrown a light on this subject which was not perceptible to the original translators of the New Testament. The word they hav rendered devils signifies spirits, but not necessarily evil spirits. The revisers hav more properly rendered it demons. "There's a divinity that shapes our ends," said Shakspere. If he had been a Greek, he would with equal propriety hav used that Greek word, for that is the primary signification of the word. Every great man, whether inventor or reformer, has a spirit that prompts him to persevere in spite of all the difficulties and obstacles that beset him. But against every single great man there are a multitude of cranks, whose demons are equally pertinacious. Such appears to hav been the case in the days of Jesus, and some few, perhaps the most harmless of them, he managed to dispossess of their demons—as the Jews rightly inferred, by virtue of the master demon that possessed himself (Matt. ix, 34). Mary Magdalene was evidently a medium as well as a Spiritualist, for she had seven of them. Jesus took all the nonsense out of her—perhaps laughed it out. It is the best way to treat Spiritualists in the present day, for as a rule they cannot stand ridicule.

As regards the healing of the sick, Jesus has been largely outdone by the quacks and patent medicin vendors of the nineteenth century—that is, if we may credit the thousands of testimonials that are spread abroad every day in their advertisments, and the millions of pious people who believe in them. It may be objected that these are ex parte statements, but so are the statements in the so-called gospels. If the Christian religion cannot recommend itself to the present generation without referring to the wonders said to be wrought by it so many generations ago, it is surely not worth recommending at all. Outis.

Theology and Science.

The bane of theology, and what is sure to kill it sooner or later, is the irreconcilableness between the origin of man in the deity, and the responsibility of man. Opinion on this point is now in a state of unstable equilibrium. The only way to hold both doctrins in the affirmativ is to decline to compare them, to suppress, to make it absolutely unlawful to look straight at their mutual relations. Theology is actuated by the truest instinct when it entertains a hatred of science. Science brings propositions into line with the laws of reason, or rejects them when it cannot. It will not tolerate flight in the face of consequences resulting from just conclusions. Theology has armed itself with sets of words such as throw a pall of terror over the path at certain points of mental progress. "Thus far," it says, "shalt thou go in thy researches, and no farther; beyond this point it is not lawful to consider, to study, to think." But narrower and narrower grow the confines of terror-stricken fields of investigation. The first questionings of the human mind were just as fatal as any, for they were the first links in a chain which, however long, is unbreakable; and theology did right, from its point of view, in hacking away, by every possible means, however brutal, the daring grasp of humanity upon its links; and the same policy is kept up now, though the tactics are adapted to modern conditions. A very cunning method is now often pursued, which consists in substituting false clues, which make concessions to the spirit of inquiry, while they lead back to the "fold of faith." Thus theology sometimes seems to turn the tables upon science, and by hocus-pocus seems to become the champion of freedom against the "galling bondage" of human reason. But the slave, though dazzled and puzzled for a time, cannot permanently forget the chafing and galling of his fetters. The sophistry passes; the persistent instinct for thought, study, and speculation returns; the foot transgresses the sacred limits, and the falsity of dogmas looms up, more and more, in theology as in geology, astronomy, or any other field. In vain do the high priests, the sanhedrim, dress up a ghost to guard the path from intrusion. They cannot show the ghosts, and their work descends to take its place with all other mortal doings and sayings; like all other acts and dicta of past ages, they are reversed as judgments of a merely human court.

The doctrin of the origin of man by a creator, and the doctrin of the right of that creator to wage war on him as an equal, punishing him for being what he himself made him, are mutually destructiv. The only reason theology has not long ago fallen to pieces in attempting to stand on both, is the paralysis of reason produced by theology itself. Look at it! God made man. It cannot giv that up. God has the right to punish his own work. It cannot giv that up. A man can make an imperfect machine. Finding it imperfect, he throws it aside, breaks it up; the machine ends its existence, but it is not punished. The punishment, whatever it is, rests on the maker; he cannot shake it off; he cannot shift the blame; he cannot say: "I was perfectly wise and skilful; the folly was in the machine." Such a statement might be accepted in some inconceivable realm where intelligent mind had no place; but while intelligent mind exists, while the laws of reasoning are what they are, never can such a statement meet with assent.

Does not theology say, All that is good in you is from God? Then why not the evil? Rub away this blot in theology if you can, my theological friend; blink it; hush it up; explain it away; write tomes of sermons and mountains of divinity on it; and when your work is done, and you are weary, yes, when all your tribe is weary, humanity will rise up and say, "Your system is a lie, because the Cause cannot blame the Effect."

Science, the ultimate effort of mind, in the grand evolution of humanity, is slowly but surely mastering the great question of "sin." The old, the barbaric workings of a blindly groping period upon the question, having resulted in naught but an ever-returning circle of torturing and feverish dreams, in which figured an angry ghost, warring against the clumsy images of his own conception; trying to prove himself perfect by breaking them in pieces in his pueril malice, and afterward by keeping the bits in a big glass-furnace, are giving place, as the ponderous momentum of old opinion decreases, to the cool, level-headed doctrins of the result of untrammeled investigation. We are what we are by inheritance. Remedy is being sought, not vengeance. There may be such a being as a God. There is no such a being as a vindictiv God. There is no such a thing as eternal fire; no eternity of misery; no cutting off from betterment. To assert that there is is worse than Atheism, which but leaves matters to evolve themselvs; for it embodies and personifies wrong. And woe unto him who calls darkness light.

FREEMAN.

When Priests Were in Partnership with Kings.

Extract from Colonel Ingersoll's Argument in the Reynolds Case.

A few years ago almost everything spoken against the grossest possible superstition was considered blasphemous. The altar hedged itself about with the sword; the priest went in partnership with the king. In those days statutes were leveled against all human speech. Men were convicted of blasphemy because they believed in an actual personal God; because they insisted that God had body and parts. Men were convicted of blasphemy because they denied that God had form. They hav been imprisoned for denying the doctrin of transubstantiation, and they hav been torn in pieces for defending that doctrin. There are but few dogmas now believed by any Christian church that hav not at some time been denounced as blasphemous.

When Henry the VIII. put himself at the head of the Episcopal church a creed was made, and in that creed there were five dogmas that must, of necessity, be believed. Anybody who denied any one, was to be punished—for the first offense, with fine, with imprisonment, or branding, and for the second offense, with death. Not one of these five dogmas is now a part of the creed of the Church of England.

So I could go on for days and weeks and months, showing that hundreds and hundreds of religious dogmas, to deny which was death, hav been either changed or abandoned for others nearly as absurd as the old ones were. It may be, however, sufficient to say, that wherever the church has had power it has been a crime for any man to speak his honest thought. No church has ever been willing that any opponent should giv a transcript of his mind. Every church in power has appealed to brute force, to the sword, for the purpose of sustaining its creed, Not one has had the courage to occupy the open field. The church has not been satisfied with calling Infidels and unbelievers blasphemers. Each church has accused nearly every other church of being a blasphemer. Every pioneer has been branded as a criminal. The Catholics called Martin Luther a blasphemer, and Martin Luther called Copernicus a blasphemer. Pious ignorance always regards intelligence as a kind of blasphemy. Some of the greatest men of the world, some of the best, hav been put to death for the crime of blasphemy, that is to say, for the crime of endeavoring to benefit their fellow-men.
